And yet, it is superfluous to ponder the question of whether the U.S. decision to replace patient diplomatic "persuasion" with concrete pressure was made too late or, as some people affected by the wake of this decision say, too early. It is not,--at any rate not predominantly,--the conditions of the presidential election which made Carter act now. After all, it was not only the self-esteem and the credibility of a great power, internally and toward the rest of the world, which was at stake. It was treacherous signals in any event--which nevertheless were taken seriously to the point of self-abandon--that pointed toward Iran's government, which is totally incapable of acting, and Iran's president, who is totally powerless to gain ground against the rigorous tutelage of the Ayatollah Khomeyni who rules so despotically.

Nevertheless, and particularly in the conflict with the irrationality of Iranian reactions, Carter's options appear to be extremely limited. They essentially include the attitude of the allies in the preliminary phase of escalation. This endows the U.S. President's decision with a nearly fateful dimension for the entire Western alliance, because nobody dares answer the question today as to how the conflict would be bound to escalate further in the event of a lack of support in the sphere of the boycott and what the consequences would be.

The potential consequences are largely overshadowed by the military presence of the Soviet Union in Afghanistan. A military intervention by the United States in Iran would be bound to take into consideration the risk of a clash between the two superpowers. It is not just because of this vision of horror that the most extreme option of military force hardly seems to be conceivable. If it is the lives of the hostages that continues to matter--and Carter has not left any doubt about that--it is hard to imagine how they could be saved with a calculated military action.

But even a naval blockade as a factor escalating pressure against Iran could be sensibly put into practice only if friend and foe were affected by it. [paragraph continues]

This would mean blocking not only prize crews of Soviet freighters--and the deterrence of their potential escort protection--but also European and Japanese oil tankers out of the Strait of Hormuz. The precondition--definitely in the case of Japan--would be the readiness of other oil supplier countries to make up for the loss of the Iranian oil to keep Nippon's industry which is still dependent on Iranian energy imports, alive.

The U.S. crisis plan will have to proceed from the premise that the conflicts in the region overlap in many respects and that they might quickly multiply with incalculable consequences--from the present highly virulent Afghan-Iranian dual crisis, via the Iraqi-Iranian confrontation, which is heating up, to the serious, and at present hardly soluble, complications on the road pursued by the Israeli-Egyptian negotiations. It is as yet impossible to tell what and how much the escalating anti-American, and perhaps anti-Western, uproar in Iran might touch off in other Islamic states of the Mideast arc of crisis.

Temporizing characterizes the attitude to most Islamic states in the neighborhood of Iran and outside the region, and indication of this is the postponement by 4 weeks of the foreign ministerial conference of the Islamic states which was supposed to discuss the situation in the region in Dacca next week. Most of them are definitely not threatened by the export of the Islamic Revolution of Ayatollah Khomeyni. Their governments and administrations have remained capable of acting internationally and predictable, without exception.

But to the extent that they are directly affected in the crisis region of the Persian Gulf, they are not absolutely sure as to what they must fear more: the weakness of the United States (supposed by many people), of its military competence and its political readiness to make that competence prevail, or the heralds of a new policy of strength, the Carter's boycott strategy which has been calculated all the way through to an escalation into the military field.

What the President in Washington has started in motion in prejudgment [vorgriff] rather than in trusting to a unanimous support by the allies must not in any event end up in the zone of doubt and unpredictability. If Jimmy Carter were now left without the backing of Europe, without the demonstration of solidarity concerning the boycott, then the region would indeed be easily pushed to the brink of war through internal and external convulsions. And that may turn out to be indivisible for Europe.

PROS AND CONS OF ECONOMIC BOYCOTT OF IRAN WEIGHED

DW110956 Munich SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG in German 11 Apr 80 p 4 DW

[Hans D. Barbier Bonn dispatch: "The Dull Sword of Trade War"]

[Text] The other day a representative of the German economy articulated the people's voice thusly: "This is a delightful alternative: If the Americans impose a blockade, the Iranians cannot deliver any oil to us anymore; if we join the export boycott, they will no longer want to deliver any oil to us." A worry about the material standard of living sounding so blunt apparently does not know anything about the delicate webs of foreign policy and alliance commitments. And yet, this brief formula, which sums up the high price and the probably meager result of an embargo decision in the not so vile "cotton thinking" ["denken an kattun"], contains a grain of wisdom.

There are, of course, good reasons to stand beside the Americans especially when this nation is being driven into an unbearable humilation by a bunch of mad and criminal pseudorevolutionaries. The taking of hostages in Tehran is meeting with such a profound and undivided outrage in the German people that the rather selfish auxiliary argument of the freedom guarantees for Berlin is not necessary to assure the Americans of a sympathy that is meant honestly. Even if it would become a few degrees colder in German living rooms as a result, the government could reckon with broad approval for any aid action decided on the spur of the moment.

But what may seem like mercenary "cotton thinking" is the doubt whether the Americans can be helped with a German, European, or European-Asian export embargo against Iran. This doubt begins already with the question about the sense in the American announcement itself. After the overthrow of the shah the U.S. deliveries to Iran--much more so than the German deliveries--dropped all of a sudden. They are practically confined to foodstuffs and medicines; that is, to the very goods categories for which the President promises an exception arrangement of "small quantities"--and this nearly in one breath with a loud contemplation of the option of a total sea blockade against Iran. All respect for a man marked by his anxieties notwithstanding, Jimmy Carter must not be surprised if he is asked the question meanwhile raised in many parts of the world: "What does he want now?"

And thus, Hans-Dietrich Genscher's statement is involuntarly double-bottomed if he, on behalf of the still vacationing chancellor, has the announcement released that "greater technical preparations" are not required to put into practice what must yet be decided under the rules of the European consultation mechanism. What can we do that would be effective anyway. For the time being the German Government has an alibi in its foreign trade law for the event that the U.S. solidarity wishes become concrete. For the purpose of "guaranteeing the security of the Federal Republic" or preventing "a considerable disturbance of the foreign relations" all exports can be placed under a permit reservation by legal edict.

All details of such a permit reservation which, mind you, does not constitute an automatic export ban, are subject to interpretation. What is primarily considered under this reservation is strategic goods; but these goods have already been covered by the so-called COCOM list of the Coordinating Committee for East-West trade. Are buses strategically important? What can be done with the formula for a steel alloy? Nothing looking as though it were useful for war purposes in the normal sense of the word has been delivered by the Germans to Iran anyway since the ayatollahs seized power. The exports which have become quite modest have drastically shifted to the consumer goods industry. The position "chemicals", holding second place on the list of deliveries, stands for medicines rather than combat-gas agents.

Even if the government were to control and prohibit all export positions most specifically, the detour-deal option would still be left. Should we also discontinue our trade with Libya, one of our most important oil suppliers, if and when Colonel al-Qadhdhafi makes no bones about the fact that he will immediately forward this or that order to his religious brethren in Iran? Such trade restrictions cannot be seriously controlled. The representatives of the economy who chided Otto Wolff von Amerongen because he had advocated a careful (meaning undisturbed) East-West trade in the context of the Afghanistan crisis, especially are aware of that.

All skepticism about the effectiveness of a trade embargo notwithstanding, it is necessary to make allowances. No matter how firmly we are convinced that an embargo will harm us without helping the hostages, the government must examine in the dialog with the Americans and with the European partners whether effective sanctions could not be found in the process of a "careful thinking to the end," as Helmut Schmidt once characterized any crisis strategy.

It will not do for Europe's industries to swoop down now on the Iranian market like vultures. But what business would they have there anyway? Where zealousness suffocates rationality trade perishes as well--without any blockade and without any embargo.

SCHMIDT POSITION ON OLYMPIC BOYCOTT UNCHANGED

LD111134 Hamburg DPA in German 1108 GMT 11 Apr 80 LD

[Excerpt] Bonn--The Federal Government is determined to give at the proper time "political advice" to the national Olympic committee on the question of a possible boycott of the summer Olympics. Government Spokesman Klaus Boelling denied today with this statement press reports that the government is no longer considering giving the Olympic committee an official boycott recommendation, and that at its meeting on 15 May the committee will decide on participation. Boelling made it clear that the advice would be forthcoming at a time when the committee would no longer feel that it was being pressured.

Boelling stressed that Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt continues to hold the viewpoint which was defined more precisely after his talks with President Carter, when it was said that participation in the Moscow games would be out of line as long as the occupation of Afghanistan by Soviet troops continued. Moscow must establish the prerequisites enabling participation by all states. The government spokesman emphasized that so far such prerequisites do not exist.

PAPER VIEWS USSR-AFGHAN TREATY ON STATIONING TROOPS

DW081419 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE in German 8 Apr 80 p 1 DW

[Article signed Hr.: "Temporarily"]

[Text] How long or how short the "temporary" stationing of Soviet troops on foreign soil will last has not been experienced to this day by one of the countries which have undergone such stationing. In the GDR, for example, the Red Army members are stationed only "temporarily," as we can read in the 1957 treaty. The same holds true according to the treaties with Poland, Hungary and Czechoslovakia: Years and decades come and go, but only the Russians stay.

Moscow has now concluded a treaty with the Afghan regime on the "temporary stationing" of Soviet units. The texts of the agreements with the allies in Europe permit the interpretation that the Red Army desires to occupy the European buffer zone for as long as there are American soldiers, NATO and the Bundesehr on the continent--that is, for a very long time. The Soviet-Afghan statements prior to and after the ratification of the agreement indicate that the friendly tanks from the Soviet Union will stay as long as the possibility of some (other) "interference" exists--and since that is a matter of dialectical definition, it might last even longer: at least as long as Moscow pleases.

Seen that way the treaty is not a limitation but an extension of the Afghan involvement. The fact that the military intervention achieves through this paper an alleged legitimacy under international law is insignificant. The tanks came without a treaty, and they can do what their commanders please, with or without treaties. International political developments "after Afghanistan" at least have not demonstrated the opposite. The treaty is at best a document which demonstrates that to this day the Soviet Union likes to put on a fine, even if fake, appearance. That was always the case, ranging from the annexation of the Baltic states in the shadow of world war, to the "cry for help" from Prague in 1968. For whom--for the files, for the history book, or just for the many people with a short memory?

Only one power seems to be able to counteract the occupation of Afghanistan, and that is the smallest of all possible powers: the freedom fighters in the country. The news of bloody resistance actions has not decreased, and the reinforcement of Soviet troops as well as the fake legalization of their evil business cause one to assume that the Afghan resistance is not just "temporary."

TOP CDU CANDIDATE IN DIET ELECTION INCAPACITATED

DW101742 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE in German 5 Apr 80 pp 1-2 DW

[Article signed L.B.: "Consternation in the CDU Following Koeppler's Serious Illness"]

[Text] Duesseldorf, 4 April--Five weeks before the elections of the Duesseldorf Diet, which will decide on the government in North Rhine Westphalia and are the last important vote by the electorate prior to the Bundestag elections in the fall, the CDU candidate for minister president, Heinrich Koeppler, has fallen so seriously ill that he will certainly be unable to take part in the election campaign prior to 11 May. The CDU in North Rhine Westphalia now is faced with the question of whether it can continue Koeppler's candidacy, although he is unable to campaign, or whether it should choose a new candidate, with the other leading CDU land politician, Biedenkopf, being the only one who could be placed as a top candidate against Social Democratic Minister President Rau and the SPD/FDR coalition. On Friday the party arrived at the view that it would retain Koeppler's candidacy and make other considerations only if "specific other circumstances" were to arise, and this also only with Koeppler's agreement. In his capacity as a responsible election campaign leader of his party Biedenkopf said: "The CDU will continue the election campaign in North Rhine Westphalia and fight even more intensely for Koeppler to become minister president."

The ailing politician, opposition's leader in Duesseldorf since 1970 and one of the CDU's deputy chairmen since 1973 is 55 years old. After weeks of preelection campaigning all over the country Koeppler had started a brief vacation in Sauerland at the beginning of the week, where he suffered a cardiac infarction on Thursday morning. After brief emergency treatment at the hospital in Fredeburg near Nordenau, his place of vacation, on the very same day Koeppler was flown by a special police helicopter with first-class medical equipment aboard to the municipal hospital in Duesseldorf-Gerresheim. On Friday Koeppler's condition was described as "good under the circumstances." It was said that his life was not in danger but that the infarction was serious enough that his recovery may take weeks or even months. Initial statements by physicians that Koeppler must consider his political career as finished were not confirmed later.

The executive committees of the Rhineland and Westphalia CDU as well as the joint state presidency of the two land organizations will meet in Cologne on Saturday under Biedenkoph's chairmanship in order to discuss the new situation. Koeppler is the Rhenish CDU chairman and Biedenkopf the Westphalian CDU chairman. On the party's list for the Diet elections Biedenkopf ranks behind Koeppler. He is also his immediate deputy in the chairmanship of the land presidency and he had assured Koeppler that in the event that the CDU formed a government in Duesseldorf, he would take over the Ministry of Economics. The question as to what personnel decisions are also to be made in May in case the CDU fails to gain the absolute majority and to replace the SPD/FDR coalition, which has ruled continuously in Duesseldorf since 1966, has so far not been discussed for obvious reasons. Koeppler, however, had made it plain that he considered his third candidacy since 1970 for the office of the Duesseldorf head of government as his last one, too.

He no longer intended to continue his work as opposition leader--terms of office in North Rhine-Westphalia last for 5 years. Under Koeppler's leadership that land's CDU had scored 46.3 in 1970 and 5 years later 47.1 percent of the votes after the party had attained a low of 42.8 percent in 1966. Since 1970 it has been the party with the strongest constituency in the land. But compared with 95 CDU deputies the coalition with 91 seats in the Diet held by the SPD and 14 by the FDR comprises a stable majority so that it was able in 1978 to accomplish without risk the change from Kuehn to Rau and at the end of 1979 an additional change from Riemer to Hirsch.

Prior to Koeppler's falling ill the Duesseldorf CDU was talking of the real chances for election that existed this time proceding from the assumption, however, that only 1 or 2 percent was needed to achieve an absolute majority. The question of whether Koeppler's absence will have its effects on the behavior of voters is now being discussed in all parties. Minister President Rau conveyed to Koeppler his best wishes for a speedy recovery and took the occasion to remark in connection with Koeppler's serious illness that in any event everybody should ponder the question of whether the hitherto high degree of strain on politicians can be justified any longer.

At his vacation site in Austrai CDU Chairman Kohl expressed consternation at Koeppler's illness and, like Secretary General Geissler, wished him a speedy recovery. Biedenkopf returned to Duesseldorf from his Swiss vacation as early as Friday. Since Thursday he has discussed the situation with Strauss, the union parties' candidate for chancellor, who naturally will have a say in deciding the question as to how things should now be handled in North Rhine-Westphalia.

The party is of the unanimous view that Biedenkopf is now faced with special responsibility. The Diet election campaign will be officially opened by the CDU the weekend after Easter with a mass rally in Essen at which Strauss, Kohl and Biedenkopf will speak. Koeppler was supposed to be the main speaker there. The same weekend, mass rallies will be held by the SPD with Schmidt, Brandt and Rau and by the FDP with Genscher, Lambsdorff, Baum, Hirsch and Mrs Funcke in Essen and Duesseldorf. The CDU is no longer expected to make its decisions before Easter. But they will probably be made the Sunday after Easter. The physicians' diagnosis of Koeppler's condition and the expectations linked with it will play a decisive part in this decision.

GROMYKO TO VISIT PARIS 22-24 APRIL

LD101514 Paris Domestic Service in French 1500 GMT 10 Apr 80 LD

ELYSEE SPOKESMAN ON CHAD CEASEFIRE AGREEMENT

LD101435 Paris LE MONDE in French 8 Apr 80 p 18 LD

[Unattributed report: "Mr Giscard d'Estaing Welcomes New Ceasefire Agreement Reached With Togo's Help"]

[Excerpts] A ceasefire agreement was signed on Sunday, 6 April, by Mr Goukouni, Chad head of state and leader of the People's Armed Forces, at the initiative of General Eyadema, the Togolese president. Under the terms of this agreement fighting should stop on Tuesday, 8 April, at noon local time.

Commenting on the Togolese president's initiative on Saturday, Elysee spokesman Jean-Marie Poirier indicated that Mr Giscard d'Estaing welcomed the initiative and "expressed the hope that this courageous attempt might help to reconcile the various sides and restore civilian peace in Chad," adding that this initiative "comes after diplomatic action which France has followed very closely."

Colonel Lardry, commander of the French forces in Chad, moreover reaffirmed to our special correspondent that the French Army is observing strict neutrality. "My mission was to insure the protection and evacuation of French nationals. I believe that the French forces in Chad have carried out this mission with complete success and that we have even extended it to other foreign nationals."

The colonel added: "If my positions are attacked I would be forced to use arms to defend myself. However, I would naturally first try to use any other means, especially consultation with the people attacking me, to avoid resorting to the use of arms. Nonetheless my mission would be to defend my present positions."

ALGERIA REPORTED TO SUSPEND GAS SUPPLIES

LD101258 Paris Domestic Service in French 1000 GMT 10 Apr 80 LD

[Summary] Deliveries of Algerian gas to France have been completely suspended since the beginning of the month. Officially Sonatrach says this is because of technical reasons but it is no doubt connected with current negotiations on setting new prices for this Algerian gas. Algeria supplies more than 12 percent of France's gas requirements. For the moment firms are being deprived of gas but the French Electricity and Gas Company says individual consumers should not have to suffer.

Algerian Denial

LD102222 Paris Domestic Service in French 1400 GMT 10 Apr 80 LD

[Text] The Algerian energy minister has just denied reports concerning the suspension of gas deliveries to France. There has never been any question of suspending deliveries to France during this period of negotiations on prices with the French gas company, he said.

LE FIGARO SEES DEEPENING OF U.S.-EUROPEAN 'ATLANTIC DITCH'

LD101333 Paris LE FIGARO in French 8 Apr 80 pp 1,3 LD

[Alfred Fabre-Luce article: "The Atlantic Is Rising"]

[Text] Geological history is made up of earth slides which create faults and can divide continents. These phenomena, almost imperceptible at the outset, results in terrible upheavals. We are witnessing now perhaps the start of a comparable earth slide in the diplomatic world. Last fall an eminent journalist was wondering whether our national defense was indeed of any use. Jacqueline Grapin now proposes a European neutrality in her book "X-Ray of the United States." Is the Atlantic alliance doomed to disappear like Atlantis, the great mysterious island which disappeared, according to Plato, in 10,000 BC? That would be a curious mishap. In 1949 the anxious Europeans secured the creation of NATO from the reticent Americans. Now people are starting to call it superfluous. Yet the USSR's relative strength has increased greatly since the alliance was concluded. Has the Kremlin turned pacifist, or have people resigned themselves to its dominance?

In the work mentioned above, "Finlandization," formerly a bugbear begins to take on the appearance of an ideal. The author of "X-Ray of the United States" reminds us that, as Kissinger said, we should not ask too much of that country. Free Europe has already chosen to allot only a small percentage of its national product to its security. A Franco-British nuclear safeguard would be no more credible to Europeans that the U.S. guarantee, and German participation in the European nuclear powers' financil outlay would not be acceptable to the Soviets. In the end, nobody can help anybody within the Atlantic alliance.

Jacqueline Grapin does not foresee the extreme consequences of such a theory, but Peter Jay, former British ambassador to the United States, examined them recently in the columns of the London review THE ECONOMIST. For him, if Europeans come to believe that the presence of U.S. soldiers on their contingent is unlikely to make the possible Soviet aggressor think twice, if in fact opposition to Washington more than fear of Moscow becomes the cement of European solidarity, then U.S. opinion will develop rapidly.

After all, they have their own oil and are assured of survival. The "U.S. protectionists and isolationists will win the battle that they lost against Roosevelt and Churchill in 1941." Just a few years ago, Senator Mansfield recommended the withdrawal of U.S. forces from Europe. Are the Europeans going to adopt Michel Jobert's "Yankee go home" slogan? Well, the phrase will be taken up on the other side of the Atlantic.

It seems to me naive to believe that a resigned Europe, persuaded that it can be defended neither from without nor within, could escape servitude for long. The USSR, freed from the uncertainty introduced into its calculations by the U.S. presence in Europe, would rapidly press its advantage throughout the continent.

It would use Berlin and relations between the two Germanies as a lever against the Bonn government, then the French diplomatic isolation to exert pressure on us.

It would not necessarily need to use further military occupations. It would first ask the Europeans to work for it. The governments of the day would be reduced to "subterfuges," like Stresemann in 1923 or Laval in 1942.

I pointed out here in January that one of the probable goals of the USSR's Afghan operation was to test the Western bloc's solidarity. Since then, the latter has appeared unanimous (with certain shades of interpretation) in condemning the invasion; but it was different when it came to the consequences of this position of principle. [paragraph continues]

The economic sanctions planned or taken by the United States have been quickly challenged. The more they were discussed, the more the boycott of the Moscow Olympics seemed, in contrast, like a symbolic gesture on which there could be unity without too many difficulties. Mrs Thatcher immediately showed her vigorous solidarity with President Carter; but she has since encountered opposition from the sporting organizations in her own country. People have even pointed out, across the Channel, that the very fact of imposing a government attitude on independent organizations was the beginning of totalitarianism. A similar conflict is now being sketched out in other countries. National splits have added to the alliance's fissures.

President Carter finds himself presented with a delicate choice. He is accused of not being firm enough toward Iran. However, military action could expose inadequate U.S. preparation, arouse the indignation of the local populations, overshadow the invasion of Afghanistan and compromise the oil supply which people are trying to pressure. It is for Jimmy Carter to avoid these pitfalls...by means which people are pointing out to him. It is up to him to act; we reserve the right to criticize.

As for Afghanistan, the Europeans put forward a plan to neutralize the country in the hope of interesting Moscow. The result: nothing. Other problems are already outlined on the horizon. Will people go to the Madrid conference? The "yes" voters are having various second thoughts. "We will go," those harking back to detente say, "if the USSR intends to make some gesture between now and then." They are already prepared to greet this "gesture" with a good deal of indulgence. On their part the human rights defenders say: "We must go to Madrid, but to denounce the USSR Government's failures on the Helsinki accords." A battle of opinions is in prospect.

People thought that they could draw some advantage from the Afghan crisis: Islamic indignation against the Soviet act of force. But this indignation of 1980 was insufficient to overshadow earlier indignation. To many socialist Muslims it is the Western consumer society which seems more like the incarnation of "Satan." The oil-producing countries are increasingly attracted by the idea of leaving hidden in the ground the oil whose disposal we hope to insure. How can we overcome this Malthusianism? By handing Israel over to the Front as surplus to requirements? That would be dishonorable and, moreover, is not within our power. By saving energy and defeating inflation? That is a better way. But the U.S. arrangements to this end are arousing criticism, too. People demanded them before, now they deplore the consequent strengthening of the dollar. Bonn itself is worried at seeing the United States return to it the monetary problem that the FRG posed before. A few months ago, the Bundesbank bought dollars to defend itself against an imported inflation arising from U.S. mismanagement. Will it now have to let the mark depreciate in order to avoid the consequences of a deflation spread by the United States?

None of these problems is insoluble, but none is easy. People are not approaching them anywhere in the spirit of sufficient understanding. The Atlantic ditch is deepening. If this slide sharpens, the earthquake will take the form of a U.S. withdrawal, followed by a German-Soviet entente or the arrival of the Red Army on the Rhine. And the irony of history will direct Moliere's phrase at us: "You asked for it, Georges Dandin."

PCF HITS 'ANTICOMMUNISM' OF MITTERRAND SANTO DOMINGO SPEECH

LD100919 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 2 Apr 80 p 3 LD

[Unattributed report: "The Santo Domingo Blow"]

[Text] The PCF Politburo yesterday issued a statement in response to the remarks made by [Socialist Party First Secretary] Francois Mitterrand at the Socialist International meeting in Santo Domingo.

Central Committee secretaries Charles Fiterman and Jean Colpin and PCF Poliburo member Pierre Juquin presented this statement to the press yesterday. The folowing is the text of the statement and the answers they gave to journalists' questions.

"Speaking at the Socialist International conference in Santo Domingo, Francois Mitterrand has just given a significant explanation of the role which he assigns to the socialist parties in France and in the world. His statements are worrying.

"The definition which he gives to the strategy followed by the socialist parties and the Socialist International is summarized in this sentence: 'curbing international communism.' 'It is essential,' he explained, 'to undermine the development of communism, which feeds on capitalism.' He added: 'We must reject the advances of international communism because in its way it destroys basic freedom.'

"To justify this objective, Francois Mitterrand--who took care to specify that he himself is 'not a Marxist'--drew a direct comparison between socialist societies and the worst dictatorships. In the same breath he mentioned Pinochet (Chile), Videla (Argentina) and Fidel Castro (Cuba). Touching on capitalism in general terms, rather like a stylistic addition, he kept the full force of his attack for what he calls Soviet 'imperialism.'

"At the same time, to back his basic argument against 'international communism'--in other words against the socialist countries and all communist parties--Francois Mitterrand used the most hackneyed reactionary arguments, especailly the slanderous allegation that the communist parties owe 'allegiance to Moscow.' He cited the argument put forward by Leon Blum who, at the Tours congress in 1920, 'defined the essential distinction between socialism and communism by refusing to allow French socialist policy to be dictated by Moscow.' He applied this argument to the situation in 1980.

"The strategy which the Socialist Party (PS) first secretary defined is the same as the strategy which another Socialist International leader, Austrian Chancellor Kreisky, recently assigned to social democracy by stating: 'Social democracy is the only way of averting the communist threat.'

"Therefore it is not surprising that Francois Mitterrand stressed at Santo Domingo that he is in agreement with the man he refers to as 'my friend Willy Brandt.' It is not surprising that he made no reference in his speech to the Union of the Left in France, that highlights the objectives which he assigns to the so-called 'Euroleft.'

"This speech is very different from the political showmanship which Francois Mitterrand uses in France to deceive the workers and leftwingers. It is at the Socialist International meeting, far from Paris, that he has chosen to explain his political line. It is significant that the official Socialist publication RIPOSTE has taken care not to mention his speech. (Note: After a 24 hours hesitation, RIPOSTE published a watered-down report yesterday evening which nonetheless confirms the main points of the cable sent by our Havana correspondent--L'HUMANITE editor's note)

"It was the same strategy which led Francois Mitterrand to state at the Vienna Socialist International in 1972: 'Our basic objective is to rebuild a great PS on the ground held by the PCF in order to show that of 5 million Communist voters, 3 million could vote Socialist.' 'This,' he added with regard to the joint leftwing program, 'is the reason for this agreement.'

"Indeed, at that time Francois Mitterrand was counting on using the joint program to attain his strategic objective: to weaken the PCF and obtain a strong position from which to act as an alternative or backup for the right and save capitalism.

"That objective was not attained, and there was a possibility of a government in which the Communists would have a place. That is why in 1977 Francois Mitterrand--in keeping with his strategy--assumed the responsibility of abandoning the joint program, breaking the leftwing union and bringing about defeat.

"Since then he has been following the same path. The 23d PCF Congress highlighted the significance of this path in these terms: 'The forces of capital are trying to contain democratic aspirations and struggles within the framework of their system and to insure that they only produce modifications, thereby maintaining the implementation of their policy. To this end they are resorting deliberately and systematically to social democracy.'

"This policy naturally led the PS into a blind alley. In order to try to find a way out at any price Francois Mitterrand was forced to reveal his true face initially by announcing that the PS should prepare to govern alone in France, which runs counter to the union and is tantamount to preparing the ground for an alliance with the right.

"That forced him to show his cards a second time by defining the PS as a spearhead against 'international communism' and hence showing his opposition to Communist participation in government and to socialism's progress.

"However, by rivaling the right's anticommunism and widening the leftwing split, Francois Mitterrand is merely serving the interests of Giscard's government, its austerity policy, its policy of submission to the FRG and of allegiance to the United States.

"His statements are revealing. They are bound to prompt consideration and reaction not only from all those who support the PCF but more generally, from the leftwing women and men who aspire to union and change.

"The implementation of the strategy adopted by the PS leadership would make the democratic movement regress for a time and would postpone the possibility of change. This is a defeatist strategy. All workers and democrats must try to thwart it.

"We are confident in calling on people to join this struggle.

"Capital's policy is disastrous. There is great discontent and desire for change. Nothing has been able or will be able to turn us from the struggle for the union of people's forces, the union of the left and the struggle to defeat the right and bring about democratic change.

"There is one essential precondition for achieving this: Since the PCF does not yet have the strength, influence and means necessary to swing the balance decisively in the right direction, it is vital to strengthen the party. Francois Mitterrand's statements make it more clear than ever that strengthening the PCF is now the key to change."

The PS Aunt Sally Strategy

After reading this declaration, Charles Fiterman answered journalists' questions.

Questioned on "the difference between F. Mitterrand's statement in Vienna in 1972 and the one he has just made in Santo Domingo," Charles Fiterman replied:

"There is nothing new in F. Mitterrand's strategy. What is new is that, faced with problems and caught in what can only be called a blind alley, F. Mitterrand has been carried away willy nilly into extreme pro-American, pro-Atlantic anticommunism. That is explained by the statements he has just made to the Socialist International in Santo Domingo and not to the French people.

"At the moment F. Mitterrand is developing an Aunt Sally [straw man] strategy.

"He is playing Aunt Sally with the concrete foundations of the union by deciding, for instance, to suppress delegations of Communist representatives in union municipalities where, without any justification, he is breaking agreements and planning practical steps toward a homogenous government.

"He is also playing Aunt Sally when he attacks the foundations of the union in the workers' minds by spreading frantic anticommunism, supporting and feeding what can only be called unworthy campaigns against the PCF and its secretary general.

"He is playing Aunt Sally with the hopes placed by workers and democrats in the union and change. This is a policy of calculated pessimism aimed ultimately at clearing the ground for the right and for a PS alliance with the right.

"Of course everybody knows that this aspiration to govern alone and play a dominant role is completely illusory."

In reply to another question asking whether "the Communists would henceforth encourage their voters to transfer their votes to the PS candidate in the second round of elections," Charles Fiterman reaffirmed that "all the problems which exist with regard to the leftwing union and all the obstacles which have built up will not persuade us to change course. We consider," he continued, "that the people's union and the leftwing union are necessary for us to progress toward change and we are determined to pursue our efforts with perseverance and determination to insure that this change is brought about by struggle. This depends on fulfilling the urgent need to maintain and if possible extend the bases of the union, and I am thinking in particular of the leftwing union which exists in municipal and department councils.

"We are determined to do all we can to preserve this achievement. That is why we have just proposed that there should be a single leftwing candidate in the first round, on a reciprocal basis, in the two canton by-elections to be held on 20 April.

"We have done this because election results clearly show that when an elected representative is unseated the electorate wants a kind of third round which could remedy the injustice and the distortion of universal suffrage.

"However, the other reason why we made this proposal is that these are two departments (Seine-et-Marne and Val-de-Marne) in which there is a leftwing majority which must be maintained and if possible consolidated."

PROPOSED BILL ON PRIVATE SECTOR 'UNCONSTITUTIONAL'

LD111201 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 0300 GMT 11 Apr 80 LD

[Text] The Council of the Revolution, meeting until the early hours this morning, took the view that the government-proposed and parliament-approved bill seeking changes in the legislation demarcating the public and private sectors is unconstitutional. A Council of the Revolution spokesman said the decision to consider the bill unconstitutional was reached by a large majority of the Council. The bill was also termed unconstitutional by the Constitutional Committee after examining it earlier. Article 278 of the Constitution states that the president of the republic should exercise his veto power by not promulgating or not signing a bill declared unconstitutional by the Council of the Revolution. In this case, the bill will be returned to parliament for a second vote, and compulsorily promulgated by the president of the republic only if it is approved by the two-thirds majority required on the second vote.

ABC DENIES GIBRALTARIANS HAVE RIGHT TO SELF-DETERMINATION

LD110921 Madrid ABC in Spanish 2 Apr 80 p 2 LD

[Editorial: "Spanish Demand"]

[Text] With a view to the 10 April Council of Europe session in Lisbon, the Spanish foreign minister will be talking to his British counterpart, the foreign secretary. The topic of this previously planned and agreed upon meeting will be the Gibraltar issue--and not as a result of any spontaneous offer or open amenability on Britain's part, but as a result of Marcelino Oreja's explicit request and demand.

British journalists, always so much in agreement on what they regard as their national interests and broadcasting continuously on the same wavelength as the Foreign Office, announced yesterday in both the THE GUARDIAN and TIME [presumably THE TIMES] the same observation that the Lisbon meeting between the two diplomatic chiefs would have the status or operational level of what we call "conversations," that is, preparatory verbal contacts for possible future negotiations.

Negotiation, effective and progressive dialog is what the United Nations has decided to demand from Britain several times in the past decade over the Gibraltar issue. This means negotiations with Spain, of course, and not with the Gibraltarians, who cannot claim any right to self-determination for the two following major and basic reasons: because our neighbors in the colony are not the people of Gibraltar--as Mr Yanez very clearly pointed out during his memorable and patriotic speech at the latest Congress of Deputies session--and also because, even if they were, their alleged right to self-determination would have to yield to the Spanish nation's right to territorial integrity.

We do not know in what spirit the British are approaching the coming Lisbon meeting between Lord Carrington and Marcelino Oreja. If it were up to them--so used are they to slumbering in any kind of inertia and to sticking to all traditions, whether good or bad--the British would conclude the Lisbon meeting with the umpteenth delay instead of a response to Spain's arguments. [paragraph continues]

But a very important change has taken place since Oreja met with Carrington in New York last September: In connection with the NATO member countries' shared desire that Spain join NATO, all the Spanish political forces represented in parliament have closed ranks in their political demand that Gibraltar be returned to our nation.

There is nothing that would please us or that we would welcome more than a substantial demonstration from Britain that it is willing to negotiate and resolve the Gibraltar dispute. We would be pleased at the certain hope that a centuries-old wound was about to be healed and we would welcome the implicit cooperation necessary between Spain and Britain. This cooperation is in the interests of both London and Madrid and is needed by Europe for the sake of its internal balance.

HERRI BATASUNA DISCUSSES BASQUE PARLIAMENT

LD110246 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 2000 GMT 10 Apr 80 LD

[Text] This evening the ETA's [Basque Fatherland and Liberty] political-military wing, via an FM transmission, issued a message broadcast in the region of San Sebastian in which it refers to various subjects relating to the demand for political amnesty, its refusal to accept the actions of the central government with respect to the Basque Country, and its resolve to continue on the road of armed struggle. The ETA transmission was picked up this evening in San Sebastian and its environs but the clarity of the transmission lasted for barely a minute since interference could immediately be heard on the same wave length.

The possibility that ETA's political-military wing would transmit this message in the region of Guipuzcoa was known beforehand since in this morning's press there were prior announcements giving the wave length and time when the transmission was to be made.

Meanwhile, the Herri Batasuna coalition called a press conference in San Sebastian at which this political group spoke of the reasons for its nonappearance in the Basque Parliament and in the election of the new president. The representatives of Herri Batasuna, headed by Miguel Castells, said that the Basque Nationalist Party is alone and powerless and will fail unless it adopts the political plans of Herri Batasuna and of the Basque Patriotic Coordinator [KAS] alternative [minimum demands to negotiate a ceasefire put forward by KAS], which they described as the only coherent way out for the Basque problem.

With respect to the formation of the new government headed by Carlos Garaicoechea, Herri Batasuna (?forecasts) an increase in unemployment and chaos in the near future. With regard to the remark made by President Garaicoechea that violence is responsible for the economic disaster in the region, this group recalled that, according to a study by the Bilbao Chamber of Commerce, 400,000 million pesetas would be needed to revitalize the Basque economy, whereas revolutionary taxes had not managed to divert, according to certain calculations, even 400 million pesetas in the last few months.

With regard to the recent inauguration of the Basque Parliament, Herri Batasuna said that it came into being as a complete nonentity because it was attended by a person who was not elected as a member of Parliament and on the other hand, one of those who was elected was not invited. It insisted on the fact that the Basque Parliament, for this reason, would have to be reconstituted with all of the legal requirements. However, Herri Batasuna said that it is not intending to contest the present makeup of the Basque Parliament since its concerns are not formal in character but political.

NORWAY

AMBASSADOR TO IRAN RECALLED FOR CONSULTATIONS

WA101856 London REUTER in English 1856 GMT 10 Apr 80 WA

[Text] Oslo, April 10, REUTER--Norway announced today it is recalling its ambassador to Iran in response to President Carter's appeal for support in the campaign to free the American hostages in Tehran. The ambassador is being recalled for consultations, and the move does not entail a break in diplomatic relations, Foreign Minister Knut Frydenlund said.

After discussing the Iranian situation at their regular Thursday meeting, government ministers felt it necessary to demonstrate strong support for demands that the hostages should be released, Mr Frydenlund said.

The government made a similar move last December when the ambassador to Tehran was recalled to Oslo for consultations.

"We decided on a further recall now to lend force to a renewed protest against the Iranian Government's breach of fundamental principles of international relations," Mr Frydenlund said.

The U.S. Government deserved praise for the restraint and patience it had shown over the hostage question, he added. "However, after Iranian religious leader Ayatollah Khomeyni's latest moves, such a policy no longer seems possible," the foreign minister said.

AFTENPOSTEN: WORLD CANNOT 'CLOSE ITS EYES' TO HOSTAGES' FATE

LD111009 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 9 Apr 80 p 2 LD

[Editorial: "Break With Iran"]

[Text] The whole thing might seem like a helpless gesture: Over 5 months after the political terrorists occupied the American Embassy in Tehran, President Jimmy Carter has broken off diplomatic ties with Iran, which have not existed in practice during all this time. Ayatollah Khomeyni's diplomats are now leaving the United States without any prospect at all of the almost 50 Americans in Tehran, whose diplomatic rights were trampled upon most ruthlessly, seeing their homeland again in the near future.

But it is easy to reproach the American President for having done too little too late in this inhuman hostage drama. The real problem is that the tug of war over the fate of the hostages has ceased to be a conflict solely between Washington and Khomeyni's revolutionary regime. [paragraph continues]

As developments in the last few days have clearly shown, the defenseless hostages have become a shuttlecock in the protracted showdown between the different factions in Tehran who are trying to insure power for themselves in the shadow of an ailing Khomeyni. The "holy man" himself wavers between the two groups, or rather between the remnants of reason in a chaotic land and a religious fanaticism which cannot end the chaos.

Now Khomeyni has again sided with the fanatics after having appeared for a while to support President Abolhasan Bani-Sadr who tried to find a tolerable solution to the hostage crisis. Carter had backed the Bani-Sadr line, for it represented the only logical train of thought in Tehran. The Iranian president admitted publicly that the hostage drama is a burden which his country must rid itself of without losing face--in order to be able to normalize the situation in Iran, improve Iran's standing abroad, and withstand the Soviet threat after the invasion of Afghanistan. But Khomeyni listened this time to the fanatics in the divided leadership and cast these considerations to the wind. He refused to accept the first tiny step on the road to a solution, namely, that the terrorists should hand over the hostages to the Iranian Government pending a decision on the fate of the hostages by the new national assembly in Tehran.

As unpredictable and unstable as things are in Iran, it would be too early to say that Bani-Sadr has definitely lost the battle. The internal tug of war over the hostages will undoubtedly continue. But for the unfortunate American hostages this is cold comfort and, for Carter, it is not enough to show that his patience is now exhausted. The American reprisals ought to tell the fanatics in Khomeyni's circle that the latest delay in solving the hostage problem makes Iran's international position even worse and that Bani-Sadr in other words was right.

But if the late reprisals are to have any effect, they cannot be confined only to the steps which Carter has announced now. The United States will surely have to call for support from its allies and the United Nations. And the world cannot close its eyes to the fate of the hostages, regardless of how important Iranian oil may be for some countries. For it is not only Carter and Bani-Sadr who are the losers in Iran. A defeat has also been inflicted on the United Nations, and not least of all those countries which believe that international laws and agreements mean something in our world.

SWEDEN

GOVERNMENT PAPER ON FOREIGN OCCUPATION DRAWS CRITICISM

LD091425 Stockholm SVENSKA DAGBLADET in Swedish 27 Mar 80 pp 1, 12 LD

[Ingmar Lindmarker report: "International Newsletter: Sweden Has Quisling-Government"]

[Text] The Swedish Government would submit to an occupying power. A couple of international newsletters, directed at political and military officials, make this claim.

The reports have been published in so-called confidential, English-language newsletters. It is stated that "Sweden would have a legalized 'quisling-government" in the event of occupation.

The background to this is a memorandum from the Defense Ministry in Stockholm. It explains that it is assumed that the government and Riksdag would be able to remain in occupied areas and there exercise their powers. "It is a working paper and does not represent the government's position," Under Secretary Sven Hirdman said.

At the same time, as the foreign interpretation is being categorically repudiated, there is concern and dissatisfaction within regional authorities, among others, that there are no instructions for guidance in the event of an occupation of Sweden.

"At every war game and army maneuver that I have taken part in in the last 2 decades, it has become clear that this just will not work," a top military official says. "We must quite simply draw up some rules."

The memorandum which caused the reaction in the newsletters published in London, is called "Rules for the Activities of Authorities During Occupation." It appeared in the autumn of 1978 and is intended for use in connection with training and exercises in the defense forces and to serve as a basis for the committee on international law which was appointed at that time.

"General principles of administrative law ought, however--in the absence of specific regulations--to mean that the authorities are to stay in the occupied area." The government and Riksdag are therefore assumed to be able to remain in an occupied zone and there exercise their powers subject to the limitations mentioned.

One of the newsletters which disseminates inside information about foreign countries and is directed at politicians, soldiers and shapers of public opinion, has drawn far-reaching conclusions from the Defense Ministry working paper.

By legalizing "quisling-government" the Swedes have to a very great extent improved the Soviet strategic position, the newsletter's readers are informed.

"A Soviet invasion of Sweden could be much easier politically than that in Afghanistan," the analysts write. "Traditional communist references to 'liberation' or 'requests for assistance' would seem much stronger when legally elected members of parliament stay on in 'power.'"

Within the Defense Ministry in Stockholm there is unhappiness that the memorandum was so formulated that it was open to misinterpretation abroad. It ought to have been more obvious--it is said--that the memo does not lay down any regulations and does not represent the views of the government either.

The dissatisfaction within areas of the defense forces is due precisely to the fact that there are no guidelines for how the authorities should act in the event of the occupation of Swedish territory. It is considered risky because a government faced with the threat of occupation would be forced to improvise regulations which would perhaps not extend to all parts of the country.

Until 1962 the so-called "march letter" from 1943 was still in force. It established that executive authorities faced with the imminent threat of occupation should leave the area and that authorities detained should offer resistance. In the new Constitution from 1976 all courses are left open. It does not forbid the government and Riksdag to remain in occupied areas, but it does not stipulate either that they are not to do so.

The experiences of the occupation of Denmark and Norway differ. In Norway the king and government went abroad; in Denmark the government remained in office until 1943 when the Germans completely suppressed its freedom to work.

On the one hand it is asserted that the civilian population would benefit from the fact that its legally elected and appointed authorities would remain to maintain law and order. On the other it is said that no authority which collaborates with an occupying power can retain the confidence of the people.

Swedish politicians and military officials are not in agreement on the desirability of hard and fast rules which would apply in time of occupation. Many people think that different war situations require varying solutions and that instructions prepared in advance can be to the advantage of an aggressor.

The debate on these questions has recently been made more complicated by new conventions in international law. It has even been suggested in the Defense Ministry that there should be a basic course in international law taught in grammar schools so that as many Swedes as possible know their rights and obligations in the event of occupation.

GOVERNMENT ANNOUNCES WAGE, PRICE FREEZE PROGRAM

LD091551 Stockholm DAGENS NYHETER in Swedish 28 Mar 80 p 6 LD

[Sven Svensson report: "Six-Point Program Against Stalemate"]

[Text] A price freeze, rent freeze and a general wage freeze during 1980. These are some of the measures the government wants to introduce to bring about a wage settlement for the labor market which will not lead to high inflation. The measures will be supplemented by a special tax reduction of 500 kronor for people with low incomes, food subsidies and a freeze on state and municipal price increases.

If the parties from both sides of the labor market do not reach a wage settlement for 1980 that is broadly similar to past settlements, the government's program will be dropped.

The program had been worked out in great haste and was finally fixed on Thursday afternoon. It was introduced later at a press conference in which the three party leaders--Thorbjorn Falldin, Gosta Bohman and Ola Ullsten--took part. The details of the package are not yet clear.

The government has been in contact with Gunnar Nilsson of LO [Swedish Trade Union Organization] and Ingvar Seregad of PTK (the negotiation cartel for salaried employees in the private business sector) and with Social Democratic Party leader Olof Palme to sound out reactions to the program.

Neither the trade unions nor the Social Democratic opposition have made any promises to support the program. According to government sources, the trade unions have expressed appreciation of the program in private, but in public they have been critical.

International developments have altered prospects for Swedish economic growth during 1980, the government stressed. Large oil price rises will lead to an increased rate of inflation.

A large budget deficit and an imbalance in many countries' foreign trade also mean that interest rates are being forced up, and this in turn slows down the rate of investment and increases unemployment.

The rearrangement of the tax system at the end of last year and the investment in municipal authorities seem insufficient if we are to reach an agreement on wages within the framework of the economic balance in the community.

The government is therefore introducing the six-point program in order to facilitate the arrival at a satisfactory wage settlement. The points add up to a total program.

The main point is that there should be a freeze on wage increases during 1980. Wages were calculated to rise by about 7 percent in 1979 and 1980. This percentage has already been swallowed by wage drift and increased social contributions.

Further wage increases cannot be accepted, otherwise, this would lead to inflation. At the same time it is estimated that prices, even after the government's proposed measures to facilitate agreement on a wage settlement, will rise by at least 6 percent in 1980. These price rises will therefore be compensated for by tax relief. [paragraph continues]

The proposals for tax reductions that have been made together with unchanged wage rates would mean a real wage decrease for employees during 1980.

In addition to the rearrangement of the tax system which the Riksdag has already approved, the government proposes a tax reduction of 500 kronor for employees with low incomes. A tax reduction of 320 kronor has already been awarded to all earners for 1980. The government proposes that this reduction be increased by 500 kronor in the income bracket 40,000-80,000 kronor. This extra tax reduction involves a revenue loss of 900 million kronor to the state.

A general price freeze has already been introduced--beginning Thursday, that is, yesterday--and it will be in force until 9 May and then be extended to the end of 1980. It is not clear how effective the price freeze will be. Large increases in the cost of imported goods must sooner or later make themselves felt even in the level of prices in Sweden. This applies to price increases for oil, petrol, and coffee, for example. The government will then be forced to make an exception to the price freeze and approve increases.

One of the points on the government's program means that increases in state charges will be prevented. The government has already agreed to an increase in postal charges. It will have to rescind this decision. The government assumes that municipal activities will not increase those charges which are not covered by the general price freeze.

Rents are not included in the general price freeze. The government will propose to the Riksdag a law for a general ban on rent increases. It is still unclear from what point in time a rent freeze will take effect.

Rents are to be increased in many buildings from 1 April. It is conceivable that the rent freeze will take effect from this date. At any rate, the law on a rent freeze would be implemented before the end of June. Normally rents are also increased on 1 October. But it is not clear whether the fuel clauses will be affected by the rent freeze. If there are further hefty oil price rises then these price rises must sooner or later be reflected in rents.

Food prices are raised every 6 months according to current agreements. The increases are due to increased costs in agricultural production. The government has now decided to subsidize food costs so that the increases amounting to 600 million kronor which will take effect in July this year will not be passed on to the general public.

Through the general price freeze, food prices will remain in principle the same throughout 1980. There may be exceptions for imported food products.

The government is further prepared to bind companies to allocate 25 percent of profits above a certain level to a special investment fund. The government has yet to decide how calculations of profit levels are to be carried out.

ROLANDHIS SAYS WALDHEIM TALKS NOT 'OUTSIDE GOVERNMENT LINE'

NC101803 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1630 GMT 10 Apr 80 NC

[Text] Foreign Minister Rolandhis, referring to a comment in the Cyprus press implying that he had acted outside the government line when he discussed various proposals with UN Secretary General Waldheim on 4 and 7 February, stated that what he said to Mr Waldheim was conveyed on the orders of the president of the republic. The proposals to Mr Waldheim, he added, do not vary from the government's declared line nor do they constitute a splitting of the Cyprus issue. He said: It is also untrue that I discussed the Cyprus issue in substance because no substantive issues, such as the constitutional and territorial issues, had been brought up.

ROLANDHIS REFUTES OPPOSITION LEADER'S CHARGES

NC110716 Nicosia CYPRUS MAIL in English 11 Apr 80 pp 1, 4 NC

[Excerpts] There were angry exchanges between Foreign Minister Nikos Rolandhis--now in Lisbon for the European foreign ministers conference--and opposition [Democratic] Rally Party leader Glavkos Kliridhis yesterday.

Mr Rolandhis accused Mr Kliridhis of indulging in 'Goebbels-style propaganda' and told him that the government has the mandate of the people for a full term of office which has still 3 years to run whilst Kliridhis repeated his charges of ineptitude and demanded the resignation of what he called the 'minority government'.

The foreign minister was replying to a statement from Kliridhis 2 days ago in which he said that Rolandhis had made a mess of things.

But, Mr Rolandhis said, he was not asking for a 'certificate of worthiness' from Mr Kliridhis and reminded him that while he was in charge of affairs for several years and without the presence of Turkish troops he had achieved nothing with his handlings.

Mr Rolandhis said that when he took over the Foreign Ministry two years ago he was aware of the host of ideas of the various parties about the national problem, with each one considering as 'treasonous' whatever the other considered as fair and reasonable.

'In this climate I tried to do my job guided by a sense of responsibility towards my country alone. I have now tried to trace any targets alien to the national orientations. I have remained loyal to the mandate of the president and of the government', Rolandhis said.

The foreign minister bitterly remarked that he expected to be attacked but he did not expect 'mud of the quality which Mr Kliridhis disposes.'

He further accused Mr Kliridhis of attempting to abolish the country's institutions and of "disregarding the vote of the people, the validity of which remains effective for the next three years."

He concluded by telling Mr Kliridhis that if he considers him as "inefficient" he could chase him out only when he becomes a president by the vote of the people and not by dint of his own imagination.

Earlier, Mr Rolandhis issued an interim statement in which he described the statement against him as "part of a well-planned and shameful campaign of the extreme right for abolition of democracy and its institutions through the method of outrageous propaganda".

Mr Kliridhis, on his part, replying to the interim statement of Mr Rolandhis, denied charges that he was trying to abolish democracy. On the contrary, he said, he was trying to restore democracy.

The acuteness of his attacks on the government was commensurate with the magnitude of the mistakes and was in line with the principle of democracy about the role of the opposition which is to criticise and not to keep silent.

He said that 2 years ago Mr Rolandhis was together with President Kiprianou claiming that the Cyprus problem was 'gaining ground' and that there was 'mobility' but it is now proved that there has been no gain of ground or mobility but only stagnation.

Mr Kliridhis also reminded Mr Rolandhis and the government that they were presenting the UN General Assembly resolution containing provision for Cyprus as a major success whereas they are now climbing down.

Mr Kliridhis also described as 'fruitless' the most recent tour of Mr Rolandhis and President Kiprianou to London, Paris and Rome and again criticised them for rejecting the American plan.

KLIRIDHIS, CAGATAY HOLD SECOND MEETING

NC111120 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1030 GMT 11 Apr 80 NC

[Text] Democratic Rally [DISY] Party Chairman Kliridhis and Cagatay, chairman of the Turkish Cypriot National Unity Party, held their second meeting today at the DISY offices in Nicosia. Kliridhis and Cagatay made statements to journalists before the meeting. Kliridhis said the main endeavor of these meetings is to establish contact among the political leaders of the two communities so that a better spirit of understanding may be created between them. Kliridhis also said that during his meeting with Mr Cagatay today he will discuss, among other things, practical ways of expanding the contacts.

In answer to a question whether he would also meet with the leaders of other Greek Cypriot parties, Mr Cagatay said this would depend on whether the other party leaders would welcome such meetings. He added: We may possibly come into contact with them and, if they express such a desire, we will brief the party leaders of the other side so that they may agree on the necessary arrangements.

Joint Statement Issued

NC111122 Nicosia Domestic Service in English 1100 GMT 11 Apr 80 NC

[Text] The leader of the Democratic Rally, Mr Kliridhis, and the chairman of the Turkish Cypriot National Unity Party, Mr Cagatay, had their second meeting in Nicosia this morning.

A joint statement says the meeting was held in a friendly and constructive atmosphere. The two men reiterated their parties' firm conviction that a just and viable solution of the Cyprus problem is urgently needed on the basis of the Makarios-Denktas agreement of February 1977. Both expressed their agreement with the recent statement of the UN secretary general, Mr Waldheim, that the intercommunal talks, if properly used, represent the best available method for negotiating a just and lasting political settlement of the Cyprus problem. They also expressed the view that the resumption of the intercommunal talks was possible and desirable. They believe that statements jeopardizing the commencement of negotiations should be avoided and that every assistance should be given to the secretary general in his efforts.

The two party leaders agreed that they should continue their contacts and that they should try to ascertain whether such contacts could be extended to include other party leaders. The statement says Mr Kliridhis asked Mr Cagatay whether he could visit the Greek Cypriots in the Karpas area and Mr Cagatay agreed in principle.

Bayrak Radio Report

TA111216 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1030 GMT 11 Apr 80 TA

[Text] National Unity Party leader and Prime Minister Mustafa Cagatay and Greek Cypriot Democratic Rally Party leader Glafkos Kliridhis met again today. The meeting, which was held at the Democratic Rally party headquarters in the Greek Cypriot sector of Lefkosa [Nicosia] began at 1000.

Cagatay was received at the Ledra Palace barricade by a Democratic Rally spokesman as he was crossing over to the Greek Cypriot Sector on his way to the meeting. Cagatay was accompanied to the meeting place by the party spokesman and greeted there by Kliridhis.

Cagatay and Kliridhis replied to journalists' questions before the meeting. According to the ANATOLIA NEWS AGENCY, in reply to a question whether other party leaders would also be given the opportunity to hold meetings, Cagatay said that he would consider the question if a request is made to him as the prime minister. Cagatay and Kliridhis expressed the belief that such contacts would contribute to detente and rapprochement between the two communities.

In reply to a question wehther Kliridhis would go to the Karpas [Karpasha] region together with Cagatay and visit the Greek Cypriots in that region, Kliridhis said that he did not discuss such a thing with Cagatay and that these reports were mere rumors.

The meeting between Cagatay and Kliridhis ended at 1300. In the joint communique issued at the end of the meeting, it was noted that the meeting was held in a favorable atmosphere. The communique stressed again the two party leaders' views that a just and valid solution, based on the Denktas-Makarios agreement, should be found to the Cyprus problem in the near future. The two leaders expressed agreement with UN Secretary General Kurt Waldheim's view that the intercommunal talks constitute the most valid means for a just and lasting solution to the problem of Cyprus. Catagay and Kliridhis noted that the resumption of the intercommunal talks is both possible and desirable. The leaders expressed the view that both sides should refrain from statements or announcements which could hinder the resumption of the intercommunal talks and should assist the UN Secretary general in every way in his efforts to insure the resumption of the talks.

Cagatay and Kliridhis also agreed to continue with their meetings and to investigate whether it is possible to include other party leaders in their contacts. The communique also noted that Kliridhis expressed the wish to visit the Karpas area and that the request was accepted on principle by Cagatay.

Cagatay and Kliridhis are now dining together at the Hilton Hotel in Lefkosa [Nicosia].

FURTHER REPORTAGE ON U.S. SENATORS' MEETING WITH OFFICIALS

Details of PASOK Meeting

AT101500 Athens ELEVTHEROTIPIA in Greek 10 Apr 80 pp 1, 13 AT [Excerpts] Andreas Papandreou, leader of the majority opposition party, explained PASOK's unshaken position on the immediate withdrawal of Greece from NATO and on the closing of U.S. bases to the U.S. senators who visited him this morning at Kastri.

Papandreou explained this will be the policy to be implemented by PASOK when it takes over the country's administration. He did not exclude the possibility that Prime Minister K. Karamanlis will also decide to withdraw from NATO.

According to reports, Karamanlis yesterday spoke forthrightly to the U.S. senators and explained the basis for the government's demands:

--The Haig-Davos agreement as the only basis for the country's return to NATO. In answer to an observation from the senators that Demirel and Ecevit publicly expressed their desire for Greece's reattachment to NATO's military wing, Karamanlis countered by saying that all they have to do--if they so wish--is to erase Turkish objections to the Haig-Davos agreement.

--The preservation of the balance of power in the Aegean, which is in danger of being disturbed by the generous inroads of military materiel into Turkey--either openly or secretly.

During today's meeting at Kastri there was no point of dispute between the PASOK delegation and the U.S. senators. According to reports, Papandreou briefly recounted the role and responsibility of the United States for the 7-year dictatorship, for the Cyprus tragedy and the Aegean issue and stressed that the disturbance of the balance of power in the area is primarily the work of America.

Papandreou explained to the U.S. senators PASOK's positions on these important issues which will apply when the time comes for PASOK to deal with them in a governmental capacity. At that time, Papandreou stated, the main line of our course will be to strengthen national independence, implement a nonalined foreign policy and place Greece within the sphere of the nonalined.

The PASOK chairman stressed the movement's resolve to pursue the full withdrawal of Greece from NATO--a thing which quite possibly will be undertaken by the current Karamanlis government particularly if there is no success in the base negotiations, the continuation of which, as it is well known, the government links to the NATO issue.

In conclusion Papandreou also referred to the Cyprus issue and stressed the obligation of Greece to support the struggle of the people of Cyprus with actions.

The PASOK delegation was made up of the members of the Movement's Executive Bureau: I. Kharalambopoulos, P. Moralis, A. Khristodhoulidhis and K. Papoulias. The U.S. senators were accompanied by U.S. Ambassador McCloskey.

The Kastri meeting took place at 0800 today. Immediately afterwards the U.S. senators visited Foreign Minister Rallis who gave a luncheon in their honor yesterday.

Papandreou, Senators' Remarks

AT101644 Athens Armed Forces Television Service in Greek 1500 GMT 10 Apr 80 AT

[Excerpt] Answering a journalist's question on their meeting with the leader of the majority opposition, the U.S. senators said they had a polite discussion with him on issues of interest to the United States and Greece as well as on Greek-Turkish differences and added that the chairman of PASOK did not question the usefulness of their visit. After the meeting Papandreou stated that both he and his aides clearly explained to the U.S. senators the positions of PASOK on the Cyprus issue, the issues regarding the Aegean, NATO, the U.S. bases in Greece and the question of Turkish armaments.

We explained to the U.S. senators, Papandreou said, the well- known positions of PASOK on these issues. On the Cyprus issue Papandreou said that Turkey, a NATO member, invaded Cyprus, an independent country and a member of the United Nations, with the support of the Atlantic alliance. For PASOK, he stressed, the Cyprus issue is neither a Greek nor a Turkish problem. The problem is that an independent country was invaded and 40 percent of its territory was occupied. For it is essential to have a strong and permanent solution. Foreign troops and bases must be withdrawn from the island. Within UN limits there must be dialog between the two communities without foreign interventions.

TA NEA Summary

AT101600 Athens TA NEA in Greek 10 Apr 80 pp 1, 11 AT

[Excerpt] The Americans are exerting coordinated pressure in support of Turkey and against Iran from the direction of Greece both here in Athens and in Washington, where Greek Ambassador Tzounis was called to the State Department for a "briefing" on the U.S. request to its allies to "aline" their policy to Washington's "line" against Iran.

In Athens the U.S. senators, who conferred with Karamanlis yesterday--and departed shortly after noon today--limited themselves to taking note of the positions explained by the Greek prime minister.

There are reports, however, that during their last meeting with Foreign Minister Rallis shortly before noon, they exerted pressure (in the form of...wishes) for acceptance of the U.S. positions both on issues related to pending Greek-U.S. affairs--bases and reattachment--as well as on U.S. demands for alinement to the Carter line on reprisals against Iran which includes a naval blockade of the Iranian shores by laying mines.

At 0800, prior to the meeting with Rallis, the U.S. senators and U.S. Ambassador McCloskey visited Kastri, where they encountered "hard questions" from the leader of the majority opposition party Andreas Papandreou on the U.S. role in Greece and in the general area.

The Government

In the meantime, the official Greek side avoided giving any specific information on the views expressed by the U.S. senators to the prime minister on the urgent issues discussed yesterday at the political office. As reported, however, Karamanlis made it clear that "the Greek positions on whatever affects the problem of Greece's reattachment to NATO's military wing are unyielding and in no way will there be any discussion on a plan which might touch upon national sovereign rights."

Seek the solution to the problem on the other side, Karamanlis told the U.S. senators.

The Haig Plan

Karamanlis explained the well-known Greek positions stressing that the basic reason for the lack of a solution to Greek-Turkish problems lies in Ankara's intransigence and in the absence of a strong Turkish Government able to negotiate with the Greek Government.

On the question of Greece's return to NATO's military wing he said that this is an issue for discussion only between Greece and the alliance and it must not be confused with Greek-Turkish differences. For Greece the original Davos-Haig plan remains the only basis for discussion and the Greek side now expects an initiative from NATO.

Yesterday afternoon U.S. senators met with National Defense Minister Averof at the Pentagon and primarily discussed with him the issue of U.S. bases in Greece.

A. Papandreou

Hard questions on the U.S. role in Greece and more generally in the area were placed this morning by majority opposition leader A. Papandreou before the U.S. senators who visited him at Kastri.

As reported, Papandreou stressed to his interlocutors that the economic and military strengthening of Turkey leads to the illogical situation where Greece is being threatened by an "allied" country with the support of the United States.

He also stressed that the participation of Greece within NATO can only be achieved through blackmail.

At the same time, Papandreou had an opportunity to explain to the U.S. senators PASOK's positions on a nonalined foreign policy which will be implemented when, with the support of the people's vote, it takes over the government.

Its positions are summarized as follows:

--A nonalined area is PASOK's goal. This presupposes a withdrawal of Greece from NATO as well as the closing of foreign bases.

--Defense of Greek frontiers in the Aegean with everything that is at the disposal of Greece.

--Unstinted support for the struggle of the Cypriots against the Turkish occupation and against the presence of foreign troops in Cyprus.

According to Papandreou's position it is within these limits that relations between Greece and the United States will be established, given the fact that constructive dialog cannot exist if one country speaks from the position of a satellite.

The only prospect for the development of good relations with the United States as well as with the Soviet Union is that "the Greek people will be masters of their own country," as stressed by the chairman of PASOK.

TAKHIDHROMOS POLLS POPULARITY OF KARAMANLIS, PASOK, NATO

AT101415 [Editorial Report AT] The weekly magazine TAKHIDHROMOS in its last three issues, on 10 April, 3 April and 27 March, conducted a poll.

The poll was conducted "during February and March among 1,700 Greek men and women over 20 years of age on a 50-20 ratio, from 10 Greek cities (Athens, Thessaloniki, Patrai, Volos, Larissa, Iraklion, Kavalla, Ioannina, Lamia and Tripolis) which represent 47 percent of the Greek population."

The 10 April issue of the TAKHIDHROMOS poll on the people's opinion of NATO is "dedicated to the U.S. senators who passed through Greece so that they could understand the position of Greek-U.S. relations. The results of the poll reveal the feelings of the Greek people toward the ally across the Atlantic considering its position toward the 7-year tyranny, the invasion of Cyprus and its overt pro-Turkish positions." This poll included two questions, and the following answers:

"Question: As things are developing internationally, do you believe we are proceeding toward a world war? Answer: Yes--43 percent of which 39 percent were men and 48 percent women. No--42 percent of which 49 percent were men and 34 percent women. Do not know--15 percent of which 12 percent were men and 18 percent women.

No answer--27 percent of which 21 percent were men and 35 percent women."

The TAKHIDHROMOS poll published on 3 April on PASOK's popularity also included the following two questions and answers:

"Question: If elections were to be held today which party would you predict would lead--New Democracy or PASOK? Answer: New Democracy--27 percent; PASOK--44 percent; do not know--29 percent.

"Question: [addressed to members of various parties] If elections were to be held today would you forecast that New Democracy or PASOK would lead? PASOK would lead--from New Democracy, 14 percent; from PASOK, 86 percent; others, 37 percent. Do not know--from New Democracy, 17 percent; from PASOK, 7 percent; others, 43 percent."

The TAKHIDHROMOS poll on Karamanlis popularity, published on 27 March included two questions and answers:

"Question: The term of office of the current president of the republic, Konstandinos Tsatsos, comes to an end in July. If the current prime minister, Konstandinos Karamanlis runs for the office of president of the republic and if you had the right to vote, would you vote for him? Answer: Yes--51 percent of which 45 percent were men and 57 percent women. No--33 percent of which 43 percent were men and 27 percent women. No answer--14 percent of which 12 percent were men and 16 percent were women.

"Question: [addressed to members of various parties] The term of office of the current president of the Republic, Konstandinos Tsatsos, ends in July. If the current prime minister, Konstandinos Karamanlis, runs for the office of president of the republic and if you had the right to vote, would you vote for him? OFFICIALS COMMENT ON IRANIAN SITUATION, U.S. SANCTIONS

Demirel Statement

TA111024 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 11 Apr 80 TA

[Text] Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel has said that the deterioration of relations between Iraq and Iran and the sanctions imposed on Iran by the United States because of the hostage issue have created a grave situation in the region. Demirel noted that Turkey is always in favor of peace, friendship, fraternity, neighborliness and justice and will continue to hold this attitude.

Acting President Ihsan Sabri Caglayangil received Demirel at the Cankaya Mansion at 1100 for their weekly meeting. The Caglayangil-Demirel meeting lasted over 1 hour. In a statement upon emerging from the Cankaya Mansion at the end of the meeting, Demirel noted that continuity of the state is essential and that the state will continue to function regardless of the circumstances. Pointing out that the founders of the Constitution and the laws did not envisage a void in any state office, Demirel explained that Senate President Caglayangil assumed the duty of acting president upon the termination of Koruturk's term of office. Noting that an acting president possesses all the authority of an actual president, Demirel said that this should not be interpreted as a reason for delaying the election of a president or for electing a president as soon as possible, regardless of who it is.

Legislators' Comments

TA101547 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1445 GMT 10 Apr 80 TA

[Text] Ankara 10 Apr (AA)--Members of parliament have voiced concern over the possible consequences of latest developments in the Middle East particularly the question of the American hostages in Iran and the border incidents between Iran and Iraq. Several MP's made the following comments to the ANATOLIA parliamentary correspondent.

Senator Toker

Senator from the President's Quota Metin Toker said there were three possible consequences following the new "escalation" triggered by the recent decision of the U.S. administration and one of the three possibilities was a third world war. Toker noted the United States could not be expected to remain "disinterested forever" with regard to the hostages, particularly on the eve of a presidential election. He believed Turkey should follow developments "with care and calm."

Deputy Ulman

RPP Deputy Professor Haluk Ulman (Istanbul) believed the economic sanctions proposed by the U.S. would not be very effective as long as Western Europe did not go along with them, and the countries of Western Europe would think twice before going along because they meet a major part of their petroleum needs from Iran. Ulman predicted U.S. President Jimmy Carter would have to take an ever tougher stand as the election nears when he finds his recent measures have not been effective. Thus more confusion must be expected in the Middle East. It was "unfortunate", Ulman commented, that Turkey was so busy with domestic political bickering and unable to elect even her new president, at this time.

Chairman of Foreign Affairs Committee

Chairman of the National Assembly Foreign Affairs Committee Ilhan Ersoy (JP, Kutahya) hoped problems between Iran and the United States, respectively a neighbor and ally of Turkey, could be solved without hurting regional or world peace. "We have ties of friendship with the United States," he commented, "but our friendship with Iran goes back much further into history."

NSP Spokesman

National Salvation Party (NSP] Spokesman Sener Battal said it would be highly appropriate and useful for Turkey to conduct an open "campaign of fraternal solidarity" toward Iran at this time. He charged the United States with attempting to use cold war methods "bordering on hot war" toward Iran. [Words indistinct] Iran against the possibility of an embargo or other sanctions, he suggested, commenting, "if we prove to be a friend in need, we might be able to obtain our oil supplies from neighboring countries instead of mortgaging ourselves to the IMF, OECD, EEC and the United States."

NSP Deputy Chairman

National Salvation Party's [NSP] Deputy Chairman Agah Oktay Guner noted the United States and the Soviet Union were in a "tough competition" over Middle Eastern geography and that Soviet occupation of Afghanistan had hurt U.S. prestige. President Carter wanted to make up for that loss, he believed. He did not believe the West would support the United States wholeheartedly. He wanted Turkey to be strong against the possibility that the real lines of the "secret plans" between the United States and the Soviet Union for "partitioning the world" might come to the surface. Being strong for Turkey meant having political stability at home Guner commented, otherwise the first victim of the "dangerous shifts" that may arise from a combination of external and internal factors would be the "irresponsible politicians."

VOTCP LINKS U.S. SENATORS' VISIT TO IRAN CRISIS

TA110956 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 11 Apr 80 TA

[Unattributed commentary: "The Middle East and Turkey"]

[Text] By severing its political relations with Iran, the Carter administration has taken another step toward war. War Minister [as heard] Brown said that all means have been tried except for military intervention and added that the Pentagon is currently dealing with this issue. U.S. imperialism is now considering attacking Iran. All military initiatives in the Persian Gulf and the Indian Ocean regions are directed toward this end. The U.S. Senators, who talked with officers on the U.S. aircraft carriers in the Gulf of Oman before they arrived in Turkey, pointed out that the pilots are ready to bomb the rich Iranian oil resources and are waiting for orders from Washington.

The U.S. Government is using the issue of the U.S. hostages in Iran as an excuse for its military preparations in a bid to transform the Middle East into a new trouble spot. However, it is clear to the whole world that the main issue is not the U.S. hostages but the Islamic Revolution in Iran. The aim is to intervene in the Iranian people's new course and to bring them back to the bondage of the imperialist exploitation. The United States covets Iran's and the Middle East's rich oil resources. That is why the Carter administration has declared the Near and Middle East regions to be vital to the U.S. national interests.

The United States--the main boss of NATO--is calling for support from its allies in its Iranian adventure in a bid to strengthen its positions in the Middle East. To this end it is exerting pressure on the NATO member countries. The FRG and Britain--NATO's ruling forces--are openly declaring that they are going to support the United States in this adventure. A statement at NATO headquarters says that NATO is going to play a more active role in U.S. Middle East policies. This means that NATO will be involved in aggression against Iran. The imperialist ideologists try to spread the demagogy that NATO is a defensive organization. Yet NATO's stand toward Iran has once more refuted this claim, showing to the world that NATO is nothing but an aggressive organization which defends imperialist interests.

The Carter administration is trying to involve Turkey in its adventures against our neighbor Iran and to transform our country into its bridgehead and outpost in the Middle East. As pointed out in a statement by the Turkish Communist Party [TCP] Central Committee, dated 31 March, the Turkish-U.S. slavery agreement signed in Ankara provides Washington with this possibility. Earlier, the U.S. Government declared that it would use our soil as supply center in an eventual aggression against Iran.

It is in this light that the visit by five U.S. senators to Ankara should be assessed. The U.S. senators, who are in Ankara to find out what the Turkish reaction will be in the event of a U.S. aggressive act against Iran, have freely talked about Turkey's geopolitical situation, the Soviet threat and Iran--demagogies and lies used in an effort to drag Turkey into the anti-Soviet campaign and into its Iranian adventure. During their talks with Demirel, generals and the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Sitki Yircali, the U.S. senators dwelt on these subjects.

In reply to questions by journalists, Demirel said that his government supported a strong NATO. In an effort to portray the bilateral slavery agreement as beneficial for Turkey, Demirel said: As we are defending Turkey, we are also preserving the interests of our allies. We shall continue to perform this task. This statement can only be interpreted as support for the Carter doctrine, which envisages a return to the cold war days and stepping up the arms race. This statement is additional proof that the Demirel government is in favor of NATO plans to transform Europe into a nuclear arms arsenal. This statement further proves that Demirel's government is ready to drag Turkey into adventures for the sake of imperialist interests in the Middle East.

As pointed out by the 51 patriotic RPP deputies, who stated that they are going to oppose passage of the bilateral slavery agreement, U.S. imperialism should be prevented from (?taking advantage) of Turkey in a war to be initiated by imperialists in a bid to defend their Middle East interests. Our people are opposed to all imperialist efforts aimed at creating new trouble spots in our region, at stepping up the arms race, at threatening the fundamental rights of the regional peoples and their security and at endangering world peace. Our people are also against the aggressive and adventurous NATO, the imperialist policies directed against our neighbor Iran, and the use of our country as a tool in these adventurous steps by Washington.

These demands and wishes of the Turkish working class and of our toiling people were voiced in a forum held in Istanbul by the peace-loving forces between 3 and 5 April. Resolutions passed by this forum pointed to imperialist efforts to involve our country in its policies of military expansion and of consolidated its sovereignty under the guise of modernization and under the lie of the Soviet threat and said that the Turkish peace forces would wage a definite struggle against U.S. efforts to establish new bases and new military pacts in our region and to drag Turkey into these acts and adventures.

Concrete resolutions reached at the fourth annual congress of FIDEF [Federation of West German Worker Associations] held in Frankfurt on 4 April prove that the Turkish workers employed abroad--who are actively supporting democratic forces in our country--will further intensify their struggle for a global and regional lasting peace. The TCP wholeheartedly supports the struggle of the peace forces against the Iranian adventure and increasing imperialist and NATO pressures on our country.

IMF DELEGATION ARRIVES IN ANKARA FOR OFFICIAL TALKS

TA091533 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 9 Apr 80 TA

[Text] An IMF delegation headed by Turkish desk chief Charles Woodward arrived in Ankara at 1730 to hold talks. In a statement at Ankara's Esenboga Airport, Woodward said that during his stay in Ankara he will exchange information on economic issues with the Finance Ministry, the State Planning Organization and Turkish Central Bank officials. In reply to a question, Woodward noted that the claims that the IMF wants the wages in Turkey to be frozen are incorrect. Woodward added that the duration and conditions of the new stand-by agreement to be signed between Turkey and the IMF will be determined at the end of the talks.

PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION AGAIN FAILS TO YIELD RESULTS

25th, 26th, 27th Rounds

[Text] Three rounds of voting for a president during today's joint session of the Senate and National Assembly again failed to yield any results. Justice Party Senate Group leader Cahit Dalokay and National Assembly deputy leaders Oguz Aydin and Giyasettin Karaca submitted a bill nominating Justice Party Istanbul Deputy Sadettin Bilgic. National Salvation Party Senator from Erzurum Lutfi Dogan withdrew his candidacy.

During the 25th round, in which 581 legislators participated, Bilgic received 183 votes, non-candidate RPP Senator from the Presidential Quota Group Muhsin Batur received 76 votes, another 70 votes were cast for various non-candidate members of the Grand National Assembly, 234 ballots were blank and 9 votes were declared void. Five hundred and four legislators participated in the 26th round. During this round Bilgic received 193 votes, Batur received 106 votes, 50 votes were cast for various other members, 144 votes were blank and 2 votes were declared void. The ballots from the 27th round were not counted as there was no quorum.

The voting for a president will be continued during tomorrow's joint session of the Senate and National Assembly. Justice Party Leader and Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel replied to journalists' questions on the results of the voting at the end of the 25th and 26th rounds. Demirel said: The will of the Grand National Assembly will determine the result. We are acting in sincerity and in a serious manner and we will continue to attempt to reach a consensus.

KREISKY ON TIES WITH NONALINED COUNTRIES, AFGHANISTAN

AU111211 Vienna Domestic Television Service in German 1730 GMT 10 Apr 80 AU

[Guenter Schmidt interview with Chancellor Bruno Kreisky after his return from Yugoslavia; date, place not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] Mr Chancellor, you have repeatedly declared that the Afghanistan problem, the solving of that crisis, is primarily a matter for the nonalined countries. Have any new developments arisen during your visit to Yugoslavia?

[Answer] No, I gained the impression that this line is correct, that now, in this first phase, it is primarily up to the nonalined countries to look after their member, so to speak, Afghanistan. This is a problem for all of us, but in view of the close relationship that exists between the nonalined countries and the Soviet Union, an attempt should now be made from that side.

[Question] This close relationship actually exists primarily between the Soviet Union and the current [nonalined] chairman, Cuba. Have you had any contacts with Cuba that cause you to be optimistic? Can you make any remarks in this regard?

[Answer] Well, I would say that a certain close relationship [with the USSR] exists on the part of nearly all neutralist countries--actually, we regard ourselves as neutral and the others, that is, the nonalined countries, as neutralist--and Cuba, of course, has a special relationship. I believe that Cuba is aware of that responsibility--that is my impression.

[Question] Mr Chancellor, how do you assess the current situation within the nonalined movement? There have been rather severe differences of opinion between Yugoslavia and Cuba lately. Have these problems been overcome, or are they continuing?

[Answer] I believe that there are actually considerable tensions within the nonalined camp. Then, of course, there no longer is the strong dominance of the great men such as Nehru, An-Nasir, and Tito, too. In that respect, everything has changed. But the nonalined countries exist, they are an institution in world politics, and now they should live up to their task.

[Question] Mr Chancellor, how do you envisage the future Austrian relationship with the nonalined countries? Will there be closer cooperation, or will the present level of cooperation be maintained?

[Answer] I think there is no reason at all for us to alter our relationship, our relations. We are not a member of this group. We are interested in what is happening there. We always dispatch a kind of observer, a guest, to such conferences and we keep track of things--and there really should not be any more than that.

Support for Cuban Initiative

AU111212 Vienna WIENER ZEITUNG in German 11 Apr 80 p 1 AU

[Unattributed report on Kreisky's return from Belgrade and on his 10 April press conference in Belgrade]

[Excerpts] At Dr Kreisky's Belgrade press conference the Middle East problem, the Afghanistan crisis, the Madrid CSCE follow-up conference, the new world economic system, the disarmament problem, and aid for Nicaragua were in the foreground. [paragraph continues]

In Kreisky's opinion the key for solving the Afghanistan crisis is in the hands of the nonalined countries in general and in the hands of Cuba--which is current chairman of the Coordinating Committee of this organization--in particular. In view of its close relationship with the Soviet Union, Havana would be best qualified to sound out whether there are any possibilities of compromise. Kreisky does not regard Cuba's position as leader of the pro-Soviet group among the nonalined countries as an obstacle, provided that Cuba, too, regards the Afghan operation as a strain on world politics.

Cuba is far away from the theater of these events but, at the same time, it is interested "that tensions in the world do not increase."

In reply to a question the chancellor confirmed that this impression is also shared by Nationalrat Deputy Heinz Fischer, who has just returned to Vienna from Havana.

VOLKSSTIMME: TANKS, AMMUNITION SOLD TO LATIN AMERICANS

AU111730 Vienna VOLKSSTIMME in German 11 Apr 80 p 1 AU

[Unattributed report: "Austrian Ammunition for El Salvador's Junta?"]

[Text] Vienna--Austrian arms exports are going to more and more countries: As VOLKSSTIMME has now learned, even the El Salvador regime is being supplied with Austrian ammunition. Thus 32,000 kilds of ammunition for the Salvadoran war ministry were declared as "sports ammunition"--some circles obviously regard it as a "sport" when a people is subjected to bloody oppression.... Meanwhile, another superdeal involving the Steyr Company has become known: 50 Steyr "Cuirassier" tanks are to be sold to the Argentinian military junta.

The shipment that went to El Salvador a few weeks ago contained 2 million rounds of submachinegun ammunition. The 800 cases of ammunition were dispatched from Vienna's northwestern railroad station for Hamburg. There they were transferred a few days later to a ship bound for Puerto de Acajutla in El Salvador. Officially the receiver of the ammunition shipment is the El Salvador Defense Ministry. Nevertheless the shipment was described as "sports ammunition," obviously to dodge the export permit procedure required under the "law on exportation of war materiel" (and the pertinent implementing ordinance). Although most shipments of that kind are approved, such approval has to be endorsed by the interior, foreign and defense ministries as well as by the Chancellory. Only an export license from the Trade Ministry is required for "sports ammunition."

The ammunition shipment to El Salvador probably does not formally constitute a violation of neutrality because the Latin American country is not at war with any other state--only with its own people. Moreover, it is undoubtedly harmful to Austria's prestige in the world if despotic regimes such as that in El Salvador are supplied war materiel, quite apart from the human rights aspect that is so often especially stressed by Chancellor Kreisky.

Tanks for Argentina

Similar international law aspects apply to the more or less cut and dried deal of the Steyr works with the Argentinian regime, providing for delivery to Argentina of 50 Cuirassier tanks representing a total value of 750 million schillings. Some time ago, Steyr concluded an 800 million schilling tank deal with Bolivia, and negotiations with Uruguay are currently pending. The arms deals with Latin American dictatorships are dangerous even from a business point of view, because they are shortsighted: In the event of political changes in those countries, Austria may well experience difficulties in trade as a result of such contracts.

FRG TO RECOMMEND BOYCOTT TO OLYMPIC COMMITTEE

[Text] Bonn--The Federal Government will, with a fair degree of certainty, recommend to the National Olympic Committee of the Federal Republic to decide, like its American sister organization, against taking part in the summer Olympics in Moscow. Hans-Dietrich Genscher, FDP chairman and federal foreign minister, made this clear today in Bonn. According to a statement by FDP Spokesman Josef Gerwald, Genscher told his party's presidium that no one could be in doubt about the content of the government recommendation to the German National Olympic Committee (NOC), which intends making its decision on 15 May, as participation in the summer Olympics in Moscow was inappropriate as long as the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan continued. Genscher said that there is "unfortunately no prospect" of there being any change by the 25 May deadline. It also emerged from the FDP chairman's statement that the Federal Government would give its recommendation to the NOC soon and not, as Genscher said, "at the last minute".

Genscher again stressed the will and the ability of the partner states of the Western alliance to recognize joint interests and to attend to them together. This was an unrenounceable precondition for a consistent policy of securing peace. Only the real unity of the West could keep the Soviet Union from a policy of increasing readiness to take risks.

The final decision against German athletes taking part in the Moscow games was apparently taken at coalition talks attended by top SPD and FDP politicians in Bonn on Sunday evening. Informed sources reported that the meeting was attended by Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and Genscher; for the FDP, federal economics minister Otto Graf Lambsdorff and the parliamentary group chairman Wolfgang Mischnick; and for the SPD, deputy party chairman Hans-Juergen Wischnewski and Federal Manager Egon Bahr. According to this information, they discussed, apart from the question of the Olympic boycott, measures with which the Federal Government can support the United States in the Tehran hostage affair.

Genscher, Kohl in Favor

LD111356 Hamburg DPA in German 1320 GMT 11 Apr 80 LD

[Excerpts] Bonn--Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher and CDU Chairman Helmut Kohl have today come out in favor of a boycott of the Moscow Olympics at the present stage of the Afghanistan crisis. Genscher said in a radio interview that the Federal Government is firmly determined to do justice to its political responsibility in the very difficult question of the Olympic boycott. "Considering the way matters are today," said Genscher, "this recommendation would be 'yes'."

Addressing the participants of a German-American conference of parliamentarians, Kohl said: "It is quite beyond imagination to participate in an Olympic games which are being sold propagandistically as games of peace while, at the same time, the Soviet Union is waging war against a defenseless people. If the CDU emphatically advocates nonparticipation by a German team then it is also drawing lessons from German history." Kohl said: "Perhaps history would have taken a different course if in 1936 the foreign countries had acted in a more determined manner against the dictator Hitler."

ENVOY TO IRAN RECALLED FOR CONSULTATIONS

LD121658 Hamburg DPA in German 1511 GMT 12 Apr 80 LD

[Text] Bonn--Gerhard Ritzel, the FRG ambassador to Tehran, is expected in Bonn on Monday. A Foreign Ministry spokesman announced today that Ritzel was called to Bonn for consultations after he and the ambassadors of the other EC countries presented the foreign ministers' demarche on the freeing of the hostages in the U.S. Embassy in Tehran to Iranian President Abolhasan Bani-Sadr.

SCHMIDT CALLS FOR DIPLOMACY TO END IRAN, AFGHAN CRISES

LD112047 Hamburg DPA in German 1929 GMT 11 Apr 80 LD

[Text] Hamburg--Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt has called for level heads and for "cool reasoning" in the present world crisis. Speaking at the Hamburg Social Democrat land election conference, Schmidt said this eveing that the Federal Republic in particular should not contribute to "other people's state of agitation" by "striking poses of strength". Schmidt warned against reckless steps which might endanger cooperation with the East--which is still directed toward securing world peace--or threaten the coherence of the Western alliance.

Pointing to the threat to world peace which emanates from the Near East, Iran and Afghanistan, as well as the efforts to arm, Schmidt said the West should try to see the USSR's interests when sizing up the situation. It is not a question of "adaptation" he said, it is a question of "German patriotism." One has to be able to put oneself in the place of one's partner or opponent in a game if one does not want it "to end in deadly chaos."

Above all, Schmidt opposed any possible military action by the West in Iran and Afghanistan and any economic boycott measures against the Soviet Union which could violate any valid treaties. "We must not damage our solidarity with the United States, but we must also continue to be reliable contractual partners," he said.

The chancellor considered military action in Iran to be particularly futile as it would be the wrong people who would have to bear the consequences. It would be far better to try to achieve peace in the Near East, to free the hostages in Iran and to liberate Afghanistan by diplomatic means. Another essential aim, Schmidt said, was the cessation of the arms race between East and West. He thought military thinking was playing too big a role these days. Although both world powers and consciously trying to avoid a war, neither has a "war avoidance strategy." In view of the many sources of tension, it would be dangerous not to talk openly enough about both sides main goals.

Compared Situation to Pre-WW I

[Text] Essen--Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt thinks that a comparison of the present world political crisis situation with the period in 1914 prior to the outbreak of World War I is not entirely false.

At an election meeting of the North Rhine-Westphalia SPD in Essen this morning, the chancellor told his audience of some 10,000 that in 1914, too, none of the states involved really wanted a world war, but that no nation was able to appreciate deeply enough the interests of the others. Schmidt agreed that there is much that is different today, but said that the military element plays too great a role, "particularly in the Soviet Union." He regretted that the great powers have no adequate "war avoidance strategy." He made it plain that the Germans cannot be neutral spectators and that the heart of Federal German security lay in the alliance with the United States.

Analyzes International Situation

[Text] Essen--Chancellor Helmut Schmidt believes that "a will for peace that rises above all else" is required if, in the present critical world situation, a development is to be avoided like that which led to World War I in 1914. For this in the Federal Republic there had to be "cool, considered reason" and behavior so that "our friends regard us as reliable" and so that German policy, above all in the East as well, remained "predictable," Schmidt stressed in Essen today. "We can't afford any gestures of strength and any virile demonstrations of imperturbability. We are fed up to the teeth with these."

During the SPD rally to open the "hot phase" of the election campaign for the North Rhine-Westphalia land Diet elections on 11 May, Schmidt announced that U.S. Secretary of State Vance and Soviet Foreign Minister Gromyko would meet "soon" in Vienna. He said that the contents of a new agreement between the GDR and the Federal Republic on additional traffic projects between Berlin and West Germany had just been settled and could come into force "soon." He welcomed both these things as a sign that the desire for talks and detente between East and West still existed.

In a detailed analysis of the world situation, Schmidt concentrated chiefly on the "four sources of conflict": the Middle East, Iran, Afghanistan and the new arms race. He said that paramount for the Federal Republic in the Middle East was "the right of the State of Israel to live within recognized and secure borders." But the Palestinians' right to self-determination, over which Islam and the Arabs in general seem to regard Zionism as a more important enemy than the communism supported by the Soviet Union, also had to be recognized. Anyone who wanted to contribute toward a comprehensive peace in this region also had to have the courage to criticize Israeli settlement policy, for example.

On the Iranian crisis, the chancellor said that so far the Federal Republic had advised the United States against military action. Bonn had been prepared to join in economic sanctions since the beginning of 1980 within the framework of joint Western measures, "although this hits us harder than the United States." Schmidt found it "very questionable" whether Ayatollah Khomeyni was really the center of decisionmaking or whether there was one at all. "Anyone who greeted the breaking off of diplomatic relations with shouts of joy doesn't seem to bear the stamp of joint responsibility for world peace." Schmidt described Khomeyni, who was whipping up public rage and exploiting it, as unpredictable, and the "so-called students" as "a tightly organized quasi-military body." The "quite levelheaded" President Bani-Sadr wanted to end the injustice with regard to the hostages, but was powerless. Schmidt regretted with "an unspoken, moral reproach" that the Soviet Union had so far only once, right at the beginning, spoken out against the holding of the hostages. This reticence was obviously influenced by the hope of Iran leaning the Soviet Union's way.

The chancellor said that the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan had to be countered on the one hand by diplomatic and political pressure, while on the other hand careful consideration was necessary in order to enable the USSR to save face and preserve security. If the Soviet troops were able to remain in Afghanistan, it would be a "weighty prestige success," particularly in the Third World. The extension of the Soviet sphere of influence was unacceptable and had to be contained, but not by the measures demanded by the "hotheads."

Schmidt felt that arms parity with respect to medium-range nuclear missiles had been upset for some time by the Soviet Union. He suggested that both sides should state their readiness to renounce new weapons of this kind "for a number of years." The preponderance already achieved by the USSR would remain in this case, but at least there would be no additional risk.

Views Carter's Sanctions Call

DW140905 Hamburg BILD in German 14 Apr 80 pp 1, 2 DW

[Reporter Dornhof interview with Chancellor Helmut Schmidt in Bonn; date not given]

[Text] Bonn, 14 April--BILD: President Carter feels abandoned by Europe. The Americans feel the solidarity of the European alliance partners is missing....

Schmidt: I do not think that the American President can feel abandoned by us. I consider all the reproaches as not applicable. I have not heard anything like that from Carter so far.

BILD: Will the European alliance partners comply with the wishes of the Americans?

Schmidt: There are a variety of wishes. Some of the American President's wishes can certainly be fulfilled; some, however, only in a limited way.

BILD: And if there is to be military action to liberate the Tehran hostages....

Schmidt: The Federal Republic has very clear limits stemming from constitutional law with regard to military action in the Middle East, for example. I must remind you of the basic law. The basic law makes just one exception for that sphere which is defined exactly in the NATO treaty. The Middle East does not belong to that sphere.

BILD: Do you believe it will be possible to free the hostages?

Schmidt: I believe it can be made possible.

BILD: What will we have to face if the oil crisis becomes aggravated even more? Will we have cold dwellings next winter?

Schmidt: No. I would not go that far. But it is quite possible that heating oil, gasoline and also diesel oil will become much more scarce and more expensive. It will certainly become an absolute necessity to switch to coal with regard to heating houses and with regard to energy for industries.

GENSCHER ON U.S.-EUROPEAN SOLIDARITY OVER IRAN

LD131341 Hamburg DPA in German 1303 GMT 13 Apr 80 LD

[Text] Bonn--Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher has called for every effort to be made "to prevent doubts arising over the solidarity between Europeans and Americans."

Speaking on the second German television (ZDF) program "Bonn Perspective" this evening he said there is no point in being petty and working out who might have done something wrong in this case or that. Everyone must know that a dispute between Europe and the United States benefits neither the United States nor the Europeans, but only the Soviet Union.

Genscher stressed once again that the Federal Government can see no need to break diplomatic relations with Tehran at present. On the contrary, they should be used in the interests of the hostages. On the question of economic sanctions he pointed to the EC's problem, that there are states which, unlike the Federal Republic, do not possess the necessary legislation. For this reason the possibilities of the European treaty should be taken into account, which would allow joint legislation by the EC members on the imposition of economic sanctions. This would also permit joint action. According to Genscher, President Carter has not set a deadline for decisions by the Europeans. The Americans rightly expect the Europeans not to postpone their decision indefinitely, however.

Stresses Partnership to Visiting Congressmen

LD111630 Hamburg DPA in German 1522 GMT 11 Apr 80 LD

[Text] Bonn--At a reception held for a group of American congressmen this afternoon, Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher stressed that the Federal Republic shares not only an alliance with the United States, but also the same interests and values. Genscher, who was explaining the fundamental direction of German foreign and security policy as well as Bonn's stand on the Afghanistan and Iran crises, emphasized that the Federal Government would "act as a friend and partner of the United States."

APEL SAYS SOLIDARITY WITH U.S. 'INDISPENSABLE'

LD121508 Hamburg DPA in German 1420 GMT 12 Apr 80 LD

[Text] Hamburg--Federal Defense Minister Hans Apel has come out in favor of setting the dialog between the two world powers in motion again. At the international Clausewitz forum in Hamburg today, he said that the continuation of negotiations, the further existence of a network of cooperation with the Soviet Union and the permanence of a climate of detente were of central interest to Europe. Cooperation with the East was not a present to the Soviet Union but a necessary process in the balance of interests between East and West.

Apel stressed that the state of military and political balance gave cause for concern. Relations between the two superpowers were at present marked by uncertainty, tension and instability. The military balance had shifted to the West's disadvantage. The Soviet Union had further expanded its nuclear potential below the strategic balance level, thus gaining superiority within the overall nuclear balance, and had further advanced its conventional superiority. But NATO was on the way to redressing the military balance that had been upset.

Apel expressed the belief that the numerous conflicts in the Third World were a danger to the whole world. He pointed with emphasis to the fact that solidarity with the United States was indispensable. Europe's security was achieved through the alliance with the United States. Apel called for the withdrawal of the Soviets from Afghanistan. Free access to energy sources and raw materials in the Third World determined the stability of the Western industrial societies. If access was hampered, this would be equivalent to a loss of security which could not be compensated for by any military effort.

WEST BERLIN MAYOR MEETS WITH CARTER, CALLS FOR SOLIDARITY

[Excerpt] Berlin--Following his visit to the United States, Berlin Governing Mayor Dietrich Stobbe spoke strongly in Berlin today in favor of the European partners in the alliance showing "active solidarity" with the United States in the present situation. Stobbe, who had a talk lasting almost 1 hour with President Carter in Washington yesterday, told journalists in Berlin that the United States had so often offered protection to Europe and Berlin that the European partners must now be prepared to support the United States if it asks for concrete help. Stobbe said that from Berlin in particular a voice must be raised in this direction. The dispute about the U.S. measures with regard to Iran and Afghanistan was far less important than the functioning of the Western alliance as a whole.

Stobbe said that not only leading politicians and public opinion, but also President Carter personally had been annoyed at the hesitant attitude of the European allies, including the FRG. It had to be realized that the hostages had been held in Iran for over 150 days and that the United States as a nation was "touchy, humiliated and angry." Despite great public pressure, Carter had tried for a long time to stick to a policy of moderation, but this attempt had now ended and the President was taking a "harder line." This was quite understandable. Stobbe described as false speculations in this connection that Washington might try to put pressure on its European allies through Berlin. He stressed that Washington's annoyance in no way affected Berlin. During their talks, the President had emphatically reaffirmed the security guarantees for the city and had recalled his visit to Berlin 2 years ago in a "very cordial and friendly way."

Stobbe said that he would ask for understanding of the U.S. stand at the meeting of SPD bodies in Berlin on Monday and Tuesday. The Federal Government had already been briefed on his impressions of the Washington talks. Stobbe again stressed that West German athletes ought not to go to Moscow if the United States boycotted the Olympic games.

STRAUSS, KOHL CRITICIZE GOVERNMENT INDECISION

LD132024 Hamburg DPA in German 1700 GMT 13 Apr 80 LD

[Excerpts] Essen--Franz Josef Strauss, the CDU-CSU candidate for chancellor and Bavarian premier, has described as "perilous" a policy which is aimed at "keeping oneself out of the conflict between the United States and the Soviet Union." He said that the attitude adopted by Chancellor Helmut Schmidt since the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, which is "in the tradition of the policy of Wehner, Brandt and Bahr," is "driving the West into the tragic alternative of capitulation or war." According to Strauss, "a middle road, a third way must be found which prevents war and avoids capitulation."

Strauss was responding at a CDU rally in Essen today to launch the "hot phase" of the election campaign for the North Rhine-Westphalian land Diet elections on 11 May to Schmidt's "depiction of the crises" given the previous day at a similar SPD rally in the same place. Strauss called the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan "the handwriting on the wall," in view of which it could not be a case of business as usual "as Schmidt is doing and Brandt is advocating." He said that Social Democrats "have become a security risk because they have become blind to history." Afghanistan is a "strategically key country" in the hands of a power which has already partly surpassed the United States in the military field. Fifty percent of Iran's borders are ringed with Soviet troops. Therefore, the Soviet Union has a favorable starting position "in order to be able to share the booty if complications arise in Iran."

Strauss said that he is convinced that the Soviet Union does not want a third world war, which could endanger overnight the power gained after World War II. Soviet leaders are not adventurers or hotheads but "icecold strategists" with the unchanged objective of world revolution and great Russian imperialism. It must now be made clear to them that they may "go this far and no further." He said that "the romantic policy of detente is finished. There can be room again for politically sober detente only when the Soviet Union reestablishes Iran's [as received] sovereignty." This also means that the West must become so strong militarily that the price of further actions such as those in Afghanistan will appear too high for the Soviet Union.

Strauss said that the clear change in mood against the Europeans in the United States "means us, too, and us in particular." On the question of an Olympics boycott he said that on the basis of his "own assessment of the situation," the Federal Republic must also support this measure. One cannot simply "say no with hypocritical talk of partnership and solidarity."

CDU Chairman Helmut Kohl said that the Federal Government, "with the chancellor at the fore," presents a "pathetic sight" with its stance on the Afghanistan problem.

Kohl also criticized the discussion held in the Federal Republic regarding obligations to the United States in view of the Soviet aggression in Afghanistan. It is "a catastrophe for Wehner, Brandt, Bahr and Eppler to speak in a way that must encourage the Soviet Union." The Federal Government must immediately make it plain that "we stand by the Americans and that we are a reliable partner in both fair and foul weather. There is no other possibility," not even that of "hiding behind the backs of the European partners."

Kohl described the Americans held in Iran as "hostages for the free world." Measures for their release are not the business of the United States alone. One cannot complain about the "barbarous act" and at the same time do business with Iran. He said that the Olympic games in Moscow are a "fundamental question addressed to the moral stature of our republic." The only possible reply is to stay away and thus "speak out for liberty and human rights."

BONN SHOULD HEED CARTER CRITICISM BECAUSE OF BERLIN

DW140953 Bonn DIE WELT in German 14 Apr 80 p 6 DW

[Matthias Walden editorial: "Hear Nothing, See Nothing, Say Nothing"]

[Text] The fact that Chancellor Schmidt, as he puts it, sees parallels between the present global crisis and the time prior to the outbreak of World War I allows the conclusion that he has comprehended the seriousness of the situation. What he identifies as one of the causes of this danger and as a means for overcoming it makes the conclusion obvious, however, that does not measure up to the extent of the risk: a lack of readiness to talk on the part of the superpowers is neither the decisive reason for the dangers, nor could the recommended "dialog" banish them alone. That would be fine indeed, but unfortunately this is not so.

What fostered the chancellor's idea is the wish that Europe, above all the Federal Republic, might be an oasis free of stormy weather. This illusion was already contained in Egon Bahr's thesis of the "divisibility of detente". Minister Genscher has contradicted that. The coalition thus turns out to be disunited in the assessment of the facts, consequences and conclusions. This is bad in a serious world political crisis. Where everything hinges on common platforms and conformity of views from the German Rhine to the American Potomac, our government people offer the picture of a flock of hens raided by a fox.

Willy Brandt, who had claimed to have made peace safer, now has declared that world peace is moving on thin ice. The conclusion which he draws from that finding is not in a statesmanship format: He warned against "excitement". It will probably not be enough to avoid it.

Berlin's Governing Mayor Stobbe, under the impression of his White House visit, spoke of the irritation and disappointment of the Americans and their President, feelings which do not exclude the Federal Republic. Government Spokesman Boelling said the opposite: It is out of the question that Carter's reprimand applied to the Federal Republic. Schmidt repeated this today in an interview with the newspaper BILD . While Hans-Dietrich Genscher emphasized the partnership consequences with passionate rhetoric, others in the coalition came out against economic sanctions as a reply to the Soviet war crime in Afghanistan and to the Iranian crime in the hostage affair. Helmut Schmidt rejected military action by the Bundeswehr in the Middle East, which is not at issue, came out against the "pose of strength," and burned a rhetorical fuse when he added that we "are fed up" with it. Unfortunately, this kind of jargon does not convey the impression of strength of nerves. A "pose of strength" is not being demanded, but strength is, all the more. Its alternative is weakness.

This weakness came to light when word came from the leading coalition party in Bonn during the initial phase of the Afghanistan crisis that in the consistency of our solidarity with the United States we are handicapped by Berlin's sensitivity. The United States is especially entitled to our participation in its countermeasures for containing the Soviet aggression, especially because it is the primary protective power for Berlin. That is where it stands up for Germany. Hence, free Germany must stand up for the United States.

Because the governing people on the Rhine have obviously still failed to comprehend this, President Carter has now found himself compelled to become more outspoken toward the governing mayor: It is especially important in Berlin to understand the significance of a close and solid alliance. This is a blunt and unmistakable hint at the crux of the matter: The United States is not prepared to pull the chestnuts out of the fire alone everywhere and all the time and to allow its allies the luxury of a lack of involvement and of remaining a comfortable distance from the burdens that need to be borne.

This recalls to mind what was written in LE MONDE some time ago: More and more values are being sacrificed in the Western world because fewer and fewer people are prepared to make sacrifices for values. Regrettably this particularly applies to the Federal Republic of Germany.

The finding of the indivisibility of alleged detente is in keeping with the realization of the indivisibility of tensions. The tanks which took a nonalined country under their tracks in Afghanistan are standing just behind the Brandenburg Gate in Berlin. They are standing along the inter-German border. Helmut Schmidt himself has pointed out how near they are to his hometown of Hamburg. But from this, too, he drew the wrong conclusion that we could and should only conditionally and only partially join the Americans' replies to the Kremlin's aggressiveness. The Eastern lure with an inter-German detente oasis is a bait in a trap. We are to be paralyzed and desert the Americans. But if the Americans deserted us, we would be doomed.

It just seems as though Berlin has lost its function as the barometer of detente. The city has not been relieved of danger under the treacherous auspices of a vainly anticipated detente, but has been exposed to growing impairment through the erosion of its will for self-preservation which includes the readiness for conflict. Jimmy Carter has made this interconnection visible again. What now matters is that the people in government in our country see this as well. To be able to do so, they must pull their heads out of the sand.

COMMENTATOR SEES ESCALATION OF CRISIS ATMOSPHERE

DW140920 Munich SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG in German 14 Apr 80 p 4 DW

[Article signed Re.: "The Crisis Barometer Rises"]

[Text] Helmut Schmidt's sinister comparison to the summer of 1914 may have shocked many people; but only those who have not been halfway attentive to world political developments in past weeks and months could have been surprised. It does not have to mean that World War III is in the offing, but the crisis barometer is on a permanent climb. Even the assumption by the federal chancellor that escalation is taking place slower than it did 66 years ago need not necessarily apply to the near future. With the decision of the U.S. National Olympic Committee to boycott the Moscow summer games, the Europeans have come under pressure to make a move, and President Carter's statement that he has set a date for the allies with regard to decisions pertaining to the Iranian crisis indicates considerable acceleration in the near future.

The consequences of an Olympic boycott cannot be predicted today. If they have the effect that Olympic games will be organized in the future in another form or not at all, then they could turn out to be the lesser evil. It is most of all the political consequences that are open. Under such conditions it may be easier for the national Olympic committees in Europe to shift responsibility to the governments, and now they can suggest just following the American example. This pertains particularly to the Federal Government; it is least of all in a position to play a special role.

The situation is not very different with regard to the second Carter ultimatum. European boycott measures against Iran have more than just the function of demonstrating the cohesion of the alliance, at least outwardly. The danger cannot be ignored, however, that the actual aims of the West--withdrawal of Soviet troops from Afghanistan and the liberation of the hostages in Tehran--will gradually disappear from sight.

U.S. ACTION OVER IRAN COULD 'FORCE' EUROPE INTO ACTION

DW141017 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE in German 14 Apr 80 p 1 DW

[Article signed R.H.: "Sinister Mood"]

[Text] President Carter has given the Europeans short notice. The fact that his policy, which is aimed at popular effect, is void of refinement can be derived from the note to the allies demanding solidarity vis-a-vis Iran, a note which is also addressed to neutral Austria. The Americans should have asked themselves the corresponding questions by the end of World War II. Not only Kreisky is shaking his head now.

Despite such symptomatic details, the allies now must cope with Carter's demand for solidarity. Considerations being publicly made in this country with regard to breaking diplomatic relations and an economic boycott probably deal with just one side of the coin. Carter no longer rules out military operations, which could mean cooperation with Iraq which is infuriated by Khomeyni. A U.S. congressional committee is traveling through the area of the "Carter doctrine." If need be it will be responsible for alloting money and thus also for political decisions. America is no longer prepared to remain inactive. But if action takes place, the allies will not remain uninvolved. The problem of stopovers and air passage rights alone would force them to decide in favor of engagement.

That fits into the picture of a complex field of tension and indicates that Schmidt's and Carter's sinister hints at similarities to the eve of World War I are to the point. Tension in Iran could easily be eliminated if Moscow could made up its mind to say the right word with regard to the hostage drama and help settle the problem. Moreover, the Cassandra role ought to remain reserved for the commentators. Otherwise, Schmidt and Carter must tolerate being confronted with the findings of opinion poll research experts that democracies under threat do not like to change their leadership. So sinister-minded politicians are suspected of believing that public pessimism pays, at least until election time in the fall. It would be more harmless to make an Olympic boycott palatable to the people as being something very positive, as something completely uncloudy and as a highly peaceful confession for a freedom which has become endangered.

PORTUGUESE FOREIGN MINISTER ARRIVES IN BONN FOR TALKS

LD131716 Hamburg DPA in German 1618 GMT 13 Apr 80 LD

[Text] Bonn--Portuguese Foreign Minister Diogo Freitas do Amaral arrived in Bonn today for political talks. Prime Minister Francisco Manuel Lumbrales de Sa Carneiro is also expected this evening. He will hold talks with Chancellor Schmidt tomorrow and be received by Federal President Karl Carstens. After his arrival, Foreign Minister Amaral, who is also president of the Portuguese Social Democratic Party, had a meeting with the foreign policy expert of the CDU/CSU parliamentary group, Alois Mertes. Mertes told DPA that the talk centered on sanctions against Iran and against the Soviet Union in connection with the holding of the hostages and the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan. Amaral will meet CDU Chairman Helmut Kohl tomorrow.

AMBASSADOR TO IRAN RETURNS FOR CONSULTATIONS

LD131215 Paris Domestic Service in French 1100 GMT 13 Apr 80 LD

[Text] The French ambassador to Iran has been recalled to Paris for consultations. This morning he reported on the meeting of the EC ambassadors with Mr Bani-Sadr. The meeting did not enable the diplomatic corps to learn on what date the American hostages will be freed. This is not a severing of diplomatic relations between France and Iran; it demonstrates Paris' concern to firmly establish that France is not indifferent to the fate of the American hostages, and is affirmation of a specifically European position in this matter.

After this recall, the Quai d'Orsay pointed out that the West German ambassador has also been recalled to Bonn for the same reasons and that the French decision is in perfect agreement with the position agreed by the ministers of foreign affairs of the Nine in Lisbon on Tuesday. It is a known fact, on the other hand, that the French Government will not make any statement concerning President Carter's rather bitter speech on relations between the United States and its Western allies and that France will join other European actions to be taken later concerning Iran.

GIEREK CITED ON SEEKING 'CONVERGENCE OF VIEWS' WITH PARIS

LD111217 Paris LE MONDE in French 4 Apr 80 p 6 LD

[Bernard Guetta commentary: "Mr Gierek Would Like To Reach a 'Convergence of Views' With France on Detente in Europe"]

[Text] Vienna--Addressing the Polish parliament on 2 April Mr Gierek forcefully restated the leading role that Poland intends on playing in preserving detente and, toward this end, the particular place that it accords to its relations with France. "In the immediate future," he said, "we expect to extend" consultations with Paris in order to reach a "convergence of views" which would make it possible to implement the first secretary's 11 February proposal to call a European conference in Warsaw on "military detente and disarmament in Europe."

This statement gives a new look to Mr Gierek's proposal in that, apart from the "agreement in principle" already expressed by France, the two capitals' ideas remain profoundly at variance. Unlike Warsaw, Paris actually feels that, on the one hand, the Soviet Union should participate in this conference, and, on the other hand, that nuclear weapons should not be included in the negotiations. If, under these conditions, it is hard to see how the "foundations of a joint action" can be laid down, it still remains that the Polish party leader expressed a readiness for major concessions when addressing the elected deputies on 23 March.

The renewal of a proposal originally made by the Warsaw Pact, Mr Gierek's plan has been approved by the entire socialist bloc--particularly East Berlin, and, this week, by Bucharest during a visit by the Czechoslovak foreign minister. He is undoubtedly answering Moscow's desire to try to promote dialog with the European members of the Atlantic alliance and to develop with the continent a compromise detente in other regions of the world.

But for Poland it is not simply a reallocation of roles (tacit or organized), it is a question of major interest: the defense of economic relations with the West which is vital in Poland's present crisis. You only play the role to which you are suited, and, as at the February congress, Mr Gierek adopted a singularly moderate tone when referring to international tension on Wednesday, without once blaming the United States or mentioning the name of Afghanistan.

Breaking with the tradition which makes peace and detente dependent upon the unity of the socialist camp, the first secretary went so far as to say that Poland's efforts tended to develop its potential, to tighten its links with "our" socialist "friends," while, "at the same time," concentrating all its efforts on the preservation of detente and the advantages that nations derive from it.

Three months after the Kabul coup, this scarcely orthodox presentation of Warsaw's foreign policy highlights the nuances that continue to emerge within the people's democracies with regard to the Soviet intervention. The absolute support shown to the USSR by Prague, Sofia and East Berlin is more marked in the first two capitals than in the third, and is different from Hungary's official solidarity, Warsaw's reserved tone and Romania's "dissidence."

The Polish parliament, which continues its work this Thursday, will have to ratify a reshuffle of the government of Mr Babiuch ("new times require new men" said Mr Gierek), who was returned on Wednesday to the post of prime minister, whose functions he has been fulfilling since he replaced Mr Jaroszewicz in February. Similarly, Mr Henryk Jablonski, the president of the Council of State (the republic's collegial presidency) was reelected to this post which he has occupied since 1972.

PCF'S DENIS PREVIEWS CP'S MEETING ON DETENTE

LD110849 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 4 Apr 80 p 9 LD

[PCF Central Committee member Jacques Denis article: "The Meeting of the European Communist Parties"]

[Text] The European communist and workers parties' meeting on peace and disarmament, which will take place in Paris on 28-29 April, promises to be a positive initiative and is currently receiving wide response, a response favored, moreover, by the character and aim of the initiative. This is, in fact, a meeting--and not a Berlin-type conference--with a very precise and defined aim: to exchange our views on peace and disarmament in a situation where these questions are at the center of everyone's concerns. This precise framework and overt character are confirmed by the content of a brief preliminary draft of the final appeal submitted with the invitation. Everyone will be perfectly free to say what he intends to say and to take such subsequent action as he decides in complete sovereignty. There will be no binding decision at all.

It thus can be seen that such a meeting corresponds to the normal relations existing between communist parties, relations founded simultaneously on independence, equality of rights, noninterference and mutual respect in the search for joint actions for aims consistent with our people's interest and each party's views.

Everyone knows that we adhere fundamentally to these rules, for ourselves and for the other communist parties. We could neither conceive of nor accept any others. These rules are mutually inseparable.

You cannot cite independence to deny the communist parties and them alone the right to consult with each other, to exchange their opinions and to promote the aims on which their views converge. To expect the communist parties to show a total agreement of positions and conceptions as the precondition for any initiative would amount to the conception of a movement becoming inevitably monolithic and incapable of admitting a divergence of views in certain spheres.

We believe that the existence of a divergence, which we accept, presents no obstacle to joint actions. It is our aim, moreover, that, apart from contributing to each party's struggle in the specific conditions of its own country, this coming together will contribute to broader meetings and promote the desirable realization of joint initiatives with other social and political forces. On the other hand, to abstain so as simply to seek initiatives between communist, socialist and social democratic parties and other forces in Western Europe would ultimately mean a return to participation in the bloc mentality and the confrontation between the countries of the West and the socialist countries.

It is precisely this which must be avoided if we want to restart the detente process and to bypass the existing blocs--something which we desire passionately. Because the PCF rejects the mentality of blocs, escalation and tension, because it wishes to create the conditions for the broadest action, for dialog and for the convergence of peaceful forces--which presupposes the communists' contribution--we, together with our Polish comrades, considered this initiative a positive contribution to these aims. By contrast, the shirking of duty by the communist parties in this vital field of our combat for the future of mankind would not only be divorced from our responsibilities, it could only serve to incite those forces--so active now--which desire confrontation and the worsening of the international situation, to harden their attitudes and to increase their vetos.

For these reasons we do not intend to engage in any polemic on the forthcoming meeting or to turn it into the battlefield of any clash of influences. Our approach is open, unitary, constructive. We have only one aim: to promote the search by all the interested forces for the means to oppose the threats to peace and to restart detente. For such an aim no contribution can be too great.

PCF 'DOES NOT DESPAIR' OF DIALOG WITH SOCIAL DEMOCRATS

LD111317 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 2 Apr 80 pp 1, 3 LD

[Article by PCF Central Committee member Gerard Streiff: "The Socialist International in a Blind Alley"]

[Text] Francois Mitterrand's violently anticommunist remarks at the Socialist International meeting held just a few days after the inopportune meeting in Strasbourg between the PCI secretary general and the French Socialist Party [PS] first secretary, the most tangible result of which was certainly the support which F. Mitterrand obtained from this meeting, seem to me to bear the stamp of a general call by social democracy in recent months.

As we said at our last congress, social democracy, not content to continue class collaboration practices, took an active part in imperialist strategy in the mid-seventies. In a world undermined by a structural crisis in which powerful workers' struggles were emerging, social democracy, readily sheltering behind leftwing phraseology, tried to channel this combativeness in order to sterilize it. [paragraph continues]

Mindful of the aspirations of many peoples to liberate themselves from authoritarian regimes such as in Portugal and Spain or to gain full independence like many developing countries, social democracy readily portrayed itself as an alternative while its practice led those peoples along the path of compromise with imperialism.

Indeed, in all cases, social democracy campaigned openly for an "alternative to communism." To do this, it provided itself with the means of implementing its policy, notable by reviving the Socialist International in 1976 under the wing of the SPD.

For a while this strategy seemed effective. In the second half of the seventies the social democratic parties took part in running affairs in most West European countries. Struggles tended to wane. Communist parties saw their influence limited. However, such a policy, by its very nature incapable of curbing the implacable spiral of the imperialist crisis, with its train of economic and social regression, merely objectively created the conditions for the right's return to power, especially in those countries where the revolutionary forces did not have the necessary influence to make the struggles more radical.

Therefore, in the recent period we have seen a general erosion of social democratic positions from Sweden to Britain, from Portugal to the Netherlands and from Japan to Belgium. The European elections demonstrated this once again. Even in the past few days the Spanish socialist party has lost considerable ground in Catalonia and the SPD has fallen in Baden-Wuerttemberg. Beyond obvious national differences, that is a clear indication of the limits of the social democratic strategy.

Caught up in inconsistencies, incapable of moving toward fundamental reforms which alone would solve the crisis, social democracy is now tending to move toward increased authoritarianism.

Last week while new berufsverbot [forced unemployment] cases were reported in the FRG, the Dominican Communist Party secretary general was thrown into prison on orders from the social democratic government, while communist leaders were arrested in L. Senghor's Senegal--and he is a Socialist International vice president.

However, at the same time, renewed efforts were being made to give the social democratic image a more leftwing color. In some cases the parties merely had to take advantage of backing from "fraternal parties" reputed to be leftwing. For instance, the meeting between socialist leaders from southern Europe in Paris at the beginning of March was, according to LE NOUVEL OBSERVATEUR, aimed at "doing Mario Soares a favor. On the eve of a new election campaign the Portuguese Socialist Party secretary needs to give himself a more leftwing image to resist the Communist Party more effectively." However, in most cases this backing is sought from the communist parties themselves. There can be no doubt that that was the Socialist International's objective in its meeting with the CPSU last October, after which the PS tended to portray itself as a militant advocate of disarmament when in fact it supports the deployment of the new American missiles. There is also no doubt that this concern guided the Socialist International when it invited (in vain) Fidel Castro to take part in the Latin American socialist parties' meeting in Santo Domingo last week, at the very time when the PS first secretary called for "a curb on the development of international communism." It is clear that the same concerns motivated F. Mitterrand when he referred to a so-called Euroleft. All that is really just a symptom of the blind alley in which social democratic policy now finds itself.

Does this mean that our party despairs of seeking dialog or even joint action with social democracy? By no means. However, it must be pointed out that in the present circumstances such initiatives would not serve union but only create illusions. In this connection I will merely recall what G. Marchais said at the 23d congress:

"We are taking action, particularly in the European context, to establish and increase contacts and, if possible, joint action with socialist and social democratic parties for objectives corresponding to our peoples' real interests; we are anxious to reaffirm this position even though the present behaviour of most of these parties does not favor this rapprochement."

L'UNITE VIEWS PCF REACTION TO BERLINGUER-MITTERRAND MEETING

LD110939 Paris L'UNITE in French 4-19 Apr 80 pp 3, 4 LD

[Claude Estier article: "Marchais' Grudge Against Berlinguer"]

[Text] The meeting between Enrico Berlinguer and Francois Mitterrand in Strasbourg on 24 March has had considerable repercussions far outside France and Italy. That is partly due to the brutal reaction from Georges Marchais, who not only gave himself away on this occasion by admitting that his main adversary is not Valery Giscard d'Estaing but the Socialist Party [PS] first secretary, but also exploded the myth he had higherto tried to maintain of the existence of identical views between him and his "friend Berlinguer."

Never the Right Time

First, a historical fact. Georges Marchais was not surprised by the Strasbourg meeting. During a speech to PCI Rome federation cadres last Saturday, published on page 1 of L'UNITA the next day, Paolo Bufalini, one of the leadership members closest to Berlinguer, revealed that the PCF secretary general had received a message on 18 March warning him of this meeting and explaining that it was part of the relations which the PCI intends to develop with the European left. Bufalini added: "It is now almost 3 years since Mitterrand expressed the wish to meet with Berlinguer. The PCF asked us several times not to hold this meeting, maintaining on each occasion that the time was not right."

This revelation explains the rapidity of Georges Marchais' reaction stating in Le Havre, less than 45 minutes after the publication in Strasbourg of the communique on the Mitterrand-Berlinguer meeting, that "the time and place were badly chosen." This was the initial reaction prepared in advance which was followed the next day by at least two other statements directly calling Berlinguer himself into question.

The reason for this barely restrained fury has been thought to lie in the fact that the broad areas of agreement observed between the PCI and PS leaders destroy the PCF accusations of the PS "swing to the right" and its alleged support for Giscard d'Estaing. This is one reason but not the only one, nor the most important.

It should be stressed that in all his statements on the Strasbourg meeting, Georges Marchais took care to conceal the major subject of the meeting, namely the initiatives which could be taken by the European workers' movement and hence by the various parties which embody this movement, to contribute to a deescalation between the two great powers and recreate the right conditions for a policy of detente and cooperation. Commenting on the meeting during the speech already mentioned, Paolo Bufalini stressed that "the crucial point is to work with all those who are willing, in order to group together European communist and socialist forces so that governments are not the only bodies to intervene in this difficult international phase."

Crude Obfuscation

[Georges Marchais notes areas of agreement between the PCI and PS but he regards these as agreement on the policy of austerity, submission to the multinationals, the expansion of the EC, with, according to him, the EC becoming "a supranational Areopagus dominated by West Germany and subjected to U.S. control" (27 March speech at the Porte de Pantin). However, none of these subjects was raised in Strasbourg. And yet Marchais has not said a word about the real purpose of the talks between Berlinguer and Mitterrand, namely a common desire for a European voice alined neither with Washington nor Moscow. It is obvious that this is what bothers the PCF leadership most in that the action taken by the PCI--which Bufalini did not hesitate to describe as a "turning point, even if it is the result of several years' work" (Note: This "turning point" does not just relate to Europe since Enrico Berlinguer is to go to Beijing in a few days' time and reestablish relations with the Chinese communist leaders)--and its overtures to all the major European socialist and social democratic parties (another top PCI leader Giorgio Napolitano met Labor Party leaders in London the day after the Strasbourg meeting) place even more emphasis on the PCF's alinement with the USSR. It is that first and foremost that Marchais holds against Berlinguer.

However, he was wrong to think that by raising his voice he was going to obtain apologies or a retraction. On the contrary, the PCI leadership responded by accentuating its move away from the PCF leadership. Condemning the "crude obfuscation" contained in Georges Marchais' statements, L'UNITA published these unequivocal lines: "Such an obvious propagandist distortion of the facts raises the question of what political objective and what advantage for the case of peace and democracy is sought by this attempt to confuse everything and everybody and to place the socialists on the same plan as the right. This is a mistake for which the workers' movement has paid dearly."

We are in a position to confirm that the PCI leadership, after prolonged discussions last Thursday, has decided--as have the PCE and the League of Communists of Yugoslavia--not to attend the European communist parties conference to be held in Paris at the end of April, at the initiative of the PCF, PZPR and the Soviets, to discuss the question of strategic armaments and the deployment of new NATO missiles in Europe.

After that Georges Marchais can still declare that he is "attached to Eurocommunism" which he caricatures for the needs of his cause. In fact, recent developments show at least four major areas of fundamental disagreement between the PCF on one side and the PCI and PCE on the other:

A--The Italians and Spanish intend to define and implement a policy independent of the USSR, while passing a negative judgement on Soviet society: "This is not 1920 when we had to show solidarity with the only socialist country," Berlinguer said recently while adding that: "This socialism is not ours."

The PCF has never made a critical analysis of Soviet society as a whole. Even the timid attempt made by the book "L'URSS et Nous" [The USSR and Ourselves], now seems to have been shelved. The PCF limits itself to individual criticism of the fate of dissidents while adding (which looks like some kind of justification) that these dissidents are rightwingers.

B--The West European countries belong to NATO and the EEC. For the PCI and the PCE (fervent supporters of Spanish entry into the Common Market) the Western communist parties must act within this double framework without calling them into question. For instance, while criticizing the NATO decision on the deployment of new missiles, the PCI refused from the start to join the one-sided campaign launched by the PCF. This remark by Berlinguer deserves consideration: "The capitalist forces want to prevent us from making progress, but if we were in a Warsaw Pact country we would have even greater difficulties."

The PCF, on the other hand, constantly denounces both NATO and the EEC (on the latter point we have already stressed the constant disunity between French and Italian communists in the European Parliament).

No More Flirtation With Social Democracy

C--The pursuit of detente and peaceful coexistence is a fundamental condition for the advance of socialism in Western Europe. Hence Berlinguer's and Carrillo's condemnation of anything which undermines that, whether it be the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan or the U.S.' retaliation measures.

On the other hand, Berlinguer gave a positive assessment of the latest Franco-German summit and the Socialist International's resolution in Vienna because of the emphasis placed on detente, while the PCF merely regarded these two meetings as evidence of total alinement with Washington.

D--Eurocommunism should help remove the prior conditions preventing communist parties from having power (the Christian Democratic Party's refusal in Italy and the weight of history in Spain). That is probably the tactical aspect of Eurocommunism. However, it is leading the PCI and PCE to try to extend dialog with European socialists and social democrats and also with Christian forces (the Carrillo interview for L'UNITE on 1 February 1980).

The PCF, which, several years ago, attempted a flirtation with social democracy (Marchais and Kanapa tour of the FRG, Sweden and Britain), constantly attacks and insults social democratic parties which, according to it, are merely backups for Washington (Social Democratic Party of Germany) or for the right (French PS). On Wednesday, L'HUMANITE again devoted a long article to denouncing the Socialist International.

A detailed examination of this point--to which should be added fundamental disagreement on the analysis of the world crisis since 1974 in which the PCF merely sees big capital's hand while the PCI thinks that the structural nature of this crisis should lead the workers' movement to accept some form of austerity--produces the conclusion that the PCI and PCE want to attain power (that includes power in a situation of national union), while the PCF does not want to (even, indeed above all, in the framework of the leftwing union alone which could obtain a majority in France while it could not in Italy and Spain).

These are some of the facts which have been dominating the communist movement in Western Europe for quite a long time now. They have been fairly diffuse until now but have just been highlighted. That is one of the--unexpected--results of the Strasbourg meeting.

IRANIAN SPOKESMAN ON BILATERAL RELATIONS, U.S. PRESSURES ON EUROPE

AU121937 Rome ANSA in English 1915 GMT 12 Apr 80 AU

[Text] Rome, April 12 (ANSA)--The Iranian Embassy here confirmed today that the fate of the hostages held in the American Embassy in Tehran can only be decided after the elections of the Iranian parliament and warned that it would be a "disgrace" for any European state to line up with the Americans in the controversy.

"The Europeans should remember that the affair of the hostages is something between the United States and Iran," the embassy's spokesman Hassan Qadiri said in a press conference during which he also commented on this morning's EEC move with President Abolhasan Bani-Sadr. "Do not give in to American pressures, do not compromise your own interests," was the nub of the spokesman's message to the Europeans as he referred to excellent prospects for Italo-Iranian cooperation.

According to Qadiri, cooperation between the two countries could be "ten times" greater than it is. "But if Italy joins up with America, it is as if it supported the shah and his misdeeds," the diplomat admonished, noting that Italy has a good image with the Iranian people because of the support which its progressive and working-class forces gave to the Iranian Revolution and because a man like Sandro Pertini is its head-of-state.

According to Qadiri, however, this image has suffered slightly because the Italian aeronautics firm, Agusta, has broken off the provision of spare parts for its helicopters sold to Iran. "If a single helicopter should crash for this reason, the Italian Government would bear the whole responsibility," Qadiri warned.

Qadiri added that it is in Italy's interest to gain credibility with the Iranians rather than letting itself get tied up in the hostage crisis. "We are ready to make war on the United States," he said. "Economic war, and also military war." "There are 35 million of us. We are not afraid of death, and we have shown it. Still less are we afraid of hunger and misery."

In conclusion, Qadiri issued a series of harshly worded attacks on the American authorities for their "past and present" support of the ousted shah.

POPE SENDS MESSAGES TO KHOMEYNI, CARTER, WALDHEIM

AU140842 Rome ANSA in English 0815 GMT 14 Apr 80 AU

[Text] Vatican City, April 14 (ANSA)--The Vatican has confirmed press reports that Pope John Paul II has sent messages on the Iranian crisis to UN Secretary-General Kurt Waldheim, President Jimmy Carter, and the leaders of the west Asian state.

Vatican spokesman, Father Romeo Panciroli, told journalists yesterday morning that the recipients of the messages, sent in the pope's "constant solicitude for peace in the world", included Ayatollah Khomeyni. Following Vatican practice, Panciroli added, the text of the messages will not be initially published, though they will be made public if false versions or interpretations of them are put into circulation.

PRESS COMMENTS ON U.S.-IRAN CRISIS 11, 12 APR

On 'Cautious' European Response

AU111518 Rome ANSA in English 1540 GMT 11 Apr 80 AU

[Text] Rome, April 11, (ANSA)--The Iranian crisis continued to dominate editorial comment today in the Italian press. Observers stressed in particular mounting American determination to intervene militarily in Iran unless the hostages crisis is speedily resolved, and the United States' Western allies cautious wait-and-see responses to Washington's pressing appeals for solidarity.

The Rome daily LA REPUBBLICA referred to U.S. President Jimmy Carter and Iranian chief of state Abolhasan Bani-Sadr in the title of its editorial as "Two Men Fighting Against Time". The paper said that the two statesmen are both facing tough election deadlines within their respective countries which are conditioning their international strategies. LA REPUBBLICA argued that Bani-Sadr needs time and trust from the United States to impose himself on the fundamentalist Islamic Party, but Carter cannot give him either without improving his rivals' chances in the White House race. Two other problems are coupled with this "objective contrast of destinies": the Soviet Union's and the United States' European allies.

"If Carter uses up all his reserve of patience and political time, he will speed up the break with Iran and for Moscow it will be very easy to fill the gap and take under its wing the regime of the ayatollahs," the paper said. At the same time, the United States' appeal for concrete solidarity actions from its allies and the latter's "recalcitrant" reply only add to the atmosphere of uncertainty and dissent between Europe and the United States. The paper concludes saying that the widening leadership gap nutures in both Tehran and Moscow the temptation to raise the negotiating stakes.

The Communist Party daily L'UNITA reiterated its condemnation of the seizure of American diplomatic personnel in Tehran as hostages, but also delved into what it said is the "deep-rooted reason of the latest crisis": the American leadership's incapacity to carry on "an effective dialogue with the forces emerging from the revolutionary process of our era". According to the Communist paper, the United States has failed to do what Bani-Sadr had in effect requested: "An explicit statement condemning past American policy towards Iran and a commitment to turn over a new leaf and establish truly new relations between the two countries". The paper concluded that it is an illusion and dangerous to believe that the hurdle can be sidestepped through threats, sanctions or worse, resorting to armed force.

The Socialist Party daily L'AVANTI focused on the decisions the nine European Economic Community foreign ministers reached yesterday in Lisbon which the paper called an "ultimatum to (Iranian spiritual leader) Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeyni". The ambassadors of the nine "EEC" countries in Tehran will ask to be received by Bani-Sadr to ask him to release the hostages and obtain specific assurances on the date and conditions of release. On the basis of the replies given, the Community nations will establish their definitive attitude. The paper said that no one is betting on the success of this move but it was aimed at giving the impression that the EEC Nine and acting and not just passively watching the situation deteriorate. In addition, the paper observed that the request for a specific date for the hostages' release, which falls in line with the position Carter has taken, could satisfy the Americans who are demanding "concrete facts and not words from the Europeans".

Rome's conservative IL TEMPO took the opposite view and said that the request is seen by the Americans as "a deliberate gesture to put blinders over one's eyes". The paper acknowledged, however, that the EEC move is the first "veiled threat" against Iran. The decision to recall the ambassadors to report to their specific governments on the results of the meeting with Bani-Sadr could be the prelude to a semi-break in relations with Iran.

Turin's LA STAMPA analyzed the possibility, feared by the European allies: that economic sanctions against Iran could trigger "Islamic solidarity" and that oil producing countries will take Iran's side and decree a total or partial oil embargo against industrialized nations. The paper played down the potential danger and said that at present "Islamic solidarity is a mere rhetorical expression". LA STAMPA said that Khomeyni's "crusade" has shaken the balance and legitimacy of many regimes in power in oil producing nations. "The major concern of Iran's Muslim neighbours is to limit the destablizing effects of the Khomeyni revolution".

Milan's conservative IL GIORNALE said that the American request for solidarity of its European allies has created a state of understandable uncertainty. However, the United States' anger over its allies' attitude is not totally unjustified. Europeans "have grounds for distrust of the Carter leadership, but it's also true that they depend totally on the United States for their military security. And this is not the United States' fault but Europe's", the paper concluded.

On 'Stiffening' U.S. Position

[Text] Rome, April 12 (ANSA)--The Italian press continued to focus today on the crisis between Iran and the United States. Commentators voiced concern over what they saw as a stiffening of the U.S. position in response to what Washington considers inadequate support from Europe and Japan.

The CORRIERE DELLA SERA of Milan noted the sharper tone taken by U.S. President Jimmy Carter and his top aides as well as by the most authoritative American papers while U.S. allies play for time. While election considerations could well play party in Carter's tougher stance, it would be wrong to think this was all there was to it, the paper earned. Washington needs a timely clarification of inter-ally relations as storm clouds gather on the international scene CORRIERE said.

Rome's IL TEMPO saw the most disturbing element in the American position as the tendency among top leaders to think in terms of political and, above all, economic reprisals against Japan and the European allies. This tendency threatened to weaken the alliance when important decisions have been taken to neutralize the growing threat from the east, the paper said.

Among the first economic reprisals the U.S. might take against its allies is the erection of tariff barriers against steel imports, the MESSAGGERO of Rome said.

IL GIORNALE of Milan looked to Italy to play an important role in ending the crisis between the U.S. and Iran, especially after talks yesterday between Italian Premier Francesco Cossiga, Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo and U.S. Ambassador Richard Gardner.

This was not the view of LA REPUBBLICA which said that two weeks ago Gardner had let the Italian foreign minister know that the U.S. was ready to put its cards on the table and take a tough stand should Iran prove intransigent. To requests for Italy's solidarity, Washington has received only formal support but no one is ready to withdraw their ambassadors from Tehran or to break off economic channels, the paper claimed.

There is also to be a dinner with Vice President [title as received] Deng Xiaoping.

The PCI delegation will visit Beijing University where Berlinguer will address teachers and students. The group will also travel to Shanghai and Hangchow. Upon their return to Beijing they will wind up their talks in the capital with Hu Yaobang, who is the secretary general of the Chinese Communist Party's Central Committee.

Comments Before Departure

AU121556 Rome ANSA in English 1530 GMT 12 Apr 80 AU

[Text] Rome, April 12 (ANSA)--The dialogue between Italian Communists and Chinese officials will be a frank one with regard to both matters of agreement and matters of discord, according to Italian Communist Party (PCI) Secretary Enrico Berlinguer.

In statements to the party's official organ L'UNITA on the eve of his departure for China, Berlinguer said that Italian and Chinese Communists would search for every possible area of understanding and agreement on the great themes of peace and international cooperation. According to the PCI secretary the meeting "sanctions the full resumption of those relations, broken off for many years, that we, even during the sharpest polemics, always hoped could be re-forged". Berlinguer said that the PCI has always been well aware of the historic role of the Chinese revolution in world history. He also stressed that no one should interpret the purpose of the PCI mission to China as being aimed against anyone, against other communist parties of other workers' or progressive groups.

The PCI leader also referred to the serious deterioration in international relations and the resultant need to mobilize to open a constructive and peaceful dialogue. In this context he urged the creation of a broad alignment of forces open to the contribution of the non-aligned countries, the most responsible European governments, the communist and social parties and those cultural, religious and progressive forces that most have mankind's interests at heart.

L'UNITA TAKES ISSUE WITH PCF'S STREIFF OVER DISARMAMENT MEETING

LD141037 Rome L'UNITA in Italian 4 Apr 80 p 19 LD

["F.F." dispatch: "Clarification From L'HUMANITE"]

[Text] Paris--The PCF organ L'HUMANITE, which hitherto has not illustrated the stances adopted by the PCI and PCE with regard to the French-Polish initiative for a conference of European communist and workers parties on peace and disarmament problems (apart from a brief announcement of the decision taken by these two parties), explained yesterday the apparent aims which the PCF and Polich United Workers Party (PZPR) ascribe to the "meeting" scheduled for 28-29 April.

In an interview with PCF Central Committee member Gerard Streiff (headlined "Toward the European Communist Parties' Meeting on Disarmament"), it is stated that the "meeting should conclude with a brief popular appeal to the peoples of the European countries," urging them "determinedly to take in hand the defense of peace and the necessary struggle for disarmament" and "to reinvigorate the detente policy in Europe and to make it possible to overcome the policy of confrontation between the blocs on our continent."

According to Streiff it is an "initiative with a specific content, limited in subject matter and open to all parties which want to join it." He claims, that is, that this initiative is not "a conference, but a meeting with well-defined objectives."

Streiff maintains that this meeting has been the subject "for many months of consultations between the two parties (the PCF and PZPR) and the European communist parties as a whole," following which it apparently emerged that "the great majority of these parties supported such an initiative."

According to the interviewee, it would be "absurd" to talk about the rebirth of a new communist movement center. Streiff condemns "such an assessment" as "maneuvering" which, he says, aims to conceal the fact that "among communist parties relations are based on the most scrupulous independence of judgement." Streiff does not believe that such an initiative conflicts with possibly broader convergences on peace issues and asserts that "it is normal for communist parties to meet, especially on such an important issue," adding that "we are open to all initiatives from wherever they originate and no matter who their participants are, as long as they make it possible to act truly in favor of political and military detente."

Next the PCF claims the communist parties right "to consult each other," concluding polemically as follows: "How can one envisage broader initiatives if one denies the communist parties' right to meet?"

It should be noted that this interview is published on an inside page of L'HUMANITE, without great prominence. Moreover, it does not deal with any of the objections which the PCI and PCE have raised to the initiative.

SOCIAL DEMOCRAT, LIBERAL LEADERS STRESS DUTY TO NATO

AU120902 Rome ANSA in English 0830 GMT 12 Apr 80 AU

[Excerpt] Rome, April 12 (ANSA)--The new twist taken by international tensions after the turn-for-the-worse in relations between Tehran and Washington has special importance in the eyes of politicians and political observers here in view of the unveiling of the new Italian Government's political platform next Monday.

Prime Minister Francesco Cossiga, a Christian Democrat whose party is allied with the Socialists (PSI) and the Republicans (PRI), will only unveil his government's full platform with the confidence debate in the two houses of Parliament. But already, some new and old members of the opposition are keen to know the government's international stance, especially after President Jimmy Carter's appeal for closer support from Western Europe over his increasingly tough measures against the Iranian Government.

A case in point is the Italian Social Democrat Party (PSDI), traditionally a very close American ally, like the right-of-center Liberals (PLI). These two small centrist parties formed part of Cossiga's former three-way coalition and have now moved to the opposition benches.

"We are part of an alliance which we must honor," said PSDI Deputy Secretary Ruggero Puletti in this morning's edition of the party daily, L'UMANITA. "We form part of an alliance which implies grave duties, we must learn to honor them." According to Puletti, Western Europe should offer "concrete, operative, active solidarity" with the United States in defense of "not only the fundamental principles of international alw, but also the West's security and liberty".

"We would be curious to know how the West European states would react before an American decision to abandon Europe to its fate," the PSDI spokesman argued.

PLI Secretary Valerio Zanone was also at pains to re-assert his transatlantic fidelity, though he placed more stress on Western Europe's self-interest. Europe is asked "not only to show a demonstration of solidarity towards its American allies," he said yesterday, "but still more of defense of its vital interests in peace and security, which must be safeguarded in a Middle Eastern perspective." "In American public opinion," he claimed, "there are emerging dangerous signs of a drop of confidence in the alliance with Europe."

Interviewed for television, Italian Communist Party Secretary Enrico Berlinguer, the leader of the major voice in opposition, also mentioned the problems raised for detente by the current international crisis. He told an interviewer that the Italian Communists favor European unity and understanding between Western Europe's socialist and social democrat forces as having a new role in the defense of detente. In domestic terms, he also admitted that the entry of the PSI into the new government may cause problems in relations with his own party. But he also made it clear that the Communists will be seeking to work with the Socialists at the local level, in the trade unions, and on the major international problems.

POPE ANNOUNCES VISIT TO FRANCE 30 MAY-2 JUNE

PCI DISCUSSES PREPARATIONS FOR JUNE LOCAL ELECTIONS

LD100751 [Editorial Report LD] Rome L'UNITA in Italian on 3 April carries on pages 7-8 an 8,500-word unattributed report on PCI Directorate member Armando Cossutta's 2 April opening report to a PCI National Council session in Rome. On pages 8-9 L'UNITA carries a 6,000-word unattributed report on the ensuing debate. The topic of the meeting was preparations for the June regional and local elections. Cossutta first briefly announces the PCI Directorate's 1 April decision not to attend the Paris communist party disarmament conference and then outlines the party's goals for the coming elections. He sums up some of the main social and political developments in Italy since the PCI's major gains in the 15 June 1975 general elections and reiterates the PCI's criticisms of the Christian Democratic Party's administrative and legislative shortcomings. Cossutta demands greater regional government spending control and general decentralization, outlining detailed proposals in this connection. He contrasts the "misdeeds" of Christian Democrat-dominated local authorities with the results achieved by leftwing councils.

Among the speakers who followed Cossutta, Lanfranco Turci, chairman of the Emilia Romagna Regional Council, says the Communists must combat the "insidious campaign designed to demonstrate the alleged failure of regional governments" so as to "impart a new impetus to a neocentralist policy opposed to democratic state reform."

ANTIMILITARY JOURNAL ON ROME GOVERNMENT'S NUCLEAR SHELTER

AU120856 Rome ANSA in English 0850 GMT 12 Apr 80 AU

[Excerpt] Rome, April 12 (ANSA)--An anti-nuclear shelter to house the highest echelons of the Italian State in case of nuclear war is currently being carved out deep in Montecavo, one of the hills twenty or so kilometers south of Rome, according to the Rome-based anti-militarist periodical, the ASS. According to ASS, so-named to underscore the stupidity of militarism, the only full-scale anti-nuclear bunker built in Italy so far has been set aside for the country's military commanders. This is reportedly not far from the prime minister's office at the Chigi Palace in downtown Rome. It is said to have direct links with NATO headquarters in Brussels and Washington.

No confirmation of the periodical's story was available in military circles here.

Comments on Iran, Mideast

LD121812 Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 1530 GMT 12 Apr 80 LD

[Summary] Sa'dun Hammadi, foreign minister of Iraq, arrived on a visit to Finland today at the invitation of Foreign Minister Paavo Vayrynen. At the airport he granted a brief interview. Hannu Reime reports:

[Begin recording in English, fading into Finnish translation] [Rheime] "The basic characteristic of Iranian foreign policy consists in the fact that the present leadership of the country wants to spread the Islamic revolution to other countries, primarily to the neighboring countries, Foreign Minister Hammadi says. Iran has continuously interfered with our internal affairs and Iran has poor relations not only with us, but with its other neighboring countries: Afghanistan, the Soviet Union and Turkey as well. And this policy, which impairs neighborly relations, originates in the Iranian leaders' belief that they have a kind of mission to take the Islamic revolution to other countries. As far as our country is concerned, this has taken the form of sending terrorists to Iraqi territory and fomenting religious schism. We do not like war, but we must defend our independence and our territorial inviolability. I really hope that the present leadership in Iran has no plans for expansion and that an all-out war between our countries can be avoided, Iraqi Foreign Minister Sa'dun Hammadi says."

"Recently, the security of the Persian Gulf, or as the Arabs call it, the Arabian Gulf, has been much talked about. What is the Iraqi viewpoint on this matter?"

[Hammadi] "The security of the Arabian Gulf is guaranteed in the best possible way if the big powers, and particularly the two leading superpowers, keep out of the area. It is only the superpowers that create insecurity in this area while they are competing for superior authority. For this reason, the Arabian Gulf should remain a nonalined region so that the big powers will stay away from it. We are very worried about the fact that the Americans have lately done their best to acquire bases in Oman, Somalia and Kenya on the pretext of the situation in Afghanistan and the Iranian hostage crisis. We regard this as a threat to our own security, and as an Arab country we consider it our duty to defend our own territorial inviolability. In this and other matters we are in very close cooperation with the other Arab countries of the area." [end recording]

Besides international questions, the talks to be conducted between Hammadi and his Finnish hosts will also deal with Finnish-Iraqi relations.

GOVERNMENT 'PUZZLED' BY TIME LIMIT ON CARTER SANCTIONS

LD131824 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1900 GMT 13 Apr 80 LD

[By Arthur Williamson, PA chief political correspondent]

[Text] There is no official Whitehall reaction to President Carter's statement that he has set a time limit on when he expects to receive Western support in full-scale sanctions against Iran to secure the release of the American hostages. It is not only government policy to respond to diplomacy by television, only to official communications.

If the President's remarks are interpreted correctly, he has already told his allies, presumably in the "position paper" delivered by ambassadors in Western capitals, of the date by which he expects them to respond to his appeal for co-operation and support.

In government quarters, President Carter's reference to a time limit is puzzling. It is now being regarded as not so much an ultimatum as a set period at the end of which America will act alone in retaliation against Iran if the other Western nations have not thrown in their lot with him.

The British Government takes the view that there is no reason to include this country in Mr Carter's impatience. It is admitted by American officials that since her visit to Washington just before Christmas it has become apparent that Mrs Thatcher is one of the President's staunchest supporters.

But while this support applies mainly to the Afghanistan affair, Americans consider Britain just as reluctant as her European partners to indulge in the strong measures of economic and diplomatic sanctions President Carter is asking for.

In the case of Britain, Americans do realise there are legal problems involved in imposing sanctions. They also realise that British governments do not like exercising sanctions unless they are approved by the United Nations.

Britain's hesitancy is seen more as a question of legal authority and the length of time it will require to obtain it in order to be associated with the measures President Carter wants to impose.

While there is no immediate comment on the television interview given by President Carter broadcast by the BBC tonight, it is expected that there will be parliamentary questions on his statements when the Commons reassembles tomorrow after the Easter recess.

DAILY TELEGRAPH: CARTER DESERVES BRITISH BACKING

LD141107 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 14 Apr 80 p 20 LD

[Editorial: "Carter Demands Action"]

[Text] President Carter deserves our backing for two good reasons. First, the Iranian invasion of the U.S. Embassy and seizure of its staff as hostages is an outrage against the law of nations and a threat to all of us. Were the ayatollah's regime to benefit politically from their defiance of civilised conventions, others would be tempted to repeat them, or take them even further. It is as though our own embassy and diplomatic immunities had been violated.

Furthermore, the U.S. is an ally, the principal partner in the Western alliance. Whatever mistakes may have been made in Washington--and THE DAILY TELEGRAPH has never shrunk from outspoken though constructive criticism in these matters--America has borne a disproportionately large share of the free world's defence burden. It was the Americans who took the lead in seeking to mobilise the alliance for political and defence responses to the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, though laggard European powers have an even more direct interest in keeping Soviet hands off the oil supplies of the area, as President Carter now reminds us.

It behoves each member of the Western alliance to seek to understand other governments' preoccupations and dilemmas, if it is to expect similar accommodation. Now that President Carter has at last decided to take the bull by the horns, it is pointless to chide him for his previous indecisiveness, the more so since Iranian lawlessness created a precedent which neither statesmen nor international lawyers had foreseen. To make too much of the exigencies of the presidential election is sententious. Should we prefer a government insensitive to the feeling of the people?

But however strong and justified the American demand for European support, it would be counter-productive for Washington to expect its judgment to be accepted blindly. Britain's views on the efficacy of economic sanctions differ from America's. European opposition to military operations against Iran at the present juncture is sincere. It is important that Washington work out through consultation a strategy and tactics which men of courage and goodwill this side of the Atlantic, and that certainly includes her majesty's government, can be honestly persuaded to accept. Undue impatience or disregard for European sentiments will only play into the hands of the Russians and those Europeans who, for ulterior motives, oppose action common with America. Likewise Europeans must take very serious account of the danger of a recrudescence of American isolationism. To a legitimate exasperation with Europe's inadequate military effort and grievances about patchy support for America could be added a search for a scapegoat. This fatal combination must be avoided at all costs.

COMMUNIST PARTY DECLINES INVITATION TO PARIS MEETING

LD131718 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1651 GMT 13 Apr 80 LD

[Text] The British Communist Party has turned down an invitation to a meeting of European communist parties, which is seen by political observers as an attempt to back the Soviet Union's intervention in Afghanistan. The meeting, scheduled for April 28 and 29 in Paris and about "peace and disarmament", is being arranged by the French and Polish parties--supporters of the Soviet Union's Afghanistan policy. The British party, which has condemned the Soviet intervention, said today that it would be unhelpful to proceed with the Paris meeting "on the present basis"--but it would be willing to attend if it were changed into a private, consultative meeting. The West German party is going but the Spanish, Italian and Yugoslav parties have refused, as the Swedes are likely to do.

In his statement Mr Rolandhis also says that the contacts of the president of the republic and of himself outside Cyprus have always been useful.

KLIRIDHIS-CAGATAY STATEMENT RECEIVES CRITICISM

Government Statement

NC112005 Nicosia Domestic Television Service in Greek 1730 GMT 11 Apr 80 NC

[Official Government of Cyprus statement released 11 April on Kliridhis-Cagatay joint statement--ready by announcer]

[Text] Today's Kliridhis-Cagatay joint statement fails to refer to the 19 May 1979 Kiprianou-Denktas agreement, which contains and completes the four guidelines of the Makarios-Denktas agreement of 12 February 1977. This omission harms the efforts of the Greek Cypriot side and those of the UN Secretary General for a resumption of the talks based on what has been agreed upon.

The extent to which this omission is harmful is evident in the following basic reasons:

1. Point 2 of the agreement provides that the basis for the talks will be the guidelines contained in the Makarios-Denktas agreement of 12 February 1977 and the UN resolutions on the Cyprus issue.

2. Point 5 of the agreement provides for the return of the inhabitants of Varosha to their city and for priority to be given to this issue.

3. Point 3 provides that the human rights and basic freedoms of all citizens of the republic will be respected.

The Turkish Cypriot side, by initially accepting the 19 May agreement, accepted the UN resolutions which clearly provide for the return of all the refugees to their homes under secure conditions; the withdrawal of Turkish troops from Cyprus; the condemnation of the establishment of a Turkish Cypriot state; and the establishment of a unified Cypriot state.

As is known, the UN secretary general made the validation of the 19 May 1979 agreement a prerequisite for the resumption of the dialog in his latest consultations. This was contained in the opening statement made by his representative at the talks. Based on this agreement the new round of talks opened on 15 June 1979.

Today's joint statement does not mention the 19 May agreement and gives rise to serious thoughts over what the joint statement is aiming at, and, in particular, what Mr Glavkos Kliridhis is aiming at. Mr Kliridhis is very well aware that the Turkish Cypriot leadership, since 15 June 1979, when the new round of talks started, has been exerting strenuous and persistent efforts to sidestep, alter or to weaken the agreement and thus serve the Turkish aspirations.

AKEL Reaction

NC121800 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1630 GMT 12 Apr 80 NC

[Text] A statement released by the secretariat of the AKEL Central Committee on the joint statement by Democratic Rally leader Kliridhis and Turkish Cypriot National Unity Party leader Cagatay states that, although AKEL is ready and will seek to have meetings with the leaders of the Turkish Cypriot parties, it considers the condition regarding the submission of an application for such meetings to the prime minister of the so-called Turkish Federated State of Cyprus to be unacceptable. The statement adds that AKEL does not object to meetings at this or at other levels because it believes that well-prepared meetings and constructive discussions at such meetings within the framework of the line and policy charted by National Council and the Council of Ministers could possibly be of service to the struggle for a fair, peaceful and mutually acceptable and viable Cyprus solution.

In conclusion, the AKEL statement criticizes the Kliridhis-Cagatay joint statement for failing to make any reference to the Kiprianou-Denktas agreement and stresses that such failure does not aid the UN secretary general's efforts for the resumption of the intercommunal talks based on the Makarios-Denktas and the Kiprianou-Denktas agreements.

The pan-Cypriot committee of refugees has also issued a statement criticizing the failure in the joint statement to make any reference to the Kiprianou-Denktas agreement.

EDEK's Comments

NC130610 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 0430 GMT 13 Apr 80 NC

[Text] An EDEK spokesman has strongly criticized the omission of any reference to the UN resolutions and the Kiprianou-Denktas agreement in the Kliridhis-Cagatay joint statement, made at their 10 April meeting. The spokesman said that this omission is consistent with Kliridhis' acceptance of the U.S. plan on the Cyprus issue.

MIKHAILIDHIS URGES CLARIFICATION OF 'BIZONALITY, SECURITY'

NC101130 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1030 GMT 10 Apr 80 NC

[Excerpts] President Kiprianou has again stressed that our effort is for the return of peace and happiness to our island, based on the unity of state and people, the restoration of our territorial integrity and independence and on the consolidation of our freedom. Mr Kiprianou stressed that in this effort we are inspired by a spirit of good will and by fraternal feelings for all the inhabitants of our island, without exception.

In a message read at the 13th international convention of the Lions District 117--for Greece and Cyprus--in Limassol today, the president described the presence of representatives of Lions clubs from Greece as another demonstration of their love and support for the Greek Cypriots.

Speaking at the congress, House President Mikhailidhis called on the Turkish side to clearly state what is the legal meaning of the terms bizonality and security which it has been asking us to accept, so that the intercommunal talks may resume. Otherwise, he said, the bypassing of these terms must be reconsidered, with the goal of holding a dialog with good will and broadmindedness based on the 19 May agreement.

Mr Mikhailidhis said: Let us start a true dialog without opening statements and television cameras. Let us speak about concrete things and not embark on discussions of terms. He added: We believe that this practical approach is the sole course that would lead to progress toward talks.

The House president said that we strongly desire to negotiate for a solution to the internal aspect of our problem, but we must not be misunderstood to mean that our eagerness could make us sacrifice our very cause solely in exchange for the commencement of talks.

Osman Orek Responds

TA111818 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1530 GMT 11 Apr 80 TA

[Text] The acting president of the Turkish Cypriot Legislative Assembly, Osman Orek, has replied to the statement made by the President of the Greek Cypriot House of Representatives, Mikhailidhis, at the Greek and Cypriot Lions Club calling on the Turkish Cypriots to begin a special dialog without an opening statement and away from the fuss of the news media. In his statement, Orek said that Mikhailidhis' call was a new Greek Cypriot maneuver aimed at discarding the exhausting efforts made for the resumption of the talks under the auspices of the UN secretary general. Noting that the Greek Cypriots had once again exposed themselves as the intransigent side by rejecting the recent proposals UN Secretary General Waldheim made with the aim of resuming the talks, Orek said that the Greek Cypriots have lost hope that the UN Secretariat General, which is fully aware of the Cyprus problem, can be further deceived by Greek Cypriot propaganda.

Orek recalled that the Greek Cypriots were attempting either to deny or to misinterpret agreements reached in Vienna and later by Denktas and Makarios, but that due to the presence of impartial observers at these meetings they were unable to substantiate their denials or misinterpretations. Orek added that Mikhailidhis knew very well the meaning of the terms bizonality and security as agreed at the two summit meetings and what importance the Turkish Cypriot side attaches to these terms in the light of past experiences.

Orek called on Mikhailidhis to renounce his useless efforts aimed at discarding these significant aspects of the Cyprus problem and to call on the Greek Cypriot side to respect the agreements reached at the summit meetings and to come to the negotiating table in accordance with the recent Waldheim proposals aimed at resuming the talks. He said: If Mikhailidhis is sincere in his wish to have honorable talks with us (?in private) under equal conditions and through mutual respect for rights he can do so. I reiterate my invitation to hold talks or to establish a dialog as the parliamentarians and the elected representatives of our respective communities.

TFSC REPRESENTATIVE IN NEW YORK SENDS LETTER TO WALDHEIM

TA110639 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 0430 GMT 11 Apr 80 TA

[Text] The Turkish Federated State of Cyprus has reiterated that talk about a legal Cypriot Government was out of question until the Turkish and Greek Cypriot communities are joined under a federal roof. This statement was made by Naim Atalay, the Turkish Cypriot representative in New York, in a letter to UN Secretary General Kurt Waldheim.

The TRT Cyprus Bureau reports that in his letter, Atalay recalls that two separate administrations exist in the island and adds that the Turkish administration in northern Cyprus is as autonomous as the one in the south. The letter further states that the Greek Cypriot community has no right or authority to speak on behalf of the Turkish Cypriot community. Atalay asked that his letter be circulated among the UN members as a General Assembly and Security Council document.

I DHIMOKRATIKI CALLS ON KIPRIANOU TO BE MORE DECISIVE

NC140906 Nicosia I DHIMOKRATIKI in Greek 14 Apr 80 p 1 NC

[Text] The extreme right has currently taken aim at all the democratic patriotic forces. Its escalating attack does not only aim at diversion that will facilitate the promotion of the American partitionist plans but also at creating polarization as a lever to weaken the popular forces.

Unfortunately, President Kiprianou's government is not only strong enough today to face this well-planned attack, but owing to its many weaknesses it also provides support and feeds the extreme right.

Not to mention the fact that particular members of the government participate in supporting the attack of the democratic rally for as yet indiscernable motives.

Before it is too late, the president must stop being ambivalent and at least convince the people that he has power, or even better, utilize the power of the popular masses who have entrusted him with the task of guiding the pro-Makarios people, and who now view his timid inactivity and unexplained indecision with disappointment.

The popular forces of the progressive right, the center and the left, which march the painful trail for the salvation of this country with democratic consistency and unwavering stability, will neither permit deviation nor disintegration, the advance of the extreme right nor the eroding fatalism of those in power today.

The president must realize the basis of his powers and rely only on these so as to extricate himself from the deadlock into which he is being led by the mistakes and the policy of some of his collaborators, who are sitting on the political fence.

PAPER REPORTS AKEL WAGING ANTIGOVERNMENT 'WAR OF ATTRITION'

NC130945 Nicosia I MAKHI in Greek 13 Apr 80 pp 1, 8 NC

[Text] According to our exclusive information from reliable sources--which is verified not only by political and diplomatic cirlces but also by the very facts--AKEL has declared, obviously on Moscow's instructions, a "war of attrition" against the Kiprianou government. AKEL's ultimate aim is to portray the government in the people's eyes as a failure and demand that it be reshuffled with the participation of persons who belong or are close to AKEL.

According to the same information, in waging its three-pronged "war of attrition" against the government AKEL uses its press organs and APOYEVMATINI [EVENING DAILY] as well as the party cadres and those of PEO, EDON [United Democratic Youth Organiation], POGO [Pan-Cypriot Federation of Women's Organizations] and other leftwing organizations.

One prong of AKEL's "war of attrition" against the government tends to render any cooperation or even mere understanding between DIKO [Democratic Party] and DISI [Democratic Rally] unfeasible because such a development would turn the rightwing into a giant. In this case, not only would AKEL no longer be a regulating factor in political affairs but it would also become isolated from the overwhelming majority of the people and would never dare threaten and blackmail the government

The second prong also aims at blocking unity and cooperation within the rightwing while, at the same time, portrays the government as not fulfilling its declarations and promises. This prong deals with the political trials, the "purge" and persecution of fighters and nationalists. From the house rostrum or through its press organs, AKEL craftily spreads rumors, invents dangers, muddles issues and presents the government as favoring the "coupists," tolerating illegal actions by the rightists, closing its eyes to subversive activities and as impotent to fulfill its promises to the people and perform its duties.

The third prong of the "war of attrition," which AKEL is intensively waging against the government, concerns traps that the Communist Party sets for the government. AKEL throws the government into these traps and then comes in to strike at it cunningly. A manifest example of this prong is the recent taxation measures which AKEL allowed to be submitted to the house by the government, although realizing that they were sucking the people's blood. AKEL voted for these measures and now, after a general outcry by the people, it calls for their revision. AKEL even dares to warn and threaten the government that the people will not tolerate the sweeping taxation measures.

According to our information, many DIKO and government elements have a "firsthand" knowledge of AKEL's instructions to its organs about the "war of attrition" against the government as well as Archbishop Khrisostomos. Some of these elements have already started talking about confronting and overwhelming AKEL's war, which is being waged both secretly and openly on all fronts and aims at weakening the government.

OFFICIALS DISCUSS RELATIONS, ECONOMIC COOPERATION WITH IRAQ

Panayiotopoulos' Departure Statement

AT111825 Athens Domestic Television Service in Greek 1800 GMT 11 Apr 80 AT [Text] Trade Minister Panayiotopoulos left for Iraq this afternoon on an official 5-day visit for talks on technical and economic cooperation.

[Begin videorecording of Panayiotopoulos interview] Question: Mr Minister, we would like you to tell us about the contacts you will have during your visit to Iraq.

Panayiotopoulos: As you know I am going to Iraq at the head of the Greek delegation to the Greek-Iraqi ministerial conference. In Iraq we will not only have to deal with problems of my own ministry, the Ministry of Trade, but also with issues related to industry, joint enterprises, the merchant marine, tourism, commercial organizations, and technical projects now being undertaken by important Greek companies in Iraq.

I would also like you to know that Iraq is the second largest exporter of crude oil to Greece. Since the Karamanlis visit to Baghdad, which I believe was a milestone in the development of relations between the two countries, there have been numerous prospects for a large increase in the quantities [of oil] received from Iraq.

Consequently, we have a new line for strengthening our relations with this country. It is sufficient for me to state that Iraq is the only country in the world which I am visiting for the third time since I became minister and many of my colleagues have visited it repeatedly. At this very moment the Iraqi minister of industry is in Greece for discussions with Minister of Industry Evert on questions also related to oil and cooperation in the industrial sector. Our relationships are unlimited. We have developed relations with this country and the other countries of the Middle East, which allows us to believe that in the future we will have developments in many sectors--primarily economic.

Question: Mr Minister, is the interest in our own exports to Iraq sufficiently great?

Panayiotopoulos: In all these countries there is a great deal of interest because they import consumer goods. We, on the other hand, are a country which exports consumer goods. Therefore there are always limits to a further increase in our exports. An important sector which we must emphasize is the sector of technical enterprises. Our own technical enterprises are capable of undertaking extremely important projects in Iraq.

Joint Press Conference

[Text] At a joint press conference held today by the Greek and Iraq ministers of industry it was stated that relations between the two countries, which have developed considerably during the past 3 years, could be further expanded because both the desire and the prerequisites for this expansion exist. The Iraqi minister, after a series of visits to Greece's industrial plants, stated that he ascertained that Greece's industrial potential is rapidly developing. The Greek minister said our relations with Iraq are leading to a speedy development of commercial and economic relations with this country.

TO VIMA NOTES 'ALERT' OF U.S. FORCES IN MIDDLE EAST

AT131625 Athens TO VIMA in Greek 13 Apr 80 p 3 AT

[Dispatch by TO VIMA correspondent St. Evstathiadhis on an exercise 'of alert and deployment' by U.S. forces in the Eastern Mediterranean and the Middle East]

[Text] Washington, 12 April--U.S. naval and air forces in the Eastern Mediterranean and Middle East areas were placed on alert as of last Friday [11 April]--and are taking part in an "alert and deployment" exercise within a broader plan for the mobilization of the newly formed U.S. rapid deployment force. The mobilization of these U.S. forces is an extension of a large-scale table-top exercise which started in Washington Thursday and will be continued until next Monday [14 April]. It is considered to be the most important such exercise in recent years.

The rapid deployment force was created for the purpose of "dealing with emergency situations in areas of interest to the United States" and has not been completely constituted. It includes units from all branches with emphasis on the Air Force and the transportation of troops and materials.

U.S. aircraft with the electronic early-warning system which were recently stationed by the United States in Egypt are being used in patrols over a broad area of the Eastern Mediterranean within the limits of this "alert exercise." Warships of the 6th Fleet, including one aircraft carrier, have been deployed in an area extending southwest from Crete to the open waters off Egypt and southeast of Cyprus. During the exercise emphasis is being given to the review of preparedness, the coordination of naval units and electronic communication.

Neither Washington nor Brussels announced many details of the exercise except for a simple statement at NATO headquarters. This, in any case, falls within the entire war-propaganda mobilization of the United States in the face of recent developments on the issue of the Tehran hostages. European diplomats and military persons also consider this exercise to be a "slight hint" of U.S. military presence aimed at certain U.S. allies who do not appear sufficiently prepared to aline themselves with the U.S. policy toward Iran. The exercise, in conclusion, is also described as a type of general rehearsal for an airlift which would transport U.S. troops from West Germany to the Persian Gulf area over central Europe, the Eastern Mediterranean and the Middle East and would be utilized by the Americans in the eventuality of military action in the Persian Gulf area.

The aircraft carrier "Eisenhower" with 85 bomber aircraft and a force of 4,900 men is also due in the Persian Gulf area within a few days but this move is not related to the rapid deployment force exercise according to official Washington sources. U.S. surveillance and communications bases situated within Eastern Mediterranean and Middle Eastern countries are also taking part in this exercise which involves a total of 10,000 men. At this stage of the exercise, U.S. Air Force transport units stationed in Germany are not yet involved.

KKE SECRETARY EXPLAINS POSITIONS ON PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION

AT131546 Athens RIZOSPASTIS in Greek 13 Apr 80 p 1 AT

[Remarks by Kharilaos Florakis, secretary of the KKE (Exterior) Central Committee, on the party's position regarding the presidential election in an address at a 12 April meeting of the Piraeus local KKE organization.]

[Excerpts] Kharilaos Florakis, secretary of the KKE Central Committee, speaking to representatives of the party's local organization at Piraeus, also referred to the question of the presidential election.

"For some time now," he said, "the bourgeois press has presented the question of the election of the new president of the republic as the epicenter of current political developments. Naturally this is not accidental nor is it the result of the importance and the interest presented by the presidential election itself.

"This is primarily due to the fact that the various factions of the ruling class are attempting to exploit the issue of the presidential elections to the fullest for their own particular political interest. Naturally, similar interest is demonstrated by the U.S.-NATO imperialists who are interested in strengthening and expanding their own positions in our country. The ruling party is attempting to strengthen its position, which was severely shaken by the failure of its policy and in order to keep itself in authority. Other political forces deal with the issue as a matter for their own political survival. The well-known revisionist group, particularly the so called 'party of the interior,' seeks cooperation with the 'New Democracy' party in support of a joint candidate of 'broad support' in 'exchange' for the adoption of the simple proportional representation system of election. Within the limits of these developments we may both have a new government as well as early elections.

"How does our party view this problem?

"1--The KKE does not view the new president of the republic as "a ruler with no responsibility" but rather as the representative of a specific policy, particularly because the Constitution now in force gives him great possibilities to implement and enforce his policy. Therefore, any candidate for the presidency of the republic will be judged by us politically on the basis of his specific political positions on the country's main problems, on the main problems of foreign and domestic policy.

"2--It is obvious that the KKE is not likely to support any candidate who supports the policy of returning to NATO, of preserving U.S. bases, of the utilization of our country as a base for serving strategic U.S.-NATO imperialist aims in the Middle East, the Persian Gulf and the Balkans.

"3--This position of principles cannot become the barter for granting the 'simple proportional' election system. The simple proportional system of election is the most democratic and just election system. Such a system, however, cannot determine the direction of the country's foreign and domestic policies. The system could be applied yet, at the same time, the ties with the U.S.-NATO apparatus could still be strengthened. The simple proportional system of election for which our party is fighting is a question of struggle for its enforcement but is not a matter for barter.

"4--It is obvious that such a position of principles cannot remain a simple declaration. It must become a matter of practical implementation and action both within and outside the Chamber of Deputies.

"5--In reference to the dilemma presented--'either you support the presidential candidate of our choice or we will hold general elections'--then without question we will opt for elections. This, first of all, is because the political foundation, which our party sets as a prerequisite for the new president, cannot be bartered either with the election system or with elections. At the same time new elections are necessary. It is a fact that the current Chamber of Deputies does not represent the will of the electorate. Over and above the well-known criminal election law on the basis of which the current Chamber emerged, we also have had the addition of new changes and separations of positions. New elections will furnish our party with the opportunity to expound and present its policy to the people and to strengthen its position among the people and in the Chamber of Deputies. This in itself guarantees change."

OFFICIALS COMMENT ON IRAN-IRAQ TENSION, HOSTAGE SITUATION

Demirel Statement

TA111450 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1400 GMT 11 Apr 80 TA

[Excerpt] In his statement upon emerging from the Cankaya Mansion at the end of his meeting with the acting president today, Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel referred to the recently strained relations between Iraq and Iran and the situation of the U.S. hostages in Iran.

[Begin Demirel recording] An extremely difficult situation has been created around our country. The tension in Iraqi-Iranian relations and the tension in Iranian-U.S. relations which was created by the issue of the hostages in Iran have reached great dimensions. It is impossible to foresee what these will lead to. Let us hope that there will not be a hot situation--a war--in this area and that bullets will not be fired. The Turkish Republic has always supported peace, justice and law and we will, of course, continue to support them. However, if there is a fire in a neighboring house, it is impossible for us not to be disturbed by it. [end recording]

Ecevit News Conference

TA121732 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 12 Apr 80 TA

[Excerpts] RPP leader Bulent Ecevit has said that, considering the conditions facing the Middle East and the recently increased world tension, the strained relations between Iraq and Iran constitute a great concern for Turkey and for international relations.

In a new conference at the parliament today, Ecevit expressed the belief that the establishment of good relations between Iraq and Iran would benefit both countries. He proposed that Iraq and Iran charge a mutual friend with the duty of mediation. Ecevit noted that the PLO leadership or a group comprised of PLO members could act as the mediator.

In reply to a question, Ecevit said that he had not received reports that the United States had submitted certain requests to Turkey as well concerning the sanctions it had decided to impose on Iran. Ecevit noted: If there were such requests, I do not know what stand the government has adopted or will adopt. Our views on the subject have always been clear: We are firmly opposed to allowing our soil to be used in any way as a means of threatening our neighbors and friends--with whom we have good relations--or as a means of interfering in their internal affairs.

Ecevit pointed out that his party is particularly concerned that, in view of the tension and the dangerous atmosphere created by the recent developments between Iran and the United States, a new conflict will arise between Iran and Iraq. Referring to Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel's statement on the recent developments in the Middle East, Ecevit added that he shares Demirel's concern.

AUSTRIA'S PAHR WARNS EEC AGAINST EFTA DISCRIMINATION

AU141000 Vienna WIENER ZEITUNG in German 12 Apr 80 p 1 AU

[Unattributed report: "Pahr Warns Against Discrimination"]

[Text] Lisbon--Speaking before the 66th session of the Council of Europe foreign ministers' committee in Lisbon, Foreign Minister Willibald Pahr declared that he emphatically opposed the attempt of the European Communities to treat Austria and the other EFTA [European Free Trade Association] countries just like all other third countries regarding Greece's accession to the EEC. This discrimination against the EFTA states among other things fails to take into consideration the "European quality" and the high degress of reciprocity in Austria's relations with the EEC; it is also in contradiction with the EEC's own declaration that it intends to establish "special relations" with the other European states. Austria believes, Pahr stressed, "that as participants in the European free trade system we not only must adopt the resulting economic commitments but that we are also entitled to the unimpaired benefit of free trade advantages."

PCP, PCF LEADERS ISSUE JOINT COMMUNIQUE IN LISBON

UL111149 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 8 Apr 80 p 5 LD

["Text" of joint communique issued by the French Communist Party, PCF, and Portuguese Communist Party, PCP, after 7 April Lisbon stopover meeting between PCF Secretary General Marchais and PCP Secretary General Cunhal: "PCF-PCP: To Strengthen Solidarity"]

During his Lisbon visit PCF Secretary General Georges Marchais met with PCP Secretary General Alvaro Cunhal. Participating in the talks were, for the PCP, Politburo member and Central Committee Secretary Fernando Blanqui Teixeira and Central Committee member Albano Nunes; and for the PCF, Politburo member and Central Committee Secretary Maxime Gremetz and Central Committee member Jean-Francois Gau.

The leaders of the two parties carried out a detailed exchange of information on the situation in their respective countries and on the two parties' activities, as well as on different aspects of the international situation. The international situation is developing in favor of the forces of democracy, national independence and socialism.

They believe that, recently, the forces of progress in general have achieved major successes. These successes are also blows against imperialism, which seeks to maintain its positions and to reconquer lost ground. Imperialism is launching a frenzied arms race. Intensifying its bloc policy, it is revitalizing NATO, imposing on the countries of Western Europe the deployment of 600 U.S. military missiles, and exerting political, economic and military pressure on developing countries.

The PCP and PCF reaffirm their determination to do their utmost to oppose the escalation of the arms race and to work for the effective abandonment of the deployment of new nuclear missiles in Europe and for the opening of negotiations leading to the reduction of armaments. They oppose the blackmail of the Moscow Olympics and the threats hanging over the Madrid conference, whose results must facilitate the consolidation of detente.

The people's deep hopes clearly rest with the development of relations of peaceful cooperation between all countries and with their desire to live in a world freed from the threat of a terrible war.

Thus, the two parties believe that action adopted for disarmament and peace is a prime task for all communists. Moreover, they declare themselves ready to participate in the joint initiatives of our continent's peace-loving forces.

The PCF and PCP repeat their opposition to the process of imperialist integration. The PCF denounces the plans to enlarge the EEC to the sole benefit of the multinationals which dominate it--plans which would seriously harm the interests of the French and other peoples. The PCP is firmly opposed to Portugal's integration into the EEC. Integration would have disastrous consequences for the Portuguese economy and would compromise national independence. Integration also helps the reactionary forces to justify the restoration of monopolist capitalism, liquidated by the April Revolution, on the pretext of needing to harmonize the socioeconomic substructures with the Common Market.

The two parties consider cooperation and international solidarity between the socialist countries, the workers movement in the capitalist countries, and national liberation movements to be of fundamental importance in the struggle against imperialism, for the success of the peoples' action, and for social progress, democracy, independence, peace and socialism.

Alvaro Cunhal and Georges Marchais expressed their satisfaction with the bonds of friendship which have long existed between the two parties and peoples. They expressed their desire to develop them still further at a time when the offensive against the Portuguese revolution's gains is at its height, and when big capital in France is placing the heavy burden of crisis upon the popular social strata.

The meeting between the two secretaries general took place in an atmosphere of warm friendship. The PCP confirmed its invitation to a PCF delegation led by Georges Marchais to visit Portugal.

FISHING BOATS SEIZED BY MOROCCO AS 'BUREAUCRATIC MEASURE'

LD112348 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 2200 GMT 11 Apr 80 LD

[Text] We have received a report from Rabat tonight which says that a diplomatic source in the Moroccan capital has confirmed that the Moroccan Navy has seized about 20--we have reported 21--Spanish fishing boats. The report from Rabat states that they have been taken to the military port of Casablanca.

In Rabat it is being noted that this is the first time that such a large number of fishing boats have been seized off the Moroccan coast. The same source says that the Spanish uthorities have received assurances from the Moroccan Government that this is nothing more than a bureaucratic measure, caused by the activity of the fishing boats in restricted waters and by the need to check their fishing licenses. The source adds that the seizures have not produced any incidents and that everything is proceeding properly.

However, we must emphasize that there is much concern and the news has further upset relations between Madrid and Rabat which, at the moment, are (?sensitive).

PAHR COMMENTS ON U.S. LETTER ON IRAN SANCTIONS

AU141706 Vienna Domestic Service in German 1011 GMT 14 Apr 80

[Barbara Coudenhove-Calergi commentary on West European reaction to Carter appeal for sanctions against Iran, with recorded excerpts of Foreign Minister Pahr comment; date, place not given]

[Summary] "The Americans are most deeply disappointed over what they regard as a lack of solidarity on the part of their allies, and the Europeans are rather obviously annoyed over the way the United States is trying to harness them to its cart. The question of European sanctions against Iran, yes or no, has put the Atlantic alliance to a severe test." In the past few days and weeks the EEC, as well as its individual members, have repeatedly and increasingly been urged by diplomatic notes and statements by the U.S. President to join in the sanctions. "At the end of last week, neutral Austria, too, received such an appeal to the allied and friendly nations. Here is what Foreign Minister Pahr said in this context:

[Begin Pahr recording] "We are currently studying this memorandum and are considering the steps, or rather the way in which we can answer it. Participation in economic sanctions against a third state is certainly a problem that warrants careful consideration from the viewpoint of our neutrality commitments. I reckon that the Austrian answer will be submitted in the next few days." [end recording]

Chancellor Kreisky, however, has left little doubt that the Austrian answer will be negative.

As far as the U.S. allies in the EEC are concerned, their foreign ministers at their recent Lisbon meeting, while categorically demanding from Iran the release of the hostages, said "no" regarding the severance of diplomatic relations, and showed themselves not very enthusiastic about economic sanctions, some of them claiming that they lacked the legal instruments to enforce such a trade embargo in their countries. Others, notably the FRG and Japan, are still rather dependent on Iranian oil and are not inclined to completely antagonize Tehran for Washington's sake; and France as a matter of principle does not want to let its foreign policy be influenced by faraway Washington.

"All this has of course not been said in so many words by the government chiefs and the foreign ministers anywhere--but observers are quite unanimous in their assessment that there is some bitter feeling at the European state chancellieries over the U.S. pressure. The Europeans are particularly unhappy about the fact that the U.S. wishes were simply dished out to them without adequate preparation. The fact that Carter is in the middle of the election campaign and urgently needs foreign policy successes is also regarded in Europe as fateful. Last weekend Carter told European TV journalists that he had set a deadline for the hesitant allies' sanctions against Iran. Thus a decision should actually be made either by next Monday, when the EEC foreign ministers are to meet in Luxembourg, or at the meeting of the EEC chiefs of state a week later.

GENSCHER, VANCE HOLD PHONE TALKS ON HOSTAGES, OLYMPICS

LD151016 Hamburg DPA in German 0915 GMT 15 Apr 80

[Text] Bonn--Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher held a detailed telephone conversation with his American counterpart Cyrus Vance yesterday evening concerning the hostages in Tehran and the Olympic boycott. The Foreign Ministry announced today that Genscher briefed Vance on the latest state of German opinion. Vance "strongly approved" the Federal Government's stance.

The latest state of affairs suggests that a decision on EEC sanctions against Iran will be taken at the EEC foreign ministers meeting in Luxembourg on Monday. Regarding the Olympic boycott, following the SPD/FDP coalition consultations at the weekend it is seen as certain that the Federal Government will follow the American example and recommend that the National Olympic Committee oppose participation by German athletes in the Moscow Olympics.

FRG AMBASSADOR ILL, UNABLE TO RETURN FROM IRAN

LD141240 Hamburg DPA in German 1126 GMT Apr 80

[Excerpt] Bonn--The German ambassador to Tehran, Gerhard Ritzel, who like his EC colleagues has been recalled for consultation, has suddenly become ill. He was therefore unable to fly to Bonn today as expected. The Foreign Ministry stated that Ritzel has possibly contracted pneumonia.

According to the ministry, the ambassador will be brought to Bonn in the early hours of Tuesday morning by special German Red Cross plane. It is hoped that, despite his illness, the ambassador will be able to report on the same day.

SOVIET ENVOY HINTS AT CONSEQUENCES OF OLYMPIC BOYCOTT

LD141328 Hamburg DPA in German 1221 GMT 14 Apr 80

[Text] Essen--Soviet Ambassador Vladimir Semenov today hinted at political consequences for relations with the Federal Republic in the event that the Federal Republic joined in a boycott of the Olympic games in Moscow. During a visit to Essen, the diplomat told journalists: "The Soviet people will naturally think back to the Olympic games and to all the circumstances accompanying them... What sticks in people's memories plays a role in politics." This also had to be taken into consideration in relationship of the two states.

However, Semenov as good as ruled out a "sign" by the USSR on the Afghanistan issue as demanded by the Federal Government. "Contractual relations cannot easily be broken," he said, alluding to the recently concluded agreement on the stationing of Soviet troops in Afghanistan. The two countries had had friendly contractual relations since 1921, to which "noninterference in internal affairs" applied.

Semenov announced that in a few days head of state Leonid Brezhnev would publish an appeal to the population of the Federal Republic. This appeal was in connection with the publication of a book on questions of international policy. In the work, Brezhnev had found "good and warm words" for the federal citizens. The Soviet Union intended to do everything to retain and multiply the results of detente. The diplomat said: "This is our strong and firm course and no one will divert us from it."

Semenov took the factfinding visit to Essen as an occasion to have business talks with Berthold Beitz, chairman of the Krupp supervisory board. The diplomat also indicated to the press that the Soviet Union was interested in increasing deliveries of natural gas to the Federal Republic.

SCHMIDT URGES 'BALANCED REASON' IN CRISIS MANAGEMENT

LD142108 Hamburg DPA in German 2029 GMT 14 Apr 80

[Excerpt] Neunkirchen/Saar--According to Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, the Federal Government will continue to "maintain cool, balanced reason" in the present world political crisis situation and "not be even more American than the Americans themselves." Speaking at an SPD election meeting in Neunkirchen in Saarland this evening, the chancellor warned against the German Government also adding to the nervousness in the world. We should not allow ourselves to be frightened nor should we spread fear, he said. Addressing the opposition, Schmidt said that "those who call the Federal Government's prudent, statesmanly sensible restraint cowardice and utter harsh words are a danger to our lives."

Chancellor Schmidt stressed that the crisis in Afghanistan can be solved only by a "mixture of diplomatic pressure and consideration for the need for prestige and security" of the Soviet Union. The chancellor named the Federal Republic's main interests in the following order: securing peace, the connection between the two German states and joint action with the other alliance partners.

SCHMIDT ANALYZES WORLD SITUATION IN 11 APR SPEECH

DW131250 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU in German 14 Apr 80 p 2

[Excerpts from speech by Chancellor Helmut Schmidt at Essen's Gruga Hall on 11 April as supplied to the press by the SPD headquarters in Bonn]

[Text] The anxieties pertaining to world and peace policies make it hard for me to concentrate on election campaigns.

Unlike the conflict situation of the summer of 1914, which led to World War I even though none of the powers involved really wanted it, the military no longer play a decisive role today. Yet military thinking still has too much significance. This holds particularly true for the Soviet Union.

What we are dealing with is four hotbeds of crisis:

The Middle East, where an autonomy arrangement for Palestine is supposed to be found by 26 May,

The taking of hostages in Tehran,

The continuing occupation of Afghanistan by the Soviet Union, and

The danger of an arms race on a large scale in view of the nonratification of SALT II and the refusal of the Soviet Union to negotiate on medium-range weapons.

Both world powers do not want war. Yet there is no adequate war-avoidance strategy on either side, and both of them are not talking frankly enough about their fundamental goals and interests.

Avoiding war and solving conflicts make it necessary for all parties involved to be capable of putting themselves into the role of the teammate or antagonist respectively. He who does not want everything to end up in chaos must act in keeping with this.

To prevent the possibility of misunderstanding: We are not neutral spectators in the conflict of the two world powers. We are aware that the core of our own security lies in the alliance with the United States. [paragraph continues]

Even if one harbors serious doubts about the expediency of this or that measure asked of us, everybody should know that only the backing by this alliance can preserve the balance which forms the basis of peace and cooperation in Europe.

As for the Middle East, we have paid great respect to the courage of the Egyptian president before when he, after four wars and despite the resistance in the Arab camp, went to Jerusalem to offer peace to Israel. It would hurt me if this initiative remained without an adequate result.

We have always designated as the precondition for a comprehensive and lasting peace in this region the right of Israel to live within recognized and secure borders. But just as we demand the implementation of the right to self-determination for our people, this must be applicable to all nations including the Palestinians.

I also state in this connection that the Israeli settlement policy constitutes a significant impediment to a solution of the conflict in the Middle East region, a region which is important to all of us. As long as comprehensive peace in the Middle East is lacking most Arab states will consider Israel an enemy of Islam which is more important than the communism supported by the USSR.

Considering our most recent history, we Germans can contribute little toward the solution of this conflict. But neither do we have any reason to be cowardly toward our Israeli friends. We have the right and the duty to say that no world-policy-changing explosion must build up in this region.

Concerning the taking of hostages in Tehran: In trying to put myself in the place of those directly involved in the conflict, I must say that for the United States the taking of hostages, which has lasted for 4 months, is a nearly unbearable strain of the psycological and emotional strength of this great nation.

We have advised against military actions. However, for a long time we have declared our readiness to participate in economic sanctions on a European basis, having added, however, that we do not deem them expedient. But since this involves U.S. hostages, this must be an American decision.

In Iran itself, no decisionmaking center can be determined at present. Popular ire occasionally seems to be provoked and exploited as a lightning rod for the continually unsolved internal problems of the country. Freely elected President Bani-Sadr proposes to work toward a windup of the hostage affair, but he lacks the power to do it. This is why the internal stabilization of this country is necessary in the interest of the lives of the hostages and of all parties involved in the conflict.

The interests of the Soviet Union must also be included in this connection. Only once--and that was as far back as 3 months ago--did the Soviet Union advocate the release of the hostages in the United Nations. In my opinion this is most unsatisfactory. It seems to me as though the Soviet Union is keeping the option of a military intervention of its own open for itself on purpose, above all in the event that the United States becomes active militarily. To this end Afghanistan's occupation has considerably improved the Soviet Union's starting position. From its own viewpoint the Soviet leadership must hope that Iran will seek contact with the Soviet Union.

What primarily constitutes Europe's interests is that peace and the international system of law be preserved. And of course we are also interested in seeing oil continuing to flow as before. Our vital interest in the alliance also requires solidarity with the United States for the event that the economic damage is greater for ourselves than for others.

Regarding Afghanistan: If the Soviet Union believed it had to march into Afghanistan because of its own need for security, it was at any rate an enormously exaggerated need for security. [paragraph continues]

If it believed the world would accept it as a step within a Soviet sphere of influence and carry on routinely, then this turned out to be an enormous miscalculation.

If the Soviets were to stay in Afghanistan for a longer period, it would have grave consequences in the eyes of the states of the Third World and of the nonalined world. The approach could grow on the part of weaker countries that nothing could be done against such action and that therefore one ought to submit oneself immediately. Therefore, an end to the occupation of Afghanistan is in the interest of these states as well as in the interest of the United States and of Europe.

In the West, too, there have been hotheads who wanted to use military power. They had to realize that it is more difficult for them to reach Afghanistan than to reach the Antarctic. Eventually they have come to the same conclusion that we did--through reason and consideration--from the very beginning: Help can come only from a combination of diplomatic pressure on the Soviet Union and measures permitting the Soviet Union to save face.

That is the background against which the states of the European Community suggested guaranteeing the nonalined status, the independence and integrity of Afghanistan (I do not think much of the term neutralization, because neutrality cannot be ordered from outside).

So far the Soviet Union has not reacted to the decision of more than two-thirds of the UN member states who demanded the withdrawal of its troops. It seems obvious, therefore, that other means of pressure ought to be applied. This includes--although this cuts both ways--the American demand not to take part in the Moscow Olympics. The Federal Government has stated that it is up to the Soviet Union to create conditions which will permit everybody to take part, but that has not happened yet. We have only limited time to wait.

Regarding economic pressure, it is hardly contested that it would be senseless to supply more technical equipment or control mechanism apparatuses which would be advantageous to Soviet armament. But general economic sanctions can very much cut both ways. They can hurt us more than the Soviet Union. Our interests call for solidarity with our allies here also, but they also demand that we must remain reliable treaty partners of other states of the world. We do not want to damage treaties, neither in letter nor in spirit. That also pertains to the long-term economic agreement with the Soviet Union.

I welcome it that all involved sides in Europe and in North America, as before, are interested in the followup meeting of the Conference on Security and Cooperation this fall in Madrid. It is not just accidental that this conference has its dual name "security and cooperation." It is an urgent interest of our divided country that security and cooperation in Europe be developed and stabilized on the basis of a balance.

I am not speaking on behalf of East European states, but I am certain that we all together feel concern for world peace and the general interest in a balance and cooperation in Europe. At any rate, profound disturbances of relations with East European states have been avoided so far. With the GDR we are engaged in important negotiations on a new transportation agreement. It is as good as ready.

Regarding security policy, all European states, on the one hand, expect the United States to ratify SALT II. On the other hand, however, they expect the Soviet Union to show preparedness to negotiate on medium-range arms. There is no doubt that it continues in this field to achieve additional advantages for itself through one-sided armament and thus to upset the balance. [paragraph continues]

The Soviet Union's objection that it would be prepared to negotiate only if NATO lifts the Brussels double decision is not acceptable, because the Soviet Union already has a doubtful material lead due to its SS-20 missiles and the Backfire bomber, which it further develops every day and every month. NATO, however, has just made a decision to close the arms gap if negotiations do not produce the desired result, a decision whose implementation will take 3 years.

A first step in the right direction could be for both sides to simultaneously forego the deployment of new or additional medium-range missiles for a certain number of years and to use this time for negotiations. I admit that the Soviet Union's presently existing lead would remain for that period of time. But that would be the case anyway at least for the next 3 years. The Soviet lead would even grow in the 3-year period the West would need for starting production.

I must point to the danger of a split in the European West resulting from the differences on financing the budget of the European Community. I am for the following: If greater sacrifices by all are necessary to assist Great Britain, other old problems under discussion ought to be also simultaneously settled by way of a compromise. This includes the fishery quarrel and a limitation on agrarian expenditures. This includes the mutton quarrel and the urgently needed common beginning of an energy policy for the Community. In all this the contractual principles and primarily the common financial sources must be preserved. Our will for peace calls for an undamaged total weight of the European Community!

An overall assessment of German interests in the world political situation leads to the following maxims:

It remains the most important aim to preserve peace.

The cohesion of the divided German nation must be preserved.

The cooperation of the states and peoples of Europe must be preserved and developed.

We can adhere to these German interests only together with our European partners and in the Atlantic alliance, particularly with France and the United States.

The military balance must be preserved as a prerequisite for security and cooperation. Arms controls and arms limitations have unambiguous political priority.

Naturally Europe cannot play a dominating role, but in cooperation with the United States it can play a significant role. If we were to be maneuvered into a situation where we would have to make a choice between various allies, we would have already failed in a most important part of our crisis management.

BOELLING CLARIFIES SCHMIDT PROPOSAL FOR TALKS ON MISSILES

[Text] Bonn--Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt's new proposal that talks be set in motion between East and West on the imbalance in the field of medium-range nuclear missiles in Europe does not, according to Government Spokesman Klaus Boelling, signify that the chancellor is breaking away from the NATO decision to introduce such weapons in some West European countries.

In a speech in Hamburg on Friday, the exact text of which is still to be released, Schmidt urged that both sides forgo the deployment of new or additional medium-range weapons for a certain number of years so that negotiations could be held during this period on limiting these so-called Eurostrategic weapons.

According to a text of the speech, published by the SPD, Schmidt said: "A first step in this direction could be for both sides to simultaneously forgo the deployment of new or additional medium-range missiles for a certain number of years and to use this period for negotiations. I concede that the existing Soviet arms lead would continue during this period. But this would be the case anyway, at least for 3 years (in other words, until the NATO decision is implemented). Indeed, the Soviet lead would grow still further during the 3-year period which the West needs for production."

Boelling stressed that it would be "completely absurd" to interpret the chancellor's suggestion as a deviation from the NATO decision. In response the Soviet arming with SS-20 nuclear missiles and so-called Backfire bombers, the alliance decided last December to produce Western medium-range nuclear missiles and at the same time offer to negotiate with the Soviet Union on these weapons. Recently, however, Moscow has repeatedly made such talks contingent upon the West's refraining from implementing this decision.

According to Boelling, in his Hamburg speech the federal chancellor wanted to urge the Soviet Union again to halt a further introduction of its medium-range nuclear weapons. The chances for productive East-West talks on arms limitation in the medium-range field would be improved if the Soviet Union, for example, stopped the deployment, or preferably the production, of its new weapons. A deployment halt at least would be a positive gesture by Moscow which would help to get the talks underway. Boelling said that in his speech Schmidt had wanted to promote the offer of talks by NATO. According to the government spokesman, the chancellor himself, for this reason, feels it important for the full text of his Hamburg speech to be published, because in his view, the passage on medium-range weapons did not receive enough attention in the press.

CDU/CSU group spokesman Alois Mertes described the disarmament catalog presented to the UN secretary general by the Soviet Union as a "propaganda maneuver." It did not contain any new points and was intended to divert attention from Afghanistan and its arms drive.

BOELLING COMMENTS ON EC SUMMIT, IRAN SANCTIONS DECISION

[Text] Bonn--A decision on economic sanctions against Iran by the Federal Republic and its European partner states can be taken at the earliest on 21 April at the EC meeting in Luxembourg. Government Spokesman Klaus Boelling stressed to the press today in Bonn that the urgent clarification of this question was recognized not only by the United States but also by its European allies. The Federal Government would back decisions in which there was the impression that they could contribute to the desired political effect--the release of the hostages. Bonn, as far as was possible, has always striven for a joint decision by the Community.

Boelling repeated the view that American President Jimmy Carter's criticism of the European attitude had not been directed specifically at the Federal Republic. Nor had the American side given any firm date by which a boycott decision was wanted, but since Deputy Secretary of State Warren Christopher mentioned 21 April, this could have referred to the Luxembourg EC conference.

GENSCHER SEES NO NEED TO BREAK RELATIONS WITH IRAN

DW141115 Mainz ZDF Television Network in German 1710 GMT 13 Apr 80

[Reporter Hans-Joachim Reiche interview with Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher in the weekly program "Bonn Perspectives"; place, dat not given--recorded]

[Text] [Reiche] Mr Federal Foreign Minister, the day before yesterday the ambassadors of the Nine handed over notes in Tehran. Our ambassador will report to Bonn tomorrow. But you no doubt know about initial Tehran reactions.

[Genscher] Naturally the report is supposed to help in an exact analysis; it is not merely a formal matter. One can say even now that no positive indications are to be expected.

[Question] Did President Carter set a deadline for the Europeans to take up a position, as has been reported?

[Answer] Not a deadline, but the Americans rightly expect the Europeans not to delay their decision.

[Question] Mr Genscher, because of the doggedness and uncompromising attitude of Khomeyni it must be expected that a negative answer will come from Tehran. After that diplomatic step, isn't the next move absolutely necessary to maintain our own credibility--that is, an economic boycott and a break in diplomatic relations?

[Answer] A break in diplomatic relations ought to be carefully examined. At the moment, we do not see a necessity for that because we believe, on the contrary, that diplomatic relations ought to be used in the interest of the hostages in the U.S. Embassy in Tehran. And I would say that we feel partly responsible in this matter. International law is being broken, here, which involves us as much as the United States. Regarding economic sanctions, there are European states which, in contrast to the Federal Republic, do not have the necessary legislation. That is one problem. Therefore, one should also consider the possibilities of the European treaty, permitting a common legislation of the member states of the European Community also with regard to imposing economic sanctions. That would make common action possible.

[Question] Europe wants to speak with one voice and to act jointly; this is demonstrated by the Tehran action. Is it not necessary, therefore, Mr Genscher, that the great partners of this Community need to take an initiative so that the shaping of a will can make progress?

[Answer] We start out from the equal rights of all member states of the Community. I am convinced as a result of the talks we had in Lisbon that all member states are aware of their responsibility. We at least will act on the basis of our attitude as partners and friends of the United States.

[Question] The Americans are not merely the U.S. Government, but mostly what is called the American public. They are disappointed, and the disappointment over Europe's attitude is growing. Mr Federal Foreign Minister, is the alliance in serious danger even now?

[Answer] Mr Reiche, I take the concern contained in your question very seriously. I believe indeed that all forces now must be aimed at the fact that no doubts must come up with regard to solidarity between Europeans and Americans. This is not merely a matter of relations between governments, but also a matter of relations between nations. It does ot make sense at all to try in a petty way to figure out who might have made a mistake here or there.

Everybody must know that a quarrel between the Europeans and the United States will serve neither the United States nor the Europeans but only the Soviet Union. The Europeans, therefore, will define their interests correctly if they become aware of the fact that peace and security in Europe--and thus also our freedom--can be guaranteed only in an alliance with the United States without ifs and whens. That is the real policy of safeguarding peace. Therefore, nobody should try to dodge his responsibility with little acts of slyness, neither with regard to the Iranian problem nor the Olympic problem.

DEPUTY GOVERNMENT SPOKESMAN ON SANCTION REPERCUSSIONS

DW141138 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 1930 GMT 13 Apr 80

[Excerpts from Correspondent Anger interview with Armin Gruenewald, deputy spokesman of the Federal Government, in Bonn; date not given--recorded]

[Text] [Gruenewald] To begin with, it is necessary to come to terms in the matter. The United States has sent letters to more than 20 states requesting that U.S. sanctions be supported to the greatest extent possible. Well, it is a fact, and the history of all attempts at sanctions shows it, that the effectiveness of sanctions depends on how airtight their implementation is. This is why coordination must be sought with the other states which the United States has approached, because there is no sense in starting something on one's own. This would only entail a situation where any sanctions mechanism would be torpedoed by others. Basically this coordination is the important part of the process. The later implementation on the basis of law is only an act of enforcement. We have had our law on foreign trade since 1961. This law gives us the option of going through with something like this.

Recently the Iranian side has kept saying that for the time being all this would not have any effect on the Iranian economy. This may be true, but in the long run sanctions show at least a limited effect. Surely we should not overrate it--I mean the effect which this instrument has in principle. Yet understandably it is inconceivable, I think, for this to remain without any effect at all, proceeding from a medium-term basis.

[Question] Suppose sanctions are imposed: Repercussions on the economy of the Federal Republic are then inevitable. Does the Federal Government have any idea what these repercussions will be, what the consequences for economic development, for prices and, above all, for the energy supply will be?

[Answer] This cannot be surveyed at all in detail. Let me remind you in this context that German exports to Iran dropped considerably as a result of the overthrow of the shah and of subsequent developments. In 1979 we exported to Iran just one-third of what had been the rule before. So trade has already decreased. In 1979 it amounted to DM2.3 billion. If you expect yet another cut, then this may well be a serious matter for some individual companies. For the overall economic development of the Federal Republic, however, this plays a secondary role, because you see, this is the equivalent of about 1.5 percent of our gross national product and surely is within the bounds of what has to be calculated as margins of error in the estimates or computations of the national product.

[Question] The behavior the Federal Government has so far displayed, and your last remarks, give the impression of a certain skepticism and reserve by the Federal Government toward economic sanctions in general. What is the basic position of the Federal Government toward boycott and embargo or other measures of sanction?

[Answer] The FRG has always advocated the principle of unrestricted trade. We deem this to be a good maxim politically, and we also consider it a good economic maxim because we have free trade to thank for quite a bit of our prosperity and employment. Thus, it is the general principle on which the law on foreign trade is based. Well, experience shows that political developments occur occasionally where the instrument of sanctions is employed. Let me remind you of Rhodesia, the pipe embargo, Cuba. I do not want to be the judge of whether the sanctions in the case of Cuba and Rhodesia or whether the pipe embargo were particularly successful as a political instrument. Surely some skeptical remarks could be made about them. But at the moment I would like to suppress them because something entirely different is involved here. What matters here is that at the very moment when the U.S. President asks us to support him it is a foregone conclusion and beyond any doubt that we stand by the side of the United States as friends and partners. So please bear with me if I am reluctant to use this hour for spreading nothing but skepticism. Surely this would be misunderstood in the United States.

CDU'S KOHL URGES 'STRONG BACKING' FOR U.S.

[Text] Bonn--In the words of its chairman, Helmut Kohl, the CDU is following with great concern the "drastic deterioration" of the political climate between Washington and Bonn. Following a CDU Presidium session in Bonn today, Kohl stated that Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt bore a decisive responsibility in that respect. The CDU again urged the Federal Government to give strong backing to the United States.

Apart from the question of a boycott of the summer Olympics in Moscow the CDU Presidium's discussions were dominated by the development of the Iran crisis. In a statement approved unanimously by the leading body, Kohl stressed that the more quickly and resolutely the allies acted together, the smaller the possibility of a dangerous escalation of the Iranian conflict and the greater the chance of peacefully freeing the hostages. The CDU most strongly disapproved the fact that the responsible Iranian politicians were still not prepared to release the U.S. hostages.

In connection with the discussion on the international situation the CDU chairman severely criticized leading Social Democrats. Solidarity with the United States, demanded as a matter-of-course in times of Berlin crisis, was being questioned by many SPD politicians. He named SPD Chairman Willy Brandt, SPD parliamentary group chief Herbert Wehner and Federal Manager Egon Bahr who, with other prominent Social Democrats, had again and again until the past few days, made light of Soviet rearmament and tried to arouse understanding for Moscow's expansionist policy.

BAHR VIEWS WORLD PROBLEMS, SAYS FRG ARRANGED RED CROSS VISIT

DW151010 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0518 GMT 14 Apr 80

[Heribert Schwan interview with SPD Federal Manager Egon Bahr in Bonn; date not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] At week's end the three Bonn parties plunged into the hot phase of the land diet election campaign in North Rhine Westphalia. The great speeches by the chancellor, the SPD chairman, the chancellor candidate of the CDU/CSU Strauss, and CDU chief Kohl were focused on world political issues, Afghanistan and the Iran crisis. Does this mean that foreign affairs, especially the international crisis, will command the center of the election campaigns for both the land diets and the Bundestag?

[Answer] I do believe that they will be much more in the forefront than we originally thought or than we wished, at any rate.

[Question] This means that the actual problems such as, unemployment, prices, pensions for instance, recede to the background in view of the world situation?

[Answer] They do grow smaller, because it is a foregone conclusion that I cannot discuss equal rights for women, the issues you mentioned, energy questions and other matters at all unless peace continues to be preserved. This is the crux of the matter.

[Question] With a dramatic emphasis to which I think he is otherwise only rarely inclined, the chancellor compared the present world political development with the situation in 1914 prior to the outbreak of World War I and thus conjured up the danger of warlike conflicts and warlike entanglement. Is the situation really as serious today? Does the chancellor possibly have information which makes the situation centered on Iran and Afghanistan appear much more dangerous than people in this country believe it to be?

[Answer] To begin with, there is a great difference between then and now. This matter is of a worldwide nature. The second difference is that it might start, if at all, in the Middle East and not in Europe; and in the third place, the weapons are much more lethal than they were then. All differences in the comparison and the possibilities of comparison notwithstanding, I believe that what the chancellor said was not an overdramatization. At many meetings and in many remarks I have advocated the view that what is happening in the Middle East, this combination of Afghanistan and Iran, is uncontrollable. At any rate it is as yet unmanageable, and what primarily matters is to stabilize it; then we will revert to other points. This has now developed further. Mr Carter's patience is not boundless. He cannot simply wait and, to the degree he becomes active, the matter becomes more dangerous. Yet we must not fail to realize that the starting point of the whole thing is the stubborness of this top man in Iran.

[Question] Over the weekend the United States took another initiative toward bringing the still hesitant allies in Europe and Japan around to its political line once and for all in actions against Iran and against the Soviet expansion efforts. In an interview with several European television services Jimmy Carter said that he has given the European leaders a specific date. As we know today what is probably meant is 21 April, by which date Jimmy Carter expects the Europeans to join the U.S. sanctions against Iran. Europe, let alone the Federal Republic, will probably have no alternative to at least taking economic sanctions against Iran into consideration.

[Answer] There is quite a lot to be said about that. First of all, I do not know whether a date has been set. All I heard from Mr Genscher was that he does not know of any. I believe the chancellor does not know of any either. And neither do I, for that matter. We have not yet reached the point where it is said: Fall out, everybody!--whereupon this order would have to be obeyed. We are allies in a democratic alliance system and not recipients of orders.

The second point pertains to the issue itself: The FRG has endorsed the UN resolution on the matter of the hostages and Iran; this means that on principle we are also for trade sanctions; we should not forget that. Then there is point No 3 in this context: After all, people ought to be allowed to think about an issue. It is obvious that the Americans are absolutely right and are perfectly entitled to be so embittered about a kidnapping which hardly has a precedent in the past 2,000, 3,000, 4,000, 5,000 years because a fundamental international law, the protection of diplomats, has been violated. But if you want to do something about it, then consultations are necessary. This is what they obviously failed to do. So it turns out that errors in methods and tactics might already impair the good cause of the Americans.

Furthermore, it is necessary to ask whether the trade embargo will do any good, whether it will have any effect. We can hear from the United States itself that people over there doubt that it will be effective. So I doubt very much that it will be effective in changing the position of the number one man in Iran, the Ayatollah Khomeyni. Even if all Europeans, the Japanese, the Australians, the Canadians and the New Zealanders were to do it, the Islamic states in the region would still be left. And if Saudi Arabia, Pakistan, Kuwait and others do not join, loopholes as big as barndoors will be left open. Then this will just not be able to work.

All this needs to be contemplated. Furthermore, we must keep in mind that Iran also has a long border with the Soviet Union. And if the Soviet Union does not go along, then this also constitutes a gap. This is but an interim link inserted into what you had in mind before and which you then wish to hook up directly afterwards. [sentence as heard] What I mean is this: It may be that the Federal Republic, after considering matters jointly with other Europeans and in keeping with its stance at the United Nations, will end up with a trade embargo, which will go to show that it is prepared to tighten its belt on behalf of the United States. But is it sensible? I prefer solidarity with a correct policy, to solidarity with a wrong policy.

[Question] The Americans are already going further. Quite plainly they demand diplomatic reprisals against Iran in the event that economic sanctions--as you just maintained--were to come to naught. And the opposition in this country fearlessly demands the severage of the diplomatic relations between Bonn and Tehran. What does your party think about it, and what do you think of it?

[Answer] Severing diplomatic relations is absurd and sheer nonsense though it is not the first time that the opposition has demanded nonsense. Diplomatic relations are an instrument and not a punishment or reward to a partner. We have endeavored, and as it seems with some success, to make visits to the U.S. hostages from outside possible, for example, by the International Red Cross. I believe that the Americans are highly satisfied with that. You can do all this only if you have people on the spot. Depriving ourselves of that option is nonsense, which is why I am against severing diplomatic relations.

[Question] If I understood you correctly, the FRG has seen to it that the Red Cross, for instance, has been allowed to call on the hostages in the U.S. Embassy today?

[Answer] Yes.

[Question] You are saying yes?

[Answer] Yes.

[Question] The third phase of the U.S. strategy so it seems, according to the latest remarks by Jimmy Carter, would proceed to military measures in the event that all else fails. Carter has not ruled military force out lately. Never before has Carter taken such clear military measures into consideration. Is this also the reason for Schmidt's comparison with 1914 and for the anxiety, the great concern?

[Answer] I was in the United States during the first week of January. Even then the U.S. secretary of state told me something about a naval blockade being conceivable. Directly upon my return I stated in public: I can visualize an escalation in which the Afghanistan and Iran troubles become combined and then unpredictable. That situation has now drawn nearer following the developments of the past 10 weeks. This is indeed reason to be concerned.

[Question] What the United States demands of its allies is not just support against Iran, but also the boycott of the Moscow games. Yesterday we heard about the decision in the United States. Do you think that in view of the decision of the U.S. National Olympic Committee to boycott the games for good that the Federal Republic will be able to dodge the issue?

[Answer] The Federal Government will not be able to dodge the issue, nor has it done so. I merely considered incorrect the U.S. position of setting an ultimatum of 20 February. And it did not work, either. Our position is well known. We have brought a certain pressure to bear on the Soviet Union by having said that it was the Soviets who did something in Afghanistan so that they are the one who must do something to allow all to participate in the Olympic games. Nothing of the sort has been done to this date. If this does not happen, then the decision is a foregone conclusion. This means that I proceed from the assumption that unless something changes in the next 4 weeks at the latest, the Federal Government will come out with a negative recommendation to the National Olympic Committee.

SPD PARLIAMENTARIANS: U.S. CAN 'RELY ON FRG SOLIDARITY'

[Text] Berlin--The Executive of the SPD parliamentary group has stressed in Berlin today, with reference to the latest U.S. demands that the Europeans do more to help overcome the crises in Afghanistan and Iran, that the United States can rely on the Federal Republic's solidarity. The SPD wanted to stress this attitude particularly at its meeting in Berlin, spokesman for the group, Knut Terjung, said, announcing the outcome of the thorough discussion. The Federal Republic's security depends very decisively on Bonn standing firmly in alliance at the U.S. side.

It was pointed out during the discussion, which began with a report by Berlin's Governing Mayor Dietrich Stobbe on his recent trip to the United States, that German exports to Iran have recently dropped by two-thirds. With regard to the U.S. proposals, Terjung said that further measures will have to be very carefully coordinated in the Western alliance. There can be no question of "blind obedience" in this respect. Instead, the most effective courses must be discussed without too much pressure of time and then adopted. Great responsibility rests not only on the United States but also on Europe. In addition, both sides should help to avoid "irritations" in public opinion.

The SPD Executive furthermore fully supported Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt's policy of upholding German interests with patience and proceeding very cautiously. The world situation was also a topic of the discussions in the SPD presidium today which was held in Berlin without the chancellor. He was absent because of an election meeting in Saarbruecken.

INDUSTRIAL GROUP PLEDGES SUPPORT FOR SANCTIONS

LD130745 Hamburg DPA in German 0030 GMT 13 Apr 80

[Excerpt] Bonn--Rolf Rodenstock, president of the Federation of German Industry (BDI), has assured Bonn of BDI's loyalty should the Federal Government decide on export restrictions to Iran. Speaking on Deutschlandfunk today, he said that export restrictions would entail problems for a number of enterprises and industries. Nevertheless, if the Federal Government decided on economic sanctions against Iran this would be taken into account and loyally implemented.

14 APR PRESS ON OLYMPIC BOYCOTT, CARTER DEMANDS

DW141035 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0505 GMT 14 Apr 80

[Press review on Olympic boycott and President Carter demands for Western solidarity]

[Excerpts] FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU states: The dice have been cast in Washington. After the disruption of diplomatic relations with Tehran early this week, the next blow followed this weekend: The United States will not take part in the Moscow Olympic games. The U.S. National Committee has yielded to the pressure of the President, who has become energetic lately. This probably means that the die is cast also for the Federal Republic. It is just a matter of time until the Federal Government will suggest to the German Olympic Committee that it not send its athletes to Moscow. While the federal chancellor and even more clearly SPD Chairman Willy Brandt still have weak hopes that in the next weeks the Soviets will indicate their preparedness to withdraw, so as not to let the Olympic games flop, Foreign Minister Genscher has had no illusions for a long time. He leaves no doubts in public that athletes from the Federal Republic will not march into the Moscow Lenin Stadium.

SUEDKURIER of Konstanz notes: The nine states of the European Community have just 1 week until 21 April in order to join the American economic sanctions against Iran. That date at least was mentioned yesterday night by Deputy U.S. Secretary of State Christopher by hinting at a meeting of top politicians of the European Community on that day, and he added right away what President Carter expects: actions, not words. This ends the phase during which in Bonn, Paris and Rome they have been playing for time with the hope that a miracle might happen in Tehran. The setting of that date forced dynamics on the Europeans with regard to the forthcoming decision process, dynamics they have tried to evade in the past, and partially for good reason. Now, however, further hesitation would be unforgivable.

RHEINZEITUNG of Koblenz notes: Nobody should be amazed that the patience of the President and of the U.S. people has come to a make-or-break test. Nobody is able to come up with a sensible suggestion for the immediate liberation of the hostages in the U.S. Embassy in Tehran. Therefore, nobody should hastily criticize Jimmy Carter when he now presses the Europeans and the Japanese to take action against the revolutionary regime, and yet his present action cannot elicit enthusiasm.

NURENBERGER NACHRICHTEN stresses: The seriousness of the situation can be gathered from the recent statements by Federal Chancellor Schmidt, who nobody can accuse of having poured oil on the fire or of having fanned fears in a careless way, noted similarities to tensions existing in 1914 prior to the outbreak of World War I. This confrontation can be eliminated only through a direct dialog between the superpowers. This will not take place. Moscow and Washington are dealing with each other through warning and even threatening gestures.

NEUE OSNABRUECKER ZEITUNG maintains: If Schmidt speaks of the danger of war, demanding understanding for Soviet interests while simultaneously dissociating himself from American suggestions of common Western economic measures against the hostage-taking regime in Iran, then one must seriously ask what the Western solidarity with the United States, which was only verbal anyway, is worth at all. In doing this the chancellor indirectly moves away from what the federal foreign minister was delineated lately in clear positions.

WESTDEUTSCHE ALLGEMEINE writes: Schmidt's explanation above all of what he said may be a show of muscle or action which would threaten to hit the Federal Republic incomparably hard. Thus criticizing it, is justified and ultimately shared by all responsible forces in Bonn. Bonn cannot and must not participate in punitive expeditions regardless of their nature. Carter is quite justified, however, in demanding that Bonn, like the other allies, support all measures that might contribute toward the liberation of the hostages and/or the Soviet withdrawal from Afghanistan. It would be neither prudent nor decent to pretend as though Carter's dilemma were none of our business.

Duesseldorf's RHEINISCHE POST makes the following comment: Effective this weekend the Federal Republic and West Berlin, too, must give up their Olympic hopes, to the extent they still had any. Nobody can blame those affected for having a bitter taste as a result of the decision of the U.S. National Olympic Committee. They must yet be made to comprehend that Soviet aggression in Afghanistan must not be honored by participation in Olympic games in Moscow. Once before the youth of the world, definitely inadvertently, abetted a power-hungry regime. This was in Berlin in 1936. Again it is time to learn from history.

The Mainz ALLGEMEINE ZEITUNG advocates the following views: Brezhnev will get to feel the effects on the Soviet Union of the Olympic cancellations by Western countries and some neutral states in both domestic and foreign policies. The absence of presumably 50 states will probably strengthen the feeling of reassurance of the civil rights movement and indicate to this movement that the Western world not only talks about human rights but also claims and demands them in the face of Soviet power policy. In the future it will be harder for the Kremlin than before to advertise itself on the world stage as the helper and protector of small nations.

In conclusion, an excerpt from the BREMER NACHRICHTEN: At the old age of 54 the modern Olympic games dies last weekend at Colorado Springs in the United States. In attendance at the bier are a war-waging dictatorship, the president of a democratic superpower and the posterity of the new founder of the Olympic games, De Coubertin, who have moralized to death a nation-allying idea from the past century. Viewed against this background it is unimportant who is primarily responsible for the Olympic demise. It is a fact that politics has dealt sports the fatal blow. The political games are dead, to be sure, yet the un-political Olympics must now be born. This may sound utopian: Still, there was this Baron de Coubertin once before whose idea reached the age of 84. The chance may be small, but there should not and must not be any alternative. History, at any rate, demonstrates that the world is poorer and more prone to crises without Olympic games. The nation-allying idea should be strong enough in the 20th Century, too, to ultimately prevail.

FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE: 'SOMETHING WRONG' IN EUROPE-U.S. RELATIONS

[Commentary signed R.H.: "Something Wrong in Europe"]

[Text] "Some are wishing protection but shirk from the commitments of an alliance." Carter is now talking in clear terms. Unfortunately not everything is as clear and as uncomplicated as he would like it to be. We need only take up the serious American criticism to see that Carter himself has not always made it easy on the Europeans with his forms of thinking. He is the common denominator of an America which is drifting away from the history of the old world. In its knowledge and awareness what the Europeans, for example, saw in Afghanistan's case, namely, a thrust in a secular geopolitical urge of the Russian empire toward the southern sea, he treated as a communist 1979 Christmas surprise which he would like to see punished in short order.

Carter also neglects to look back on the fact that two different interpretations of the Western alliance are facing each other in a confusing way. So far the Europeans were accustomed to being told by the Americans, as in the case of the 1956 Suez invasion: Nothing doing! We are the ones that make world politics. As late as last year they cold-shouldered the Federal Government when it offered its good offices on the occasion of a chancellor's trip to a remote region. It is only lately that jointly agreed engagements occur in the West again, discreetly. The Europeans, France included, not only had placed themselves under U.S. protection but had also withdrawn from world politics with some U.S. prompting.

But now suddenly what matters is no longer the mission of the alliance, peace in Europe, but politics in global dimensions. Both the protectors and and the protected were wrong in believing that the two could be separated. In a situation menaced, among other things, by the threat that a man like Khomeyni could humiliate a U.S. President to the point of election defeat, only the ingenious pathos, the high-spirited fearlessness of a Churchill is lacking but also the concomitant determination of the peoples. The Olympic boycott already is being marketed as a sort of consumption waiver, and a waiver of consumption is the last that leaders of a democracy can wring from their voters. Carter may be a subject of discussion, yet there is also something wrong in Europe.

PORTUGUESE PREMIER,SCHMIDT DISCUSS EC, IRAN

ID141645 Hamburg DPA in German 1504 GMT 14 Apr 80

[Excerpts] Bonn--Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and Portuguese Prime Minister Francisco Manuel Lumbrales de Sa Carneiro had a meeting in Bonn to exchange views on international problems and aspects of Portugal's entry to the EEC. The Lisbon head of government was also received by Federal President Karl Carstens.

The Portuguese prime minister expressly underlined his solidarity with the U.S. Government "in this tragic situation."

Speaking at a press conference before his flight back to Lisbon, Sa Carneiro said that everything possible should be done to help bring about the release of the U.S. hostages in Tehran. Although there may be differences of opinion regarding Washington's foreign policy, what Washington needs at the present time is not criticism but solidarity and backing from the Europeans. That is why the Portuguese Government was ready to examine the question of economic sanctions against Iran.

UAE OIL MINISTER, LAMBSDORFF HOID TALKS

[Excerpts] Bonn--According to UAE Minister of Petroleum and Natural Resources Mani' ibn Sa'id al-'Utaybah, the United Arab Emirates does not intend to use oil as a political weapon. This assurance was given by the Arab minister during a discussion with Federal Economics Minister Otto Graf Lambsdorff in Bonn today. According to the ministry, 'Utaybah, who is reciprocating Lambsdorff's visit at the beginning of the year and who also had a meeting with Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt this afternoon, has given his assurance that the Federal Republic will continue to be supplied.

During a luncheon in honor of his guest, Lambsdorff appealed to the oil-producing countries not to hamper or even halt the efforts of the industrial states in their difficult and time-consuming process of tapping new energy sources by excessive price increases and supply cutbacks. This will land people in "dangerous waters," said Lambsdorff.

Lambsdorff renewed to al-'Utaybah the European Community's offer, initiated by the Federal Republic, to conclude an agreement with the states of the Arab Peninsula on economic cooperation. On Tuesday, al-'Utaybah will have meetings in Bonn and Cologne with parliamentarians and economic reporesentatives. He will later travel to Hamburg to hold talks, among other things, with representatives of the oil industry.

Oil Weapon Use Disavowed

DW 150943 Hamburg ARD Television Network in German 1800 GMT 14 Apr 80

[Gerd H. Pelletier interview with Mani' ibn Sa'id al-'Utaybah, minister for petroleum and natural resources of the United Arab Emirates, in Bonn; date not given--recorded in English with German translation superimposed]

[Text] [Question] Did the threat by Libya and Algeria to discontinue their oil deliveries to some Western countries play any role in the talks you had today?

[Answer] We discussed the oil situation in general. What I can state here and now, however, is this: My country will not participate in any Arab boycott against Europe. Europe is highly significant for us, and we would rather grow closer to Europe. Therefore, we will in no case employ the oil weapon against Europe.

Lambsdorff Luncheon Remarks

LD141446 Hamburg DPA in German 1344 GMT 14 Apr 80 LD

[Excerpt] Bonn--At a luncheon in Bonn today for the minister of petroleum and natural resources of the United Arab Emirates, Mani' ibn Sa'id al-'Utaybah, Federal Economics Minister Otto Graf Lambsdorff underlined the great importance of close cooperation with the United States in the present difficult international situation. With reference to the situation of the hostages in Tehran Lambsdorff said that we would have understanding for the political and economic measures planned by America after the failure of all efforts for a peaceful solution.

"Our place is now at the side of the United States as our most important ally," said the FDP politician. He said that just as great a priority has to be given to the demand for a withdrawal of the Soviet troops from Afghanistan as to the unsolved problems of the Arab-Israeli confrontation. The Western states and the nonalined countries have to find a joint response to the Soviet expansion.

CARTER DEADLINE, EUROPEAN REACTIONS REPORTED

LD141240 Paris Domestic Service in French 1100 GMT 14 Apr 80

[Excerpt] President Carter has taken matters into his own hands and what he had to tell the Europeans he told directly by means of four European television networks. There was a French channel among these, French Television 1, and Andre Celarie, its chief editor who took part in the interview with President Carter, will be our guest later on.

President Carter asked the Europeans to join the U.S. effort, or else Washington would harden its position. A date was then set by Deputy Secretary of State Mr Christopher: The Europeans would have to make up their minds during their 21 April summit meeting in Luxembourg.

Paris states that it has no knowledge at all of this ultimatum, and Japan has denied having this information. But President Carter's words and the deputy secretary of state's statements are being extensively commented uponin Bonn where they have caused much embarrassment in Chancellor Schmidt's entourage.

LE MONDE VIEWS IMPACT OF U.S. 'REPRIMAND' ON HESITANT ALLIES

[Editorial: "Reprimand"]

[Text] Mr Carter has publicly reprimanded "some countries which ask for U.S. protection but balk at the duties involved in an alliance." This brief remark in a foreign policy speech essentially devoted to a strong attack on the USSR is a considerable reproach to the European allies made with the tone of a man hurt by a betrayal. The United States is reminding its European allies that it is outrageous to aspire to the advantages of a contract while refusing to take the drawbacks when they arise.

The U.S. Government chief was clearly addressing the Western countries--especially France --which are not at all anxious to jeopardize the delicate balance of their oil supplies by taking sanctions against Iran.

Like his predecessors on similar occasions, President Carter took care to stress that the allies are sovereign states and that they naturally act "on their own initiative." However, he finds it difficult to accept that their spontaneous and immediate reaction should not be to follow the United States in an affair--the hostages affair--in which it is clearly in the right.

The Americans expect full and concrete support. So far they have obtained neither: The allies are clearly not prepared to follow all Washington's initiatives against the Tehran authorities and, as far as possible, they prefer to stick to diplomatic statements or approaches without going so far as to boycott Iranian planes and ships.

The U.S. President's bitterness is accentuated by the West's halfhearted attitude with regard to the Moscow Olympic games. The Germans are hesitating, while the French and Italians are leaving their athletes free to decide whether they will take part or not. These reservations are having the effect of encouraging the U.S. Olympic Committee to turn a deaf ear to Mr Carter's appeals so that the whole government is having to mount an intensive propaganda campaign and even resort to deliberate pressure on individual citizens or companies which want to maintain the games for various reasons.

In this regard the President returned to the attack in his speech Thursday, recalling the "striking parallel" which, he thinks, exists between the Moscow games and the 1936 Berlin games, twice citing a Soviet manual to show the precise political advantage the Kremlin hopes to gain from the games. It is easy to see that from Washington's viewpoint, in the context of the trial of strength with the USSR, the Europeans' hesitations seem stronger language in this connection than the President. The agriculture secretary in particular, talking to the same audience as Mr Carter, described those who do not support the embargo on grain exports to the USSR as "drawing room strategists.

Mr Carter's dual role as a candidate seeking votes and a head of state humiliated by Tehran is forcing him to take a tougher line. State Department officials, who are more diplomatic by nature, have welcomed the Community's initiative and refrained from stressing its shortcomings. Obviously the Europeans' goodwill gesture cannot satisfy an anxious and exasperated U.S. public. However, it could pave the way for stronger stances should Iran prove insensitive to the representations already made.

CARTER STATEMENTS ATTEMPT TO REAFFIRM U.S. 'LEADERSHIP'

[Editorial: "Plain Talking"]

[Text] Without going so far as to force Europe's hand, President Carter has clearly let it be known that if their explicit and active support in the hostage affair continued to leave something to be desired they would bear responsibility for the "more vigorous measures" which the United States would be forced to take. The Americans "are running out of time," their patience is exhausted and they will not maintain indefinitely "nonbelligerence" in their efforts to free the hostages if their European allies do not aline with them.

Washington thinks that its position is that of a "severely injured party" under international law. Of course U.S. policy has not yet exhausted all means of pressure, notably economic pressure, on Iran and has not yet been reduced to military intervention. However, events could spiral and, if there is no strong collective action by the Atlantic coalition, the United States is likely--according to its President--to be reduced to taking extreme measures.

Mr Carter is justified in being even more categorical about the invasion of Afghanistan in "flagrant violation of the principles of detente": He also complained of having been tricked by the Soviets who, contrary to the assurances received from Moscow or given to Mr Giscard d'Estaing, have "no intention" of withdrawing their troops. In these conditions taking part in the Olympic games would be tantamount to giving "approval"--a word which the President uses frequently--to the Soviet aggression.

On this point Mr Carter breaks with oratorical caution and tolerates no compromise. For him it is "inconceivable" that "peace-loving" states could "set the seal of their approval" on the Soviet intervention by sending a national delegation to the games. Nonparticipation by "20, 30, 40, 50 and perhaps even 70" countries is the only way of showing the Russian people, from whom their leaders have concealed the condemnation of the Afghan expedition by 104 nations at the United Nations, that their government is being ostracized by a large section of world opinion.

It was easy to detect definite reservations regarding France in President Carter's remarks, especially with regard to the statements made by Mr Giscard d'Estaing during his tour of the Gulf. [paragraph continues]

Mr Carter does not agree with these statements and does not think that the French president has the support of all his neighbors. For President Carter there is no alternative to the Camp David agreements, which have been respected by both the Israelis and the Egyptians; a fact which, in his view, is somewhat miraculous and would have seemed quite impossible 2 years ago. While accepting the "Palestinians' legitimate rights," Mr Carter is opposed to any recognition of the PLO unless it accepts the terms of UN Resolution 242 implicitly but clearly recognizing Israel's existence and its right to security.

It would probably be impossible for Mr Carter to speak any differently in an election year but these considerations would not suffice to make him speak against his conscience. Indeed the most striking aspect of the U.S. President's conversation with the European journalists is his conviction and clarity of expression. Mr Carter believes what he says and comes straight to the point. On Iran, Afghanistan, the Olympic games and the Middle East the President forcefully reaffirmed U.S. "leadership" and, at the risk of offending many Europeans, showed no sympathy for those who only rally to it halfheartedly.

LE MATIN SEES 'AMBIGUITY' IN WHITE HOUSE TACTICS

LD141047 Paris LE MATIN in French 10 Apr 80 p 2

[Editorial: "Carter and Iran: European Reservations"]

[Text] Jimmy Carter will have difficulty convincing the Western allies to apply sanctions against Iran whose effectiveness is doubted by the Americans themselves.

"If we alone break off diplomatic relations with Tehran, we alone suspend trade and we alone boycott the imam's planes and ships, our action will be quite ineffective. However, the Tehran authorities will be susceptible to our pressure if other countries associate themselves with it." This, essentially, is what the White House ambassadors have been reiterating in the capitals of Western Europe and Japan for the last 48 hours.

The argument, which will undoubtedly seduce a U.S. public opinion short on international sympathy, arouses more reservation than enthusiasm this side of the Atlantic. And this is natural, of course, since on reflection it simply proves one thing: Washington's measures announced Monday are perhaps part of the thinking of the presidential machinery, but, in themselves, they are worthless.

No one in Europe can blame the U.S. chief executive for appealing to the solidarity of his allies when he is led into a decision during an international crisis which threatens the interests of the whole West. But in this hostage affair the European leaders are increasingly justified in wondering whether they are being asked to support the U.S. President or the candidate Jimmy Carter. For 5 months Carter has been seeking a way of escaping the diplomatic blackmail which the leaders of the Islamic revolution have been exerting on the United States while deriving from it some immediate political advantage over his Democratic and Republican rivals.

The latest episode clearly illustrates the ambiguities of the White House tactics. The relatively harmless measures announced at the beginning of the week were not going to modify the imam's line; quite the contrary. They were primarily designed to reassure U.S. public opinion and cut the ground from under the other candidates for the presidential nomination.

Thus in Paris, Bonn and London, as in the other Community capitals, no government feels compelled to rush to the aid of candidate Carter between two primaries, Wisconsin last week and Pennsylvania on 22 April. The Nine's consultations will begin today, on the fringe of the Lisbon meeting of the foreign ministers of the countries of the Council of Europe. They will undoubtedly continue at the Community Council of Ministers in Luxembourg and could well wait until the European summit at the end of the month before resulting in a joint stance.

GISCARD ON EEC ISSUES, RESPONSIBILITIES

LD141607 Paris L'AURORE in French 11 Apr 80 p 11

[Unattributed report: "Valery Giscard d'Estaing: 'France Protects Europe'"]

[Text] "France protects Europe" and not its own financial interests in the debate on the problem of the British contribution to the EEC budget, President Giscard d'Estaing stated in an interview published by LE FIGARO this morning.

The head of state, who will participate in the summit of the Nine in Luxembourg on 27-28 April, was determined to make France's partners face up to their responsibilities.

After explaining that if it was merely a question of finding a way to help Great Britain deal with a limited and temporary difficulty, "a just solution could be found," Giscard d'Estaing added that if, however, it was a question of modifying the Community's financial system permanently, "this would concern every state, who should clearly state whether they accept such a modification or not."

"Its Principles and Its Solidarity"

"I will be clear on this point," the head of state explained. "If all our partners declared themselves in favor either of the rule of a 'fair return' or a rule establishing a ceiling for any surplus or deficit in their contributions to the Community, the implementation of such a rule should be the object of a proposal put forward by the Commission which would then have to be examined and discussed."

According to the head of state, this is "a conceivable solution even though it does not correspond to France's concept of the Community structure. Obviously, however, it cannot be applied to any single country but must become a rule applicable to all."

In this debate, Giscard d'Estaing asserted, "France protects Europe, its principles and its solidarity. Its financial interests are not directly involved here. It is quite prepared to show a spirit of solidarity provided that the demands put forward are not aimed at calling into question the fundamental principles of the Community."

"If anyone wants to challenge these principles, any such demand concerns not only France but all our partners. It is up to them to state their views. If any new rules were defined, this would entail the creation of a different Community."

Asked about the French attitude toward some other outstanding Community problems--determination of agricultural prices, the lamb war and the fishing system--the head of state emphasized that "it is clear that if anything is to be achieved, all problems must be resolved. There can be no doubt about this."

Furthermore the president expressed his "concern" about "the failure of certain Community institutions" and also expressed the view that the European Council "has increasingly been edging away from its true objective." In conclusion the president stated: "You may wonder whether this is really the right moment for calling into question an organization which has been operating for 21 years....In view of the upheavals which have been taking place throughout the world, must Europe display its disagreements on matters which are not of historical importance?"

DIPLOMAT TO INTERCEDE ON BEHALF OF LIBERIA'S DENNIS

AB141525 Paris AFP in French 1516 GMT 14 Apr 80

[Text] Paris, 14 Apr (AFP)--Mr Jean Francois-Poncet, the French minister of foreign affairs, on Monday asked the French ambassador in Monrovia, Mr Louis Dollot, to approach the new Liberian Government on behalf of Mr Cecil Dennis, minister of foreign affairs in the government which was toppled on Saturday. We learn from authorized sources in Paris that the life of Mr Cecil [as received] is in danger. Mr Cécil Dennis and Mr Francois-Poncet met 10 days ago in Paris during the preparatory session for the forthcoming Franco-African summit due to be held in Nice on 8 and 9 May 1980.

CHAD, ECONOMICS DOMINATE FRANCO-AFRICAN MINISTERIAL CONFERENCE

[Ph.D. Report: "The Paris Ministerial Meeting Dealt Mainly With Economic Problems"]

[Text] Although the Chad tragedy captured the attention of the representatives of the 25 countries taking part in the third Franco-African ministerial conference, which is completing its work in Paris this Friday, major economic topics were studied during the session.

Speaking after Mr Jean Francois-Poncet, who called for a halt to the fighting in Chad, Cooperation Minister Robert Galley spoke at length about the energy crisis and its financial repercussions on all African economies. In this context Mr Galley mentioned two important subjects: the need to resort to alternative energy sources and the need to help African states achieve self-sufficiency in food. Hydroelectric power, solar energy and natural [as published] sources of energy were mentioned as possible replacements for oil. Inga in Zaire and Selingue in Mali contain considerable energy potential. Experiments in the production of rare gases from rice straw and cotton stalks are at present continuing in Cameroon. However, it is above all the exploitation of the biomass which offers the most serious hopes. Indeed, vegetable matter can be used on a large scale to produce methanol, which is capable of replacing some oil products. Thus 100,000 hectares of equatorial forest could produce the equivalent of 1 million tons of oil.

In the food sphere France would like the African states to draw up a long-term planning policy. Indeed, Paris is hoping to grant large amounts of money for the extension of food crops rather than giving temporary and costly direct food aid. The cooperation minister, who has more money at his disposal in 1980, would prefer to give priority to the most urgent agricultural investment.

As initially foreseen, there was a great deal of discussion about international economic problems and their repercussions in Africa, the North-South dialog and the trialog. In this respect it was pointed out that Arab aid to African states represents less than one-third the oil bill which the south Saharan countries have to pay following the recent increases in "black gold" prices.

There were many speeches throughout Thursday and on Friday morning. The following subjects were raised: programming of international aid for several years at a time, particular problems facing enclave countries, problems connected with the insular nature of some states, and Euro-African relations in the light of the recent Lome agreements. The head of the Somali delegation, one of the states taking part in such a meeting for the first time, stressed the plight of African refugees and called for steps to be taken to alert states to this plight.

However, behind the scenes at the conference the various delegations discussed virtually nothing but Chad. Chad Justice Minister Djono Golo, who is representing the Transitional Government of National Union, was bombarded with questions. The most striking thing he said was that the warring parties want to settle their differences by arms alone.

MINISTER DOES NOT FORESEE CHAD INTERVENTION

[Unattributed report: "France Does Not Envisage the Possibility of Intervention in the Fighting"]

[Text] Fighting is being intensified in Ndjamena where Southern Colonel Kamoughue's Chad Armed Forces joined the struggle on Thursday 10 April on the side of President Goukouni's People's Armed Forces (FAP) against Mr Hissein Habre's Northern Armed Forces (FAN).

Togolese President General Eyadema went to Lagos on Thursday for a meeting with Nigerian head of state Shehu Shagari. In addition Chad Finance Minister and FAN foreign relations chief Mahamat Ahmat Saleh, who is at present visiting France, stated in Paris on Thursday that negotiation is the only possible solution at present in Chad and maintained: "The other side may think that there must be a victor and a vanquished. If there is a victor it will be Libya, not Chad."

However, government secretary general and FAP spokesman Mahamat Nour Adam, who arrived in Tripoli Thursday, said that President Goukouni's government "is determined to crush the armed rebellion launched by Hissein Habre and his supporters."

Finally, in Paris, Cooperation Minister Robert Galley told the National Assembly Foreign Affairs Committee on Thursday that he "does not envisage the possibility" of France being led to intervene in the conflict. France, he added, will take every opportunity to restore Chad's unity and integrity. In addition the cooperation minister indicated that 80 percent of the weapons used by the warring parties are Soviet-made.

VENEZUELAN PRESIDENT ARRIVES FOR 4-DAY VISIT

LD141450 Paris Domestic Service in French 1400 GMT 14 Apr 80

[Text] The president of Venezuela, Luis Herrera Campins, arrived at Roissy Airport a few moments ago on an official 4-day visit. He was welcomed by Valery Giscard d'Estaing and Premier Raymond Barre who were accompanied by several members of the government. In his welcoming speech, the French president stressed the two countries' identical attachment to the democratic ideals. Venezuela is one of the few real democracies in Latin America. The visit is important also in the economic context. Mr Herrera is the current chairman of OPEC. In addition to the talks he will have with the French president during the 4 days, he will also visit the European Parliament in Strasbourg on Thursday.

Giscard Addresses Dinner

ID150906 Paris Domestic Service in French 0600 GMT 15 Apr 80

[Text] The president of Venezuela is on a visit to Paris. Giscard d'Estaing wants a new stage to be opened in the development of relations between France and Venezuela. Giscard d'Estaing, who was giving a dinner in honor of the Venezuelan head of state at the Trianon Palace last night, said that every condition is now present to embark on this new stage despite the fact that France and Venezuela are not as yet as full partners as they ought to be in the bilateral field.

[Begin Giscard d'Estaing recording] Our major companies are by now present in your country, and our technology in the fields of energy, transport, telecommunications and social investments is known better there now. The conditions now exist for us to go over to a new stage in the development of our relations. The prospects are as wide as the interests of our two countries. It is therefore up to us, as it is we who provide leadership, both in Venezuela and France, to see to it that they find tangible expression. [end recording]

LE MONDE ON CUBAN SITUATION; CITES 'RESTRICTED' CASTRO SPEECH

ID141057 Paris LE MONDE in French 11 Apr 80 pp 1, 4

[Marcel Niedergang commentary: "Dependence and Survival"]

[Text] Something has snapped in Cuba, but what? The 10,000 candidates for exile packed into the small grounds of the Peruvian Embassy in Havana cannot merely be cast into disgrace and into the vague hell of "antisocial" elements as the Cuban press is doing. As the PCI organ L'UNITA writes, questions have to be asked.

The first is: Just how many Cubans want to leave their country at any price after 20 years of food rationing, daily problems and lack of freedom? The fact that Cubans from all social strata rushed to the Peruvian Embassy within a few hours after learning that the authorities were henceforth granting free departure to all those wanting to leave highlights the growing malaise.

Nor is it enough, however, to state peremptorily, as the U.S. Government has done, that this astonishing episode confirms the total failure of the Cuban experiment.

The record of Castro's 20-year rule is not ludicrous, especially if it is placed in its true context, which is that of the difficult struggle of developing countries, and in the inter-American context.

The Cubans have long had to face the constant and sometimes armed hostility of the United States, their main enemy, just a few miles from their shore. Direct or indirect U.S. attempts to forcibly overthrow the Castro regime went on constantly during the first 15 years. Throughout that period the exodus of Cubans hostile to the regime probably continued but the constant U.S. threat also helped to concentrate energies and boost morale. Normalization with the United States, which is much further advanced than might be thought, has no less naturally dulled feelings of solidarity. The influx of tens of thousands of North American tourists into Cuba and the return of Cuban exiles who left for Miami in the early days have helped to increase the population's desire to escape constraints which have been suffered too long.

The Cuban leaders, who are aware of the growing malaise, have for some months stepped up warnings and self-criticism while placing more emphasis on "human weaknesses" than on the regime's structural shortcomings. In a recent speech which was never published in Havana but was geared for party cadres, Mr Fidel Castro made a lengthy analysis of some of the causes of the economic, political and social crises which Cuba is having to face.

"The International Situation Is Terrible"

The Cuban number one makes no secret of his pessimism in this text which is accessible to a limited audience and whose restricted circulation (unlike most of his speeches which are published in full by GRANMA) is justified by the fact that few people, even in Cuba, are capable of appreciating all the factors in an underdeveloped situation.

"The international situation is terrible," Mr Fidel Castro said. "1979 has been exceptionally unfavorable for our economy." Therefore it is necessary to "precisely define the extent of our problems." "Let us not just bandy words about," the Cuban leader said. "Let us be realistic, because conditions in the world today are frightful. The energy crisis is severely affecting all developing countries and ours is a developing country, although our extremely favorable agreements with the Soviet Union do give us relative protection from some shocks."

The developing countries' foreign debt amounts to $350 billion. This is an "alarming and tragic" problem. Cuba is affected "even more than the Third World countries which have oil resources." Cuba "does not benefit from credit allocated by the international financial bodies." To give an example of this deterioration in trade terms affecting all developing countries but especially Cuba, Mr Fidel Castro explained: "Ten years ago 1 ton of sugar was traded for 6 or 7 tons of oil. Today they have reached the same level. Oil prices have increased 14-fold while sugar prices have only doubled. In addition the oil-producing countries only deposit their revenue in capitalist countries and never in underdeveloped countries." Cuba usually has to spend $3 billion per year for oil consumption alone. However, its sugar production, estimated at 7 million tons on average, would only earn $2 billion at world market prices. These figures are the root of the Cuban economic crisis.

Does Cuba only produce sugar? That was true for a very long time but it is less true today. In addition to the two other main resources--nickel and plums--there is now tourism (around $100 million in revenue in 1979) and exports of lobsters ($150 million). Tobacco, however, is severely affected by a decline which "is said to be cyclical," but Mr Castro has no illusions and in this sphere he seems to fear that the malady "might be permanent." Paradoxically for the island of cigars, Cuba could become a cigar importer!

The price of nickel has risen by around 40 percent on the international market. However the nickel industry is very energy-intensive and hence consumes a great deal of oil. "With a production of 30,000 tons of nickel at $4,500, Cuba could earn $145 million. However, the 600,000 tons of oil required by the nickel factory cost some $150 million at OPEC prices."

"That has been the tragedy of the Cuban revolution for the past 20 years!" Mr Fidel Castro exclaimed. "However, there is one difference: In the first few years consumption levels were low. There were less than 7 million inhabitants in Cuba. Our population is now more than 10 million and social spending has risen in education and the health system. These are areas in which spending cannot be cut."

Another shadow hanging over the economy is the shortage of timber for building. In 1979 Cuba was counting on a supply of 500,000 cubic meters of building timber from socialist bloc countries. Around half that amount was supplied. Therefore there is a major shortfall in the building of houses and furniture and in packaging. "Yes, 1979 was really very difficult for a whole series of reasons...." And Mr Fidel Castro--naively?--suggested that Cuban lumberjacks should go to Siberia and chop the timber Cuba urgently needs since, he said, "the resources of a fraternal country are at its brothers' disposal." On the other hand, the Cuban leader would willingly go without the 200,000 television sets sold to Cuba by socialist countries each year. Cuba already has 1.2 million televisions. However, "we must also accept what our trading partners are most prepared to sell us...."

Trade With the USSR

In 1979 the total amount of trade between the USSR and Cuba rose to 4.5 billion rubles. Indeed more than 60 percent of Cuba's foreign trade is with the Soviet Union. Is this excessive dependence or a factor in the survival of the economy and hence of the regime? Mr Fidel Castro, who is aware of the dangers and threats, tends to opt for the second alternative, especially since the Soviets have just renewed their promises of aid.

"The USSR," Mr Castro recalled, "has always bought our sugar at a higher price than the world market price and has always sold us oil at a lower price than the OPEC countries." In 1979 the USSR sold oil at around 70 Cuban pesos while it was worth 200 pesos on the international market. Moscow has pledged to supply all Cuba's oil needs from 1981 to 1985, in other words 61 million tons (note 1: The Cubans were asking for 63 million tons). This implies an increase in annual consumption from 11 million tons in 1980 to 14 million tons in 1985. In addition the Soviets have promised not to buy additional quantities of sugar in order to leave around 17 million tons of sugar available on the free market during the 5 years of the plan already decided (note 2: A disease, mildew, will make it necessary to replace some sugarcane plantations and reduce a sugar production estimated at 20 million tons between now and 1985).

However, although energy supplies are guaranteed for the next 5 years, other problems will nonetheless force the Cuban leaders to reduce the growth rate to 3-4 percent instead of the 6-7 percent planned. This means relative recession, the continuation of restrictions, food rationing and hence the aggravation of a social malaise caused mainly by these everyday problems to which the average Cuban can see no end.

Although the "main conquests" of the revolution will be maintained (exceptional health system; 95 percent of 6-year old children attending school; 3 million Cubans at school or university), Mr Fidel Castro is announcing blood, sweat and tears. To all those who feel wary, whom he describes, a little hastily, as "counterrevolutionaries" or merely "delinquents", he promises "more prisons" or urges them to adopt the spirit "which motivates the soldiers, doctors and builders in Africa." This argument does not have much weight judging by the Peru Embassy incident. Delinquency, the black market and indifference encouraged by an unwieldly and inefficient bureaucracy have increased. The "new man" of whom Che Guevara dreamed has not grown up in the wake of the Cuban revolution. The growing dependence on the USSR is naturally accompanied by the installation of a political system increasingly close to the Soviet model and tolerated less and less by the Cubans.

CUBAN EMIGRATION POSES 'TRICKY SITUATION' FOR CASTRO

ID111441 Paris LE MONDE in French 8 Apr 80 p 1

[Editorial: "Castroism in Question"]

[Text] The exodus of Cubans hostile to the regime installed in Havana 21 years ago has never stopped. It began in the first few days after the victory of the guerrillas, who came down from the Sierra Maestra to defeat Batista's corrupt and cruel dictatorship.

This exodus, at first opposed and then accepted and even encouraged by the Havana leaders with a view to normalization with the United States, initially affected the bourgeois and middle classes, discouraged by the communist options chosen by Fidel Castro's government. In the past few years it has spread to the popular classes--workers and peasants--who are in principle the beneficiaries of a socialist system whose shortcomings, failings, overwhelming and inefficient bureaucracy, lack of flexibility and failures are moveover regularly denounced by the leaders themselves, especially by Mr Fidel Castro. He admitted, quoting figures to support his point, the extent to which Cuba's shaky economy depends on regualr Soviet aid.

With an increasingly narrow margin for maneuver with regard to the Soviet ally and with growing internal problems, the Cuban malaise had already been highlighted last January with a spectacular reshuffle of the state machine, which took the form of increasing Mr Fidel Castro's already considerable powers. Since then, there have been a growing number of arrests, filling the prisons with new contingents of "delinquents" to take the place of "political" prisoners, some of whom were released 2 years ago. Discontent has increased among the population, who are weary of the constraints imposed by a rationing system which does not seem likely to end and by the difficulties of daily life, especially with regard to transport.

For a very long time the Cuban leaders, subjected, it is true, to a pitiless offensive from their enemies abroad, have succeeded in discuising the size of the prison population under the Castro regime--a size which rivals that in military and totalitarian regimes on the subcontinent denounced by Havana. The releases have helped to shed light on this very negative aspect of the Cuban regime. However, the Havana government can now no longer hide the fact that broad sections of the population see no other way out than fleeing to other countries. The authorities only had to announce last week--perhaps imprudently, and perhaps deliberately to cause embarrassment to the Peruvian and Venezuelan diplomatic representatives--that all Cubans wishing to leave the country could do so freely, for the flood of candidates for exile to swell out of all proportion.

The presence of several thousand Cubans packed into the Peruvian diplomatic compound in Havana (following repeated incidents over the past few weeks at the Venezuelan Embassy) places Mr Castro in a very tricky situation. First by aggravating the masked crisis in relations between Cuba on the one hand and Peru and Venezuela on the other, while the Cuban leaders, anxious to "disengage" from Africa, are contemplating reviving their Latin American offensive in favor of the crises in Nicaragua and El Salvador; second, by tarnishing Cuba's image among the Third World countries, when Mr Fidel Castro seems to be making his role as nonalined chairman his primary concern.

MARCHAIS ON LISBON TALKS, PARIS CP MEETING

[Unattributed report: "Friendly Meeting With Alvaro Cunhal in Lisbon"]

[Text] The PCF delegation which has just visited Madagascar, several African countries and Portugal returned to Paris yesterday. Georges Marchais and the delegation had reached Lisbon on Sunday evening.

On Monday they had talks with a Portuguese Communist Party delegation headed by Alvaro Cunhal. Georges Marchais and Alvaro Cunhal expressed great satisfaction with the content of this meeting, which will help to strengthen relations of friendship and solidarity between the French and Portuguese communists. An important joint communique was adopted after these discussions.

Georges Marchais answered many questions asked by newspaper and radio and television journalists in Portugal and on his arrival at Le Bourget yesterday. Questioned in particular on the significance of his meeting with Alvaro Cunhal, Georges Marchais recalled the close ties which have existed between the two parties since the difficult period of the Portuguese people's struggle against the fascist dictatorship.

"This meeting," the PCF secretary general stressed, "and the exchange of views to which it gave rise will enable us to extend and increase these traditional ties still further. We both want to do this and have taken steps toward this goal. This is in the interests of our two parties and our two peoples."

Another question was put to Georges Marchais regarding the forthcoming "conference of European communist and workers parties in Paris."

European Communist Parties: An Open Meeting for Peace

The PCF secretary general replied: "It is definitely not a conference of communist and workers parties as some people claim. It is a meeting among the parties with a specific objective. As you know, we French Communists are men of peace advocating disarmament and peaceful coexistence. However, extremely grave decisions have been taken by the NATO countries on U.S. orders to deploy new U.S. nuclear missiles on our continent, where so many destructive weapons have already been accumulated. That decision is full of dangers for our peoples and for the world. We must oppose this escalation in the arms race. That is why we and our Polish comrades thought it would be useful for communist and workers parties to assert their common stance on such an important issue.

"The aim of this meeting therefore is to launch an appeal to the people of Europe to rally together and take action to halt this escalation and to move toward arms reduction. Its aim is also to call on all peace-loving forces, socialist, social democratic and Christian forces to join the communists in this crucial action.

"Of course each party will freely decide its stance with regard to this meeting and its objectives. However, we hope that the largest possible number of communist and workers parties will take part in it.

"In no case could this initiative lead to a split among communist and workers parties. I repeat: Each party is free to choose in keeping with the aims proposed. As far as we are concerned, whenever initiatives on specific objectives corresponding to the interests of the workers, peoples and nations are put to us we always examine these initiatives eagerly."

EUROCOMMUNISM 'MORIBUND' FOLLOWING CP MEETING POLEMIC

[Editorial: "Moribund Eurocommunism"]

[Text] We already knew that Eurocommunism was sick, particularly after the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. Should it not be regarded as moribund?

The PCI has confirmed that it does not intend to take part in the conference on peace and disarmament to be held in Paris by the PCF and the PZPR [Polish United Workers Party]. The Spanish Communists had already decided not to attend.

Preparations for this conference could also accentuate some of the splits between socialist countries. The Yugoslav communists have indicated that they too will not attend a meeting which "would merely serve Soviet propaganda." Furthermore there is speculation on what attitude the Romanians will adopt since they have not been sparing in their implicit criticism of Moscow with regard to Afghanistan. As far as the Poles are concerned, the fact that they are coorganizers of the conference seems, if not in outright conflict, at least not really in keeping with their insistent efforts in favor of a European conference on military detente and disarmament.

However, this initiative has above all exposed and aggravated the differences of opinion between the PCF and its Eurocommunist partners which emerged over the Afghan affair. The reasons put forward by the Italian and Spanish communists to justify their refusal are significant. Indeed in Madrid and Rome they are stressing the fact that such a meeting would give the "erroneous impression" that the participants were alining "with the positions which the Warsaw Pact supports in European matters," the PCE writes, and would be likely to give the impression that all communist parties form an "international organization" with one "decisionmaking center," as the PCI notes.

The second grievance expressed by the Italian Communists to the conference's French organizers is no less important. The PCI thinks that disarmament questions should not just be debated among the communist parties nor should they remain outside the "vast debate including socialists, social democrats, Christian organizations and groups from other movements," which has started in Europe on this question.

This tone contrasts sharply with the tone used by Mr Marchais and his friends when talking of the socialist parties (especially the French Socialist Party, of course) and social democratic parties, now being accused increasingly frequently of joining Washington's camp in diplomatic matters and the employers' and "bourgeois" governments' camp on the economic and political plane. Mr Berlinguer's friends probably had special reason for making this last remark in view of the attack by the French Communists on the PCI secretary general over his recent meeting with Mr Mitterrand in Strasbourg.

However, it cannot simply be seen as an ironic reply to a condemnation which caused more surprise than annoyance in Rome. Indeed, on the two matters of allegiance to Moscow and the choice of a strategy--which ranges from leftwing union to "historical compromise"--the Paris conference affair, coming after events in Afghanistan, gives the impression that Eurocommunism, even if its death certificate has not yet been drawn up (any more than its birth certificate was), will probably not recover from the PCF's return to the Soviet sphere of influence.

AMBASSADOR TO IRAN COMMENTS ON MEETING WITH BANI-SADR

LD142136 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 2030 GMT 14 Apr 80

[Report by Corrado Granella]

[Text] As is known, the ambassadors of EEC countries who were received the other day by Iranian President Bani-Sadr have returned home to report to their respective governments on the development of the situation. Italian Ambassador Tamagnini returned to Rome today. He confirmed to journalists what in fact had been known, that is to say, that during their talks with Bani-Sadr it was not possible to gain anything except permission for a visit by the International Red Cross, which took place today.

The ambassador also referred to the presence of many Italian workers in Iran which, coupled with enormous financial commitments taken on by some Italian firms, represents an additional motive for our government to make a considered and responsible study of the Iranian affair.

OLYMPIC COMMITTEE CHAIRMAN COMMENTS ON U.S. BOYCOTT

AU150855 Rome ANSA in English 0830 GMT 15 Apr 80

[Text] Rome, April 15 (ANSA)--The chairman of the Italian Olympics Committee, Franco Carraro, declared in the evening that the decision of the United States Olympic Committee to not send its athletes to the summer games in Moscow was a "bitter one and (?raises) serious concern for the future of the Olympics movement and international sports meets." He went on to speak of the U.S. boycott as responsible for a "situation in which it is even more important for the Western European Olympics committees to adopt a unified position."

Speaking of his own committee's stance on participation in the Soviet Olympics, Carraro disclosed that developments will come under examination during an executive session on Thursday and that a final decision on the boycott issue can be expected around May 20 when the entire committee meets.

COSSIGA SPEECH OPENS CONFIDENCE DEBATE ON NEW GOVERNMENT

The new government is a coalition of Cossiga's own Christian Democratic (DC) with the Socialists (PSI), in government for the first time since the demise of the center-left, and the Republicans (PRI). According to Cossiga, in putting together the coalition, which enjoys a reasonably good parliamentary majority, he was aware of the "timeliness" of seeking "consensus and understandings in the spirit of national solidarity."

In his brief historical preface, the prime minister recalled that the formation of his first government in August last year was designed "to get the normal mechanism of the institutions moving again and to create a space for dialogue and confrontation between the political forces for the definition of a stable political and parliamentary framework." He added that the new coalition was realized "in the context of what is politically useful and possible," promising to work in terms of an "open and constructive debate" with the opposition.

The major opposition grouping is the Italian Communist Party (PCI), a close rival of the DC in terms of share of the vote. Also on the opposition benches are Cossiga's erstwhile partners in his previous administration, the centrist Social Democrat (PSDI) and Liberal (PLI) parties.

In a connected point, Cossiga said the coalicion partners had agreed they should avoid government practices which would create "disorganization or fragmentation", and would work for "authentic collegiality".

He also urged closer synchronization between government policy making and the progress of Parliament's work in order to avoid delays that often [word indistinct] issuing government decrees.

But the new premier identified terrorism as the gravest question facing the government, which he pledged to introducing "more incisive administrative, organization and ordinary measures". These would include strengthening the policy, the organization of a police data bank, the introduction of more modern police techniques, the "urgent" approval of the police reform bill already before Parliament, and judicial reform, he said. In this connection, he said the government intends to consider the most ample possibilities of reducing the sentence of those terrorists who "dissociate" themselves from their terrorist past.

Another key point in this section of the speech was Cossiga's pledge to bring existing plans for a revision of Italy's concordat with the Vatican to their "final conclusion".

Another major slice of the speech was devoted to economic policy, with references to the whole range of ills afflicting the Italian economy--the backward south, unemployment, the efficiency of the public administration, the imbalances of public finances, the crises of some large industrial groups and sectors.

One premise for the government's economic policies, Cossiga announced, will be defense of equilibrium in the balance-of-payments, which "could be facilitated by adequate and indispensable international cooperation".

At the same time, the government plans to contain and reduce inflation to the EEC's average level while getting to work on the structural problems which form the "principles objective in the sphere of economic policy".

He listed other objectives as being:

A "severe and rigorous" policy as regards public finance.

A relaunching of economic planning.

An "organic" energy policy.

This last would involve reducing Italy's dependence on oil by the "conservation and rational use of energy and the development of renewable and alternative energy sources", he said.

Other major areas of government action will be the backward south, righting the position of crisis-hit public and private sector firms, agriculture, home construction, and transport.

Foreign affairs took up the third major slice of Cossiga's speech, which opened with the warning that the international situation is "grave, complex and delicate".

With Italy currently serving its six-month mandate as the EEC's duty chairman, Cossiga said its chairmanship would be inspired by two guidelines:

A "solid and convinced" participation in the Atlantic alliance as a "purely defensive" organization.

A "convinced commitment" to the realization of increasingly close economic integration and political cooperation in Europe.

In this context, the prime minister rejected the idea of a Europe that is "neutral or a third force" as "unacceptable on the plane of principles and values".

"It is unrealistic within the framework of the great equilibriums", he argued. "Beyond the intentions of those who propose it, it may introduce grave factors for destabilization because of the unknown spaces it would open up in the arrangement of international influences".

According to Cossiga, a "free and democratic Europe" which is firm in safeguarding its security and heritage of liberty and culture and is "open to dialogue and friendship with all peoples", would rather be a "factor for great stability and security for everyone".

In related points, Cossiga said the government would:

Make every effort to ensure that levels of conventional and nuclear arms move towards the lowest point possible.

Use Italy's "positive" political and economic relations with the Soviet Union to "continue dialogue".

This was, above all, to safeguard the "essential role" which the European Security and Cooperation Conference can play in detente.

On Afghanistan, Cossiga reiterated the West's condemnation of the Soviet intervention and confirmed Italian support for the EEC's February 19 proposal for a "neutral Afghanistan". He also disclosed that the Italian Government would continue to work for intensification of the practice of direct consultations between the leaders of the United States and the major European powers.

On Iran, he deplored the seizure of the American hostages in Tehran, but asserted the Rome government's "respect for the Iranian people's difficult search for expression of its national particularity".

"There is also the prudent concern not to introduce further elements of disturbance in such a difficult situation and also to safeguard legitimate real and personal interests", Cossiga asserted. "But there is also full solidarity for the people and government of the United States and the firmest determination to work, in the opportune multilateral and bilateral international forums, to safeguard people's right to have their safety guaranteed and to ensure the liberation of the hostages unjustly held".

On the Middle East: "All the parties must make an effort to accept the obvious fact that two great peoples, the Israeli people and the Palestinian people, must in any case find the path a loyal living together".

On the Mediterranean: The government will devote particular attention to relations with Mediterranean countries such as Tunisia, Libya, Algeria and Malta, and with neighbours such as Austria and Yugoslavia.

On China: "The government intends to respond with a spirit of increasing friendship to the warm and cordial openings that come from the People's Republic of China. Relations with this great country, which have been intensified in recent years, have received a further impulse following the recent visit to Italy of Prime Minister Hua Guofeng, whom we received with a spirit of friendship and from whom we received attestations of esteem and friendship."

On the Third World [words indistinct] non-aligned countries: "Making concrete and articulated moves on the bilateral and multilateral level, the government intends to interpret (Italy's) effective recognition of the fundamental role they play in safeguarding peace and in solving the problems of development on the world level."

BERLINGUER EXPLAINS PCI RATIONALE ON INTERNATIONAL ISSUES

LD111039 Rome L'UNITA in Italian 5 Apr 80 pp 1, 7, 8

[Report on PCI Secretary General Enrico Berlinguer's 3 April address to PCI National Council session in Rome: "PCI's Initiative in Europe and Throughout the World"]

[Excerpts] I would first like to make some observations concerning international issues, Berlinguer began. I do not consider it necessary to review at any length, following Comrade Gian Carlo Pajetta's speech, the reasons which prompted us to consider the French and Polish comrades' initiative to convene a European communist party conference wrong in method, timing and theme. And it was precisely with a view to the need to lend maximum effectiveness to our struggle for detente and disarmament that we decided not to attend.

In this connection I would like to reply more generally to those who are wondering about the significance of the stances and initiatives on international issues which our party has been adopting over the years and especially in recent months--from our stances on the so-called "Euromissiles" to those on the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan; from the meetings with representatives of European and socialist parties and of progressive and liberation movements of other countries up to the imminent visit to the PRC by a PCI delegation.

There has been no shortage of unfounded interpretations of these stances and initiatives of ours. I believe, however, that we should all welcome the lively interest which they have prompted both in Italy and abroad while noting, however, that the excessive sensationalism which has occurred here and there obviously does not aid an understanding of the true meaning of these stances and initiatives. Furthermore, some commentators tend to interpret these initiatives of ours as something governed by domestic political calculations: According to them, everything can be explained by an effort on our part to remove--as one paper stated again yesterday--the main obstacle to Communist participation in government. These commentators are on the wrong track, the PCI secretary general said. We really are not ashamed of stressing how opportune and necessary it is to have a democratic unity government with the Communist Party's participation; in our belief that this is the most responsible kind of government, the only kind really equal to our country's tragic problems, and we intend to fight to create the conditions which are needed for this government to be formed. We are also well aware that the success of the struggle for this goal implies the quest for an understanding among the democratic forces also on foreign policy topics. For that matter, this is what has happened in past years--first through the foreign policy agreements reached among the parties which comprised the March 1978 parliamentary majority. What was achieved then in connection with these issues was a real meeting point among the various democratic parties. [paragraph continues]

In this connection the PCI secretary general said parenthetically: I would like to clearly state (for the sake of avoiding reticence and excessively diplomatic stances, which Comrade Bufalini rightly urged from us the other day) that the foreign policy motion recently passed by the lower house cannot be unreservedly defended. The motion contains some positive and correct formulations, but it also contains others which partly conflict with our previous stances. And I say this, Berlinguer added, while standing firm, of course, on my disapproval of those comrades--if any--who failed to observe voting discipline and thus harmed the party.

Be that as it may, it is clear that in the foreign policy field the obstacles to an understanding with us--and, I would add, the existing obstacle to a bolder Italian initiative in international affairs--do not stem from our alleged lack of autonomy with respect to the CPSU or any other Communist Party (this thesis can now only be asserted by people in bad faith), but from a real and now proven absence of autonomy on the Christian Democratic Party's [DC] part with respect to the United States.

And let us not forget the no less real, longstanding and profound obstacle to forming a democratic government with Communist Party participation, namely the DC's desire to stay rooted in its elitist view of power and to the vast patron-and-client system which forms its basis, apart from its electoral strength.

I am not now going to recall in detail our stances on the so-called "Euromissiles" and on the issues of the arms balance and reduction, on the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan and the subsequent reprisals decided on the United States. I will point out that these and other factors prompted us to stress one point above all others in our analysis: Throughout the world a process was growing whose most dangerous epicenter was and still is the exacerbation of the conflict between the United States and the Soviet Union. We saw in this the main cause of the crisis of detente, the disappearance of even minimal trust and the advance of a real threat to world peace. We therefore stressed the need for action from the most diverse forces--all those which could, to a greater or lesser extent, help to alleviate the tension and restart the dialog and negotiations between the major powers--the United States and the USSR--and the two blocs, but also more generally among all states and all forces concerned with a solution of the current conflicts in various parts of the world, disarmament and cooperation, especially emphasizing the non-alined countries' role, the role of Europe with its workers movement, its democratic and progressive forces and its states and governments and the special and significant role of authorities such as the Catholic Church.

If we look at how things have developed in recent months, Berlinguer said, we can note that the weight and initiative of such forces have exerted a positive, albeit still insufficient, influence; the influence has been felt in the positions and initiative of a number of nonalined countries, some European countries and some communist and socialist parties including our own. So the Italian Communists' initiative has developed in a manner which is consistent with this analysis with particular dynamism in recent months, but--I repeat--as a continuation and development of the analysis already outlined at our 15th national congress.

Relations With Communist Parties

In this spirit we have undertaken recently to strengthen primarily relations and solidarity with the communist parties with which for some time we have felt a greater affinity of analysis and judgment on foreign policy topics and on the problems of the international workers movement and, above all, with the League of Communists of Yugoslavia [LCY]. [paragraph continues]

We believe that the good relations which now exist (and which, we can say, have existed for a long time) between the PCI and LCY reflect the profound national interests of Italy and Yugoslavia as neighboring countries and also the very important role which we, as Italians and Italian Communists, attach to an independent nonalined Yugoslavia as the protagonist of its own original road to socialism in Europe and with respect to the Third World. The comrades also know that we have extended and multiplied our contacts with several other communist parties both in Europe and on other continents. And just yesterday Comrade Cervetti had a meeting in Moscow with Comrade Kirilenko and other CPSU leaders.

The new factor now, as far as our relations with the communist parties are concerned, is the CCP's invitation to us to send a delegation to China. This marks the reestablishment of relations between the parties, interrupted for many years, which we always hoped to be able to resume. Those who are acquainted not only with our stances but also with the method with which we seek and maintain relations with all democratic, progressive and revolutionary parties, both Communist and noncommunist, in all countries, should clearly understand the spirit in which we are undertaking this visit to China and this resumption of relations with the CCP. Furthermore--and perhaps now is the time to recall this--we could point to the stances on China and our attitude toward the problem of relations with the CCP, which we adopted back in 1969 at the Moscow International Communist Party Conference.

The significance and aim of the meetings which we will have are very clear to us: a better objective acquaintance with the real situation in which the two parties operate; mutual respect for each side's stances and for their mutual autonomy; a frank discussion of points of disagreement, the existence of which both sides are aware; and the quest for every possible convergence with regard to both relations between the parties, the countries and the peoples and the major issues of peace and cooperation in the various parts of the world.

This resumption of relations is not aimed against anyone else. It is consistent with the policy which prompted us to clearly express our ideas and free beliefs to all our interlocutors, always motivated by the desire to help surmount conflicts and develop cooperation for the sake of detente and peace, toward a unity of human society freed from the nightmare of war and from every form of exploitation and oppression.

Apart from with a number of communist parties, Berlinguer continued, we have had contacts with other forces, with Third World forces (the comrades have seen that we have established, resumed or begun for the first time relations with several parties, as for instance with the two Indian communist parties and the Congress Party) and we have had a series of meetings in Europe, including meetings with the various socialist and social democratic parties.

I cannot understand how these latest meetings can be regarded by some people as conflicting with "Eurocommunism." We have never regarded "Eurocommunism" as the West European communist parties' shouldering of an exclusive role. Indeed, we have always said that one of the essential traits of the strategy called "Eurocommunism," which aims to transform the industrialized and developed European countries democratically in a socialist direction, lies in the quest for the unity of all European socialist, progressive and democratic workers forces in pursuit of these aims. This essential trait has always been acknowledged, shared and clearly stated in all the documents approved with the PCF, the PCE and other communist parties.

In outlining such an aim we have always borne in mind--and we must always bear in mind--that there are some countries in Western Europe where the working class in mainly (although not exclusively) represented by the Communist Party (I would say this applies mainly to Italy, because here we are without great and solid strength, although there is also a considerable Socialist Party and also some workers sectors which identify with Catholic movements and partly even with the DC). In Western Europe there are also other countries where both the communist and socialist parties are strong; finally, there are other countries, both large and small, where the workers movement has found its political expression mainly in socialist and social democratic parties. These are the facts, on the basis of which we developed our quest and initiative in years past, although this quest and initiative have become more specific recently.

In fact, it is obvious that latest developments in the world and European situations have in recent months made our concern with the quest for understanding among all the forces of the workers movement even more pressing. This is necessitated both by the increase in European and world tension and by the fundamental crisis of capitalism, which is acknowledged also by considerable forces in the social democratic movements, among which there are developing critical reflections and quests for new ways of moving beyond capitalism as a system based on the capitalist-developed metropolitan areas' exploitation of the vast areas of underdevelopment and famine. This fundamental nature of the crisis now affecting capitalism is acknowledged and is emerging also in the attitudes of certain social democratic forces. though a full realization of it is still hampered by the survival of some of the traditional narrow outlooks, signs of which are also apparent in the European trade union movement and partly even in the West European communist movement and which stem ultimately from what Lenin defined as "workers aristocracies." This reveals a shortcoming in the view of world and European problems on the part of the developed capitalist countries' working class--a shortcoming which, however, we do not consider insurmountable and which, indeed, we are strongly committed to surmounting, while noting the difficulties.

New International Tensions

At the same time, the fundamental crisis of capitalism and the tension in international relations are pushing the rightwing forces in Europe toward a more aggressive policy. Their aim is to make the working masses the only ones to bear the cost of emerging from the crisis, to attack democratic gains and to impose a foreign policy which would lead to a further exacerbation of relations between the blocs, in an attempt to return, however unrealistically, to the cold war policy aimed at making the socialist countries' reality regress--a policy which would in fact be absurd. Furthermore, the capitalist countries' most aggressive rightwing groups are acting--or would like to act--as policemen with respect to the most diverse Third World liberation movements, from Iran to El Salvador, from whose people and tumultuous struggle has emerged the lofty figure of the martyred Archbishop Oscar Romero.

How, Berlinguer asked, can we deal with and victoriously repel the policy of these rightwing forces in Europe? This is the question we ask both ourselves and the comrades of the communist parties in other countries and, more generally, all Italian and European progressive forces. Our answer is clear: We must develop the broadest, though flexible alinement of workers, peoples, democratic and peace-loving forces. This is the only method which can lead to results and will have a real effect on the balance of forces and change them. If, on the other hand, you believe that the present aim can only be to preserve the communist parties' strength, if you take it for granted that the socialist and social democratic parties have become irremediable allies of the rightwing parties, then you are first asserting an untruth, but above all you are condemning youself to isolation and the absence of any initiative. [paragraph continues]

We must always keep alive in the minds of the Italian and European working class the importance among the causes which opened the way to fascism in the thirties--and later brought it victory--of the splits in the workers movement; their importance in pre-1933 Germany; the importance, in the opposite direction, of the unity of communists and socialists and all democratic and antifascist forces in France in 1934 against the reactionary venture attempted at the time in that country. And we must remember the lesson learned in 1935 from these and other experiences by the Seventh Comintern Congress, with its criticism of "sectarian" attitudes toward the socialist parties and its action which, by embracing the most positive experience which had developed in the field of united action, particularly in France and Spain, outlined the victorious road of the unity of the major workers, democratic and antifascist forces.

Of course the situation is different now, but even today it is true that if the workers movement is split, the right will win. This strengthens our determination to make every effort, although we are aware of the differences between our ideas and those of the social democrats, to seek a genuine and thorough political and ideological unity of the workers movement in Italy and throughout Western Europe.

Hope, Faith and Struggle

We will not abandon this task, Berlinguer said, however arduous it may seem to us, partly because only by advancing along this path can we not only deal with the reactionary and bellicose rightwing forces' policy, but also lend credibility to the objectives of the revolution in the West and create and keep alive in the working class and peoples masses and instill in the younger generations faith, hope in and, above all, a commitment to the struggle to build a new kind of society in Italy and throughout Europe. And we all know how much this hope, this faith and this struggle are needed, in view of a crisis which is causing so much confusion.

None of what we are saying and doing has anything to do with a "change of camp." We have never belonged and do not belong to any camp, Berlinguer said, and we do not recognize any leading party or state. We are ourselves and we are part of a workers and democratic movement, of a very broad, varied and multifarious world anti-imperialist movement, in which we participate and retain our autonomy, our own individuality and our own initiative.

I believe, the PCI secretary general continued, that the strength which this combination of analyses, stances and specific actions which I have indicated can give to the action of our party and of the Italian and European workers movement is beginning to be understood by broad sectors of the peoples' masses and democratic public opinion.

We have drawn two conclusions from this: First, that we must not take any action or decision which conflicts with this policy, whose main points I have indicated, or which might even merely hinder its full implementation. Such, for instance, would be our participation in the Paris conference: In this connection Pajetta has, I repeat, already fully explained our reservations regarding both content and timing but also, I would emphasize, method, which is very important, because it concerns the very principles of relationships among communist parties and also their practice, since the practice which is being followed this time differs from the practice followed in the preparations for the Berlin conference, during which no party was confronted with ready-made decisions or faits accomplis by other parties.

Hence our decision. Nevertheless, we for our part will not follow it with an exacerbation of polemics and still less a splittist attitude toward the parties which do attend the conference.

The second conclusion which we must draw is that the debate among our ranks, which has been prompted by the developments in our strategy and initiative, must be conducted in such a way as to use all the potential and innovations inherent in such developments, so as to impart greater impetus to our action among the masses instead of becoming delayed and paralyzed in disputes overtaken by real European and world events. Of course there must be patience and clarity; but above all there must be a capacity to follow the chosen path consistently, without concessions to the adversary, without allowing ourselves to be manipulated by anyone and therefore without fluctuations: Only thus will we refrain from damaging the party and only thus will the party and the country draw the best advantage from our policy, our struggle and our initiatives.

L'UNITA EXPANDS CRITICISM OF 'WEAKER THAN EXPECTED' GOVERNMENT

LD141151 Rome L'UNITA in Italian 6 Apr 80 pp 1, 20

[PCI Secretariat member Alessandro Natta article: "Problems of Governability Unresolved"]

[Excerpt] The new Cabinet which Deputy Cossiga has formed appears to have a political basis different from the previous Cabinet and should be able to count on a pre-established and self-sufficient parliamentary majority. Nevertheless, it would be rash to believe that this resolves our country's governability problem. In any case, it seems to me that the leader of the three majority parties--the Christian Democratic Party [DC], the Italian Socialist Party [PSI] and the Italian Republican Party [PRI]--and the government have felt reluctant to cite the three-party government as the most valid and strongest choice for tackling the emergency, still less a solution capable of initiating and guiding a new political phase. This limitation, the absence of scope and vigor, of a sure political proposal and of a definite and clear outlook, have been highlighted by the very quest--which has been attempted during the crisis, in various and conflicting directions--for some kind of extension of the majority and some kind of support, even external and partial, and by the persistent invocations of an appeals to democratic and national solidarity, though this reference is emerging increasingly as a camouflage for ulterior motives in the present DC leadership group.

The fact is that the gravity--in many aspects dramatic--of our country's situation and the dangers of the crisis and the international tensions demanded more than ever a political change--a government capable of utilizing all the democratic forces and the energies and capabilities of the entire workers movement. This solution was rejected. And it is an objective, though worrisome observation that the three-party government will be unable to tackle efficiently the vast, difficult and pressing work of social reform and democratic development which Italy needs. But this is affected also by the burden of ambiguity and the uncertainty of political events in recent months. It must be remembered that this government stems from the fear and refusal of the majority at the DC congress to face a real form of cooperation with the PCI on an equal footing, because this would have meant a commitment to real economic and social change, the elimination of a concept of power and political alliances, of a mentality and form of conduct--reflected in the DC's "centrality"--which have now become intolerable.

This solution has been partially reached also as a result of the contradiction within the PSI between the proposal and advocacy of a government of full solidarity without second choices and the invocations of the commitment to guarantee governability, which implied an amenability to cooperation with the DC and lent hope to the DC's most stubborn currents of being able to avoid the problem of relations with the leftwing forces as a whole. Even positive aspects, such as the failure of the hypothesis of a five-party government or the blow suffered by the Italian Social Democratic Party because of its stubborn and hostile stance toward the democratic unity policy, become of secondary importance in this framework. Of course these aspects could not attenuate our negative verdict on a solution which we not only consider unsatisfactory and which threatens to prove unequal to the tasks set by the scale and dangerous nature of the Italian crisis, but which leaves our course undecided and ambivalent and therefore perpetuates the political uncertainty which, as Berlinguer stressed at our party's National Council session, is the major and gravest factor in the crisis of the Italian state and society.

This critical verdict on the significance and political nature of the three-party government must now unfortunately be expanded, because we consider the Cabinet's structure and composition to be a weary, narrow-minded and disappointing reflection of the DC's typical method of regarding and forming government coalitions. Not the slightest attempt was made to bring about a change--none of the structural innovations to guarantee a unitary approach and leadership in decisive areas such as, for instance, economic and financial policy was offered, even though they were, after all, proposed and considered necessary by the socialist comrades too not long ago. What is worse, there has been an increase in the number of ministers--and even under secretaries!--who are maintaining the divisions between those ministries which had been merged, restoring posts which it had been considered opportune to eliminate and inventing new functions of indefinite and doubtful substance. Who knows what Senator Andreatta's [minister without portfolio] "special duties" will be? And was a minister for EEC affairs really necessary? And another minister for regional affairs? The serious point is that the logic which governed these decisions was once again the logic of the DC's own requirements: The distribution of ministries calibrated with regard to their number and importance on the basis of the strength of the various currents. Whether a single-party or three-party government of some type, the rules of the notorious instruction manual still apply and the criteria of competence and even proven capabilities can become subordinate. I do not want to argue about the individuals chosen, though some of them could seem questionable immediately, or about the allocation of posts, whose correspondence to the individuals' political and specialist qualities we will assess on the basis of their performance. I believe it would be difficult to claim that Deputy Cossiga exercised his constitutional prerogatives to the fullest, despite the entreaty and support of the president of the republic.

But the most important point is that the government--because of its composition, the essential refusal to include the leftwing and other minority groups of the PSI and the arbitrary exclusions made in order to retain the DC's key positions--has proved to be (or was this intentional?) weaker than expected, less "balanced" than was announced and without the imprint of innovation and rigor or the guarantees of coordination and collegiality which it would have been right to expect. Therefore, the unity of approach, the efficiency, correctness and justice in administration which are inalienable requirements for Italian democracy still remain to be fully proven.

OLYMPIC COMMITTEE 'DEPLORES' U.S. BOYCOTT DECISION

LD141500 Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 1400 GMT 14 Apr 80

[Text] The Finnish Olympic Committee regards as deplorable the decision of the U.S. Olympic Committee to send no team to the Moscow Olympics. The secretary general of the Finnish Olympic Committee, Kosti Rasinpera, notes that the decision of the United States was not unexpected after President Jimmy Carter's powerful boycott campaign. According to Rasinpera, the participation of American athletes in the games is still possible in principle if the International Olympic Committee decides to approve the participation of athletes who do not represent any state. Such an amendment of the rules, however, Rasinpera points out, creates its own problems. The U.S. Olympic Committee decided over the weekend not to send a team to the Moscow Olympics unless the Soviet Union withdraws its troops from Afghanistan by 24 May.

IRAQI FOREIGN MINISTER HOLDS TALKS WITH VAYRYNEN

[Text] Iraqi Foreign Minister Sa'dun Hammadi has had talks with Foreign Minister Paavo Vayrynen on the situation in the Middle East and Southwest Asia. The bilateral relations of Finland and Iraq were also discussed. After the meeting Vayrynen noted that both sides expressed their desire to increase commercial and economic cooperation. Foreign Minister Hammadi particularly wants an increase in the export of Finnish expertise. Current agreement issues were also considered, and the foreign ministers decided to investigate the need and possibilities for agreements on road transport and taxation.

In the afternoon the Iraqi foreign minister visited Prime Minister Mauno Koivisto and the national museum. The visit will end tomorrow.

Comments on USSR, Iran Relations

NC141458 Paris AFP in English 1438 GMT 14 Apr 80

[Text] Helsinki, April 14 (AFP)--Iraqi Foreign Minister Sa'dun Hammadi, currently visiting here, said today that ties between Iraq and the Soviet Union had cooled following the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan. "We condemned the intervention and demanded the withdrawal of the Soviet troops," Mr Hammadi said in an interview with the mass-circulation daily HELSINGIN SANOMAT.

The Iraqi diplomatic chief stressed that while Iraq, like Afghanistan, has a friendship treaty with the Soviet Union, the agreement with Iraq is strictly non-military. "We do not accept any military assistance from the Soviet Union," he said.

Mr Hammadi also warned that the two superpowers must stay out of the Gulf to avoid an open conflict. He added, however, that he believed there would not be a war between Iraq and Iran despite the current tension. "What we need is peace, not war," Mr Hammadi said.

NUCLEAR COOPERATION AGREEMENTS WITH LIBYA NEAR CONCLUSION

[Excerpt] The Finnish nuclear power industry is in the process of concluding agreements with Libya on export deals, worth altogether about 4 billion Finnish marks. The latest issue of the periodical MAAILMA JA ME [THE WORLD AND US] reports that the share of Finnish labor of the project under discussion--the Soviet-Finnish delivery of two nuclear power stations--is just under half. The price and some other factors will remain open until the end, but the aim is to reach specific agreements next fall between Imatran Voima and the Soviet aide, Atomenergoeksport, Imatran Voima project chief Paul Laine said.

The joint operation in third markets is based on the experiences achieved from the Loviisa nuclear power station. The sale to Libya concerns plants developed further from the Loviisa-type plant. Finland is taking part in the project as a subcontractor. Finland would deal with construction work, instrumentation and the manufacture of some equipment. A nuclear power station to be built in Libya would provide work for nearly 800 Finns. The financial value of the project is approximately 1.5 billion marks.

DENMARK

EDITORIAL TERMS U.S. BREAK WITH IRAN AS 'PATHETIC GESTURE'

LD141221 Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Danish 9 Apr 80 Pt 1 p 8

[Editorial: "Symbolic Sanctions"]

[Text] President Carter's new moves in the hostage affair are a series of punitive measures which makes no real changes in relations between the United States and Iran and will not be able to bring about any change in the hostages' circumstances. The official break in diplomatic relations with Iran is an almost pathetic gesture since America's diplomats have been held prisoner in their own Tehran embassy and the Iranian Foreign Ministry for over 5 months. The implementation of trade sanctions formalizes the fact that oil imports have been at a standstill since November and that American exports have shrunk from $350 million to $1.8 million a month. The cataloging of frozen Iranian assets with a view to eventual compensation claims makes plain the threat of confiscation which must always be present in the freezing of assets.

The expulsion of the remaining 35 Iranian diplomats from the United States is a symbolic manifestation that the policies of tolerance have now reached their limit without reaching their goal. The patient expectation that the election and inauguration of a president and the formation of a government would bring the Iranian state back into the fold of normal international relations has not been able to help the hostages out of their terrorizing situation. [paragraph continues]

The patience and the American restraint from the use of force have perhaps protected the hostages from molestation. Now the threat to use force has become apparent as the next step that the United States might be expected to take, but steps have not yet been taken in that direction and will hardly be because the use of force against the hostages would be probable retaliation.

President Carter's proclamation transformed existing circumstances into symbolic sanctions and is a public recognition of the fact that the United States has no prospect of forcing a satisfactory solution to the hostage crisis. The American Government can worsen the hostages' situation through its policies, but not improve it. The American diplomats in Tehran are now hostages in an internal conflict within the Iranian Revolution, which must follow its own course until the Revolution Council is replaced by an elected parliament. As yet, the government has no authority to act as a government and is in no position to be an effective party to negotiations with the United States. When the American President thus has no opportunity to influence in real terms the course of the hostage affair--at least in a positive direction--there will be a growing crisis for him on the domestic political front. He must show his strength and will to act without doing damage. He must march on the spot faster and faster so that those who covet his power but cannot use it are prevented from gaining a lead over him.

GOVERNMENT WILL ONLY SUPPORT UN SANCTIONS AGAINST IRAN

LD141413 Stockholm SVENSKA DAGBLADET 10 Apr 80 p 4

[Elisabeth Crona report: "Trade Minister on Iran: Shares American Protest, But Not Blockade"]

[Text] "Sweden will not participate in any trade sanctions not agreed to by the United Nations." Trade Minister Staffan Burenstam Linder told SVENSKA DAGBLADET this when asked how the United States' trade blockade would influence Sweden's affairs.

He points out that the government has condemned the occupation of the U.S. Embassy and the taking of the hostages. "Therefore, we support the American protest." But as far as trade policies are concerned, we will follow our traditional course.

The trade minister does not think that the United States will put pressure on neutral countries to follow the American moves.

[Question] What will happen to Sweden's purchases of oil from Iran? After all, we are members of the IEA [International Energy Agency] in Paris.

[Answer] "I consider it most improbable that some sort of rationing system will be introduced," Staffan Burenstam Linder said. "In addition, our membership in IEA is contingent upon our neutrality."

Sweden does not export much to Iran.

[Question] What is happening within the Swedish companies in Iran?

[Answer] "Much of their activity is at a standstill. But several companies are trying to stay in isolation there. I think it is important that they try again, when the situation in Iran has been normalized," Staffan Burenstam Linder said.

SVENSKA DAGBLADET ON INCREASED RISK OF FORCE AGAINST IRAN

LD141529 Stockholm SVENSKA DAGBLADET in Swedish 9 Apr 80 p 2

[Editorial: "Escalation"]

[Text] For 5 months President Carter has tried unsuccessfully to come to grips with his opponents in Iran. As he now lifts his stick to strike a blow, the prolonged and dangerous crisis enters a new phase which can have far-reaching and dangerous consequences.

The immediate effects of the President's severance of diplomatic relations and formalization of sanctions, which in practice already existed, run the risk of being an empty gesture. They are actions which in themselves will hardly lead to the 50 Americans, who have now been imprisoned in their own embassy in Tehran for 157 days, taking a step nearer to freedom. But now that Carter has said A, he will also be forced to say B and, in this way, the conflict might escalate to a more dangerous level.

The Americans have shown surprising patience in their attempts to find a smooth solution to a conflict situation which cannot be tolerated by the international democratic community. But it ought to have been clear to Washington at a much earlier stage that the Iranian leaders they were negotiating with had neither power nor authority.

The only person in Iran who has the power to solve the conflict is Ayatollah Khomeyni and he does not want to. Iranian President Bani-Sadr, who achieved his position after a resounding electoral victory, wants to put an end to the crisis but does not have the power.

As long as Ayatollah Khomeyni remains on the scene, the hierarchy--and consequently power--of the Iranian clergy will endure. And it seems today that the radical faction in the clergy--with the support of leftwing groups intent on continuing their struggle against "imperialism"--is the real power group in Iran. And for this group the struggle is more important than the reconstruction of the new Iran.

It is also difficult to judge the effects of the sanctions that Carter has ordered. In the short term they ought to have no practical effect on the mass of the Iranian population. As far as the provision of food is concerned, Iran has been importing grain from other sources than the United States for a long time, and the country is 70 percent self-sufficient in this respect anyway.

But with regard to machines and technical equipment, the lack of spare parts has been a problem for a long time and industry and the defense forces have been forced to "cannibalize" among the machines that they do have. Continued lack of access to foreign goods will therefore make the situation even worse for industries which now are not operating at even half capacity. At present, more than one-third of Iran's labor force is idle as a result of the chaos caused by the revolution.

For the actions which have now been decided on by the Americans to have any real effect, it will be necessary for more than America's allies to support the action. It is therefore to be expected that Washington will put increased pressure on primarily a number of European countries. Up to now the European attitude has been extremely cautious, even among those countries which have strongly condemned the inability of Iran's revolutionary leadership to come to terms with a situation which represents a violation of international law.

If a greater number of the countries of the world had demonstrated their dislike more forcefully last November the effects would have been greater. To threaten diplomatic sanctions 5 months later does not seem to be an effective move and, because of this, there is an increased risk that the United States, which has never entirely ruled out the use of force against Iran, might adopt what are called "other measures which may become necessary."

PAPER NOTES CARTER'S 'BALANCING ACT' IN MIDDLE EAST

LD141231 Stockholm DAGENS NYHETER in Swedish 9 Apr 80 p 2

[Editorial: "Lots of Balls for Carter"]

[Text] One of the chances that President Jimmy Carter has taken has failed. In the crisis surrounding the imprisoned American diplomats in Iran, he held out the promise of a settlement. Instead there will be an escalation.

Perhaps Carter really tried to mislead the U.S. electorate in order to safeguard a primary of great psychological importance. A somewhat more honorable alternative is that it was really a question of another attack of American wishful thinking in the face of the whole of that complex of partly overlapping and partly intertwining problems which go under the name of the Middle East.

There have begun to be a little too many balls for Jimmy Carter to keep in the air at once.

He is trying to prevent a dangerous fiasco in the negotiations between Israel and Egypt on autonomy for the occupied Palestinian areas.

He is trying to prevent a great escalation in violence in Lebanon, where tension between Christians, Muslim leftist groups, Syrians and Israelis is growing apace with internal unrest in Syria.

He is also trying to find some approach to all the unrest connected with the religious revival in the Muslim world.

Finally, he is trying to create, chiefly with the help of conservative Muslim allies, an anti-Soviet barrier over the whole of Western Asia.

At the bottom of all these problems lie a superpower's strategic considerations intended to secure the West access to Arab oil.

No matter how you look at it, the whole thing is a colossal balancing act in which the United States itself is not in balance. Presidential election years traditionally make their own rules according to which American administrations run the risk of being driven into passivity, wishful thinking and evasive action on the international scene or are tempted to overact.

Many people are bound to be somewhat surprised that the United States is only now breaking off relations with Iran. Others fear that the United States is using more force than the situation requires.

On the whole, the punitive program which Carter has now initiated is synonymous with the sanctions which the UN Security Council would have introduced at the end of last year if it had not been for the Soviet Union's veto. We must not forget that it is a pure act of war for which Iran's leaders must bear the responsibility through their continued protection of the students. The United States ought, if the latest measures have no effect, to be able to initiate a naval blockade and report it to the Security Council as an act of self-defense in accordance with article 7 of the UN Charter.

It is obvious that there is a risk that the crisis will continue to deepen. It is difficult to see how American offensives, such as trade blockades and the refusal of visas, would be able to make Iran more compliant. On the contrary, men such as the Ayatollah Khomeyni welcome the fact that Iran's alleged worst enemy, the United States, is adopting a sharper tone. It makes it easier for them to whip up support from Iranians who have already grown tired of and are troubled by the student occupation of the U.S. Embassy.

As the leader of a state which has just adopted offensive economic measures against an Islamic nation, Jimmy Carter welcomes now as his guest the president of another Islamic nation. It ought to be a sensitive moment for Egypt's Anwar as-Sadat. But he has himself taken up the gauntlet by taking care of the deposed shah. At present, As-Sadat appears to be the United States' only important Muslim ally: Saudi Arabia with its own internal problems is keeping the Americans at a certain distance.

The surest way for America to insure As-Sadat's continued friendship and regain some Saudi confidence would be to put pressure on the Israeli position.

The problem is that As-Sadat, despite the fact that he is condemned by almost all on the Arab side, is demanding much broader self-government for the Palestinians than the original Camp David agreement mentions. The Israeli Government, which continues its policy of illegal settlement, offers in return a strikingly modest amount of self-government. But there is no indication that Carter would dare to put his next visitor, Israel's Prime Minister Menachem Begin, against the wall. The attack on the kibbutz on Easter Tuesday which, as so often before, was appallingly enough directed against defenseless children, does of course give extra psychological support in a sensitive diplomatic situation to those Israelis who refuse to compromise on the Palestinian areas.

It is worth noting that this time it is an Iraqi organization which has claimed responsibility for the deed. Socialist, oil-rich Iraq, an increasingly important partner in cooperation with Sweden, is interested in marking its increased weight in Arab councils. This perhaps especially because the country is deeply alarmed by the religious upsurge in Iran. Fighting is reported. A collision between Iraq and Iran could overthrow all attempts to quiet the unrest in the Middle East.

It is to be hoped that the U.S. President will be lucky. But it doesn't seem as though Jimmy Carter, with all his good intentions, has the least control over developments. This is a problem for a lot more people than the American electorate in this depressing year of 1980.

PARLIAMENT EXPRESSES SUPPORT FOR U.S. ON IRAN

LD141701 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1625 GMT 14 Apr 80

[Text] Britain is holding urgent talks with its European allies on a response to President Carter's plea for more help in action against Iran, the prime minister told the Commons today.

Mrs Thatcher said that the EEC foreign ministers were meeting next Monday and she hoped "the necessary decisions will be taken." She pledged Britain would give the U.S. "utmost support."

U.S. Ambassador Mr Kingman Brewster sitting in the Commons public gallery heard her add: "It is important that whatever we do should be effective and capable of commanding a broad measure of international support." Mrs Thatcher told MPs that the Americans had exercised "remarkable patience" and "time and again their reasonable hopes of progress have been dashed." She warned that prospects for the early release of hostages through diplomatic action "have markedly diminished".

In the Lords, Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington said that President Carter had not laid down any specific deadline on support from Europe over the Iran situation.

Mrs Thatcher recalling that the illegal detention of the American hostages in Tehran was now in its sixth month, said Britain had cooperated in financial and commercial fields with the United States from an early stage in the crisis. "No arms or defence equipment has been sent from this country to Iran since the hostage crisis arose in early November.

"In December we made a substantial reduction in the size of our embassy in Tehran," she said.

Mrs Thatcher added that the Americans had now asked Britain and its European allies to consider economic sanctions--vetoed by the Russians in the UN in January--and an eventual break in relations with Iran.

Opposition leader Mr Callaghan, who had asked for Mrs Thatcher's statement on Iran, called for solidarity between European countries and the United States in attempts to seek a solution. He urged that if the EEC foreign ministers could not reach a satisfactory agreement at their meeting next Monday, government heads could convene to thrash out an answer to secure the release of the hostages.

"If there is to be co-ordination of tactics, that demands the maximum of consultation between us all. That may mean that some will not be able to follow certain courses that others would like," he said.

Mr Callaghan said holding the hostages by the "militants in Tehran" was a "violation of international law, defiance of the order of the International Court of Justice, and ignores the resolution of the United Nations". He added: "There can be no acceptance of any situation short of the release of these men and women."

Mr Callaghan said that military action would not provide a solution. But he said it would give point to the "chilling comments" of West German Chancellor Schmidt when he said the situation was not dissimilar to the one which existed just before Sarajevo.

"No one wanted war then, but we drifted into it. If we are to avoid that, and we must, it is necessary that there should be maximum co-ordination," said Mr Callaghan.

He hoped today's statement and MPs' comments would show Americans that Britain "fully understands and comprehends the strain and frustration that they may feel, and will do our best to remove it."

Replying to Mr Callaghan, Mrs Thatcher said the government was anxious to get "maximum international support" for the President's new moves. She also denied that the U.S. had set any deadline for its European allies to support further sanctions. "We have not been set a date by which our American friends want us to act," said Mrs Thatcher. Any "guidelines" that had been mentioned had reference to events in Iran and gave "a reasonable period" for the new measures to take effect.

Mrs Thatcher added that the Americans "do not contemplate the use of force now". The new diplomatic and economic sanctions were "designed to avoid anything in that regard." "Any contemplation of that would be an extremely serious step indeed," she said.

EEC foreign ministers would be able to make a decision on support for the U.S. at their meeting next Monday and further consultations could take place at the European summit a week later.

Liberal leader Mr David Steel said it was "unfortunate" that President Carter had had to ask his European allies to intensify their efforts over Iran. Diplomatic relations could not be maintained without the principle of diplomatic immunity, he added. If that principle was broken then it was an "open invitation" to dictatorships of right or left to use diplomats as hostages.

Mrs Thatcher disagreed that EEC countries had been slow to react to the position in Iran. The U.S. had been pursuing other diplomatic moves with the Iranians and it was only when those failed that President Carter had "turned and asked his friends to consider further action," she said.

Former Tory Cabinet Minister Mr Geoffrey Rippon (Hexham) said that America's European allies had benefited from the strength of the U.S. over a long period of time, but they must now be prepared to "share the burdens as well as the benefits" of the alliance.

Mr Enoch Powell called on Mrs Thatcher to make it clear before the EEC foreign ministers meeting that collectively they "have no right or power whatsoever" to issue instructions to ambassadors and that these rights rested wholly with the national governments.

Mrs Thatcher agreed, but pointed out that the foreign ministers could agree at their meeting next week to issue instructions to their ambassadors individually. She rejected a call to return to the UN Security Council before imposing political or economic sanctions. International law was being "flouted" at the time of the last resolution, and Mrs Thatcher referred to the "surprise" of the Russian veto to concerted UN action.

"We thought that Russia was concerned to see that international law was observed in relation to her own diplomats and diplomats all over the world."

Mrs Thatcher said the government would consider the position of the 28 or 30 Iranians currently involved in military training in this country.

Mrs Thatcher undertook to take no further action without first seeking the approval of the Commons.

In the Lords Lord Carrington also denied that President Carter had set any deadlines for for America's allies to comply with his proposals. He told opposition spokesman Lord Goronwy-Roberts that he would consider his proposal of a high-level international meeting involving Western and other countries to discuss concerted action against the "Certainly it will be necessary for us in this country to consult with our eight partners in the Community before reaching any conclusion", Lord Carrington said.

"I am also quite sure we should consult with such countries as New Zealand, Australia and Japan which has enormous interest in that part of the world," he said.

"I think that the measures which are now proposed by the United States are of considerable gravity," he said, and praised President Carter and the Americans for their "patience, forebearance and firmness".

Labour's former War Minister Lord Shinwell said the Iran situation provided the West with an opportunity to demonstrate its unity. "Unless we do all we are capable of doing, talks of manufacture and deployment of destructive weapons is just nonsense and fantasy," he said. Lord Shinwell asked what would happen if the foreign ministers of the Common Market failed to reach agreement.

Lord Carrington said nobody would disagree with what Lord Shinwell had said about the unity of the West. "The position of the government is to seek agreement with our European partners on a response which will lead to the release of the hostages," he said.

THATCHER ON IRAN STAND; OPPOSITION STATEMENT ISSUED

LD159833 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 15 Apr 80 pp 1, 36

[James Wightman report: "Thatcher's Fear on Iran Curbs"]

[Text] The prime minister admitted in a television interview last night there was a risk that reprisal action by the West over the American hostages might push Iran "into the hands of the Russians."

It was one of the factors which had to be taken into account, she said, as Britain considered President Carter's request for European allies to put more pressure on Iran to secure the release of the hostages.

But the other factor which had to be taken into account was that the "patience of the American people is not inexhaustible."

Appearing in Granada's "Reports Politics," the prime minister also repeated the statement she made in the Commons a few hours earlier that, to be effective, action against Iran had to be concerted. "We have to do two things," said Mrs Thatcher--"do everything possible to secure the release of the American hostages and to show our support to our American allies and friends."

President Carter's request for more European support has struck a particular chord with Mrs Thatcher in that she has been seeking similar concerted action by Western allies in protest at the Russian invasion of Afghanistan.

Although there was confusion inside 10 Downing Street yesterday about exactly what Mr Carter meant when he talked about a deadline during his television interview on Sunday, there was no attempt by officials to substantiate reports that Mrs Thatcher was aggrieved that she was not being adequately consulted by the American President.

As the government considered whether economic sanctions could be applied against Iran, it was clear that memories of how sanctions against Rhodesia had been less than totally effective, were giving cause for caution.

Another factor uppermost in the minds of ministers was possibly lengthy time-lag before sanctions might begin to take effect.

In the government and the opposition there was a marked feeling that every precaution should be taken against the hostages issue deteriorating into military conflict.

If the government did decide on econommic sanctions, an enabling bill would have to be brought before the Commons.

Asked in the television interview whether she thought there would be a majority for such action, Mrs Thatcher replied: "I think there would be deep understanding of President Carter's problem because every person there would be thinking that the hostages might be our people.

"In these circumstances, President Carter is entitled to expect our support."

Memories of the way Rhodesia existed despite sanctions were also recalled by Mr Callaghan and members of the shadow Cabinet at a meeting last night.

A statement after the meeting said that Mr Shore, shadow foreign secretary, would wish to discuss with Lord Carrington, foreign secretary, the attitudes of the various countries involved, the possible range of economic actions which could be taken to promote the release of the hostages, and the government's estimate of their effectiveness."

The statement also said that Mrs Thatcher's statement in the Commons and the subsequent debate "provided reassurance for the United States that Britain was prepared to give the most effective help possible and at the same time stressed the need to avoid any form of military action. This should have removed some possible misunderstanding in the United States of the United Kingdom's position."

An emergency resolution for consideration by the International Committee of the Labour Party's National Executive today was tabled by four prominent left-wing MPs--Mr Anthony Wedgwood Benn, Mr Eric Heffer, Miss Jo Richardson, and Mr Norman Atkinson.

After deploring the "detention of the American diplomatic staff in Tehran," the resolution urged the United States Government "to seek a peaceful solution to this situation by negotiations, using the good offices of states which have expressed sympathy with the objects of the Iranian Revolution through the United Nations."

It said the Labour Party would "oppose the threat or use of military force by the American, British or other governments which could precipitate a conflict that might engulf the Middle East and the world."

The MPs also said that the National Executive should send a delegation to visit the Iranian ambassador in London to discuss "ways and means by which this situation could be resolved peacefully."

THATCHER ASKS ATHLETES TO RECONSIDER OLYMPICS DECISION

[James Wightman report: "Think Again British Team Urged"]

[Text] Mrs Thatcher said last night she hoped British athletes would reconsider their decision to attend the Moscow Olympic games in light of the vote to boycott the games by their American counterparts.

Speaking on Granada's "Reports Politics," the prime minister recalled that the British Olympics Committee had said that if matters changed, they would reconsider their decision. "I think matters have changed," she said. "I was very pleased with the decision of the American Olympic Committee.

"I know the difficult moments they went through because, naturally, they feel that the athletes have trained for this for a long time and what a pity it has to be Moscow, and they must have pondered a long time about it.

"But they felt that the defence of freedom was the overriding need at the moment they have decided. That is a lead which other nations cannot ignore and I hope that our own will reconsider their decision and perhaps, change it."

Mrs Thatcher also said she believed that in the coming weeks a number of others would like the Americans, say: "No, we will not go."

ROK FOREIGN MINISTER, UK'S CARRINGTON HOLD TALKS

SK120301 Seoul HAPTONG in English 0252 GMT 12 Apr 80

[Text] London, April 11, (HAPTONG)--South Korean Foreign Minister Pak Tong-chin had talks here today with British Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington and explained to him the progress of the political development following the assassination of President Pak Chong-hui and the on-going inter-Korean dialogue.

At the meeting which lasted for two hours, Foreign Minister Pak invited his British counterpart to visit Seoul and the British minister accepted the invitation. Minister Pak and Lord Carrington also discussed friendly and cooperative relations and trade between the two countries as well as Korean security problems.

After the talks, Lord Carrington gave a luncheon in honour of Minister Pak during which they took common stands on the importance of the South Korean security. Minister Pak expressed satisfaction on the result of their talks which he said were held in a friendly atmosphere. Lord Carrington showed a great interest in the growing stand of South Korea in the world community, saying that he was deeply impressed by the wisdom with which the Koreans have overcome the difficulties in the wake of the assassination of President Pak Chong-hui on Oct. 26, Minister Pak said.

BRITISH CP DISCUSSES STAND ON EUROPEAN COMMUNIST MEETING

LD141259 London MORNING STAR in English 14 Apr 80 pp 1, 3

[MORNING STAR headline: "'Change Plans for Talks'--British Communists"]

[Text] British Communists yesterday said that radical changes were needed in the proposed European communist peace meeting at the end of the month if their party was to take part.

A special meeting of the British Communist Party's Executive in London yesterday agreed on the text of a letter which is to go to the Polish and French parties--the two which have called a meeting of all communist workers' parties in Europe on the theme of peace and disarmament.

Some parties have already turned down the invitation, others have accepted--TASS yesterday reported that the Soviet Communist Party Central Committee had accepted, saying the conference was "an important political act in the present situation."

But the British Executive was not at all happy with the way the conference had been arranged--nor with its proposed declaration, draft copies of which were circulated a little over a fortnight ago by the two organisers.

In a unanimous vote, the Executive decided to ask for the conference to be changed to a private consultative discussion on communist peace work in Europe.

If this idea was not accepted, the Executive decided by 27 votes to six that the British party would not attend. The letter said:

"Given the character of the present international situation, the deterioration in the process of detente and the new arms drive, we are naturally in principle in favour of a meeting.

We are very much concerned with the dangerous moves now being made by the imperialist powers and the serious threat to peace and detente which these activities represent.

We are confident that each party, according to its own circumstances and resources, is actively engaged in mobilising the broadest possible movement in its own country for peace and detente, and against the arms drive and other menacing activities now being stepped up by the imperialists.

Our Executive Committee considered these matters fully at its meeting in January, when we discussed the problem of maintaining the impetus for peace and detente.

In this connection we considered that the military intervention of the Soviet Union in Afghanistan, with which we expressed our disagreement, raised important questions of political principle and had serious consequences for world peace.

In our view, at such a meeting of European communist and workers' parties as you propose, the relation of this question to the struggle for peace and detente in Europe would be a matter for discussion.

Yet, because of the way in which the meeting has been prepared and the speed with which the final steps have been taken, such a discussion, even though it proceeded in a comradely and fraternal fashion, could produce new and deeper divisions between the parties.

This would tend to militate against our common struggle for peace and detente.

This is one of the major reasons why we consider that a process of exploratory discussion is necessary, in order to secure maximum agreement on the content of the meeting as well as to ensure that when it takes place it is fully representative of all the communist and workers' parties in Europe.

Our party has always been in favour of the most careful, effective and democratic preparations for such multilateral gatherings of communist parties.

Experience has shown that detailed consultations at each stage, and the direct involvement of all parties in the various preparatory steps, covering the political purpose of the event, the agenda, timing, procedure and other aspects of the proposed gathering, helps to strengthen the unity of our movement and to ensure maximum attendance.

The whole point and purpose of such preliminary steps and consultations, both bilateral and multilateral, is that they provide the possibility of seeking out and discussing any differences that may exist concerning the nature of the gathering and related questions.

In this way it is possible to reach common positions and so assist the preparation and eventual holding of the event in conditions of maximum unity and agreement.

This was certainly the case, for example, with the world communist conference in Moscow in 1969 and with the last Conference of European Communist and Workers' Parties in Berlin, in June 1976.

In opening the Berlin conference, on June 29, 1976, Comrade Erich Honecker, general secretary of the Socialist Unity Party of Germany, pointed out: 'The preparations were carried out in an atmosphere of comradeship and have without doubt helped to advance mutual understanding, the formulation of common standpoints and joint efforts among the parties.'

These remarks have a very considerable bearing on the way in which the meeting in Paris proposed by your party has been prepared.

At no stage have there been any collective consultations concerning the nature of the proposed gathering, how it should be prepared, what would be its agenda, when and where the event should take place, what documents, if any, should be drafted and by whom, and other aspects of the preparations.

It seems to us that this method of preparation represents a complete departure from the democratic procedures which the international communist movement has followed in recent years.

It is, in our opinion, a dangerous step back which we cannot support.

This is particularly unfortunate in view of the nature of the proposed meeting, the problems currently facing the European communist and workers' parties, and the differences known to exist between them.

The fact that a number of parties have indicated that they will not participate in the proposed meeting, and that others have expressed reservations is, in itself, a reflection of the incorrect manner in which the meeting has been prepared.

This relates not only to the method of preparation but also to the substance and content of the meeting, with which the preparatory steps are linked.

After all, one of the purposes of the preparations should be to secure agreement on whether a meeting should take place, and, if so, on what basis and with what content and agenda.

It has been a major concern of our party over a number of years to do everything possible to strengthen the unity of the international communist movement which we regard as vital for the struggle for peace itself.

That is why we have constantly sought to overcome differences, and not to support any action that, in our view, would aggravate the situation.

Our concern in this regard was made clear by our former general secretary, John Gollan, when he addressed the World Conference of Communist and Workers' Parties at Moscow, in June 1969: 'Differences that are not easily reconciled must not be allowed to cause new and deeper differences, to harden positions and make solutions more difficult.'

When there are differences, and bilateral discussions between parties are not sufficient to resolve them, it is not, in our view, helpful for parties initiating a proposal to go ahead without making any attempt to secure a collective discussion of the problems.

Unless such a collective discussion takes place so that a serious effort can be made to reach understanding, then going ahead with the proposal and ignoring the objections or reservations of other parties can only exacerbate differences and make it more difficult to strengthen international communist unity.

Because of all these considerations, we have come to the conclusion that it would be unhelpful to proceed with the proposed meeting in Paris on the present basis.

We therefore propose to all parties concerned that the meeting in Paris on April 28/29 should be changed into a private consultative meeting to which all European communist and workers' parties should be invited.

This consultative gathering would have the sole purpose of discussing, on an entirely fresh basis, whether a conference or meeting should be held, and if such a gathering were agreed, what would be the character, procedure, venue, date, etc.

Such a consultative meeting on April 28/29 would not be expected to adopt any policy document.

We would, of course, attend such a consultative gathering.

But if our suggestion is rejected, and the meeting proposed by you takes place, we regret that we will be unable to participate, because it is our opinion that such a meeting prepared in the way it has been, is not the way to strengthen the unity of our movement nor to make our maximum contribution to the struggle for peace and detente.

British Communists will continue and will extend their activity for peace, detente and disarmament.

At present we are working along with other supporters of peace to build a broad movement to public opinion and pressure in Britain, embracing a wide variety of organisations, political parties and different trends and movements of opposition to the dangerous warmongering and arms build-up by the present Tory government.

Of particular significance in Britain now is the follow-up of yesterday's important conference on world disarmament in London.

Urgent, too, for the peace movement in Britain, is the mobilisation of wide support behind the various initiatives now being launched against the siting of cruise and Pershing II missiles in Britain.

In all of our activity for peace we will continue to act in unity with the communist and workers' parties of Europe and together with all peace-loving forces."

TA NEA REVEALS NEW WESTERN PLAN FOR CYPRUS PROBLEM

NC151055 Nicosia TA NEA in Greek 15 Apr 80 p 1

[Text] A plan to solve the Cyprus problem is being hatched within higher Western diplomatic levels. The originator of the plan--which is described as "new"--is the U.S. "State Department," and bears the "seal" of a Western European group headed by Britain and West Germany. Persistent reports say that the general framework of the plan has been prepared at the U.S. Pentagon in light of the general strategic rearrangements in the region.

At this point, the center of consultations and deliberations on the substance and content of the Western inspired plan for Cyprus is the backstage of the international organization.

The permanent contributor to TA NEA in New York reports that certain nonaligned countries, which play a leading role in the movement, have been sounded out about their attitude toward the Western initiative. Efforts are also being made to keep the "new" plan for solving the Cyprus problem within the UN framework and under the auspices of UN Secretary General Mr Waldheim.

The TA NEA contributor also reports that, according to certain verified reports which have leaked from Western UN diplomatic circles, the plan in its substance does not differ much from known Western positions which have been outlined in various formulas by Acheson and Lemnitzer, and from the latest American plan which was rejected by the Cyprus Government.

According to TA NEA contributor's information, UN Secretary General Mr Waldheim seems to be actively encouraging the Western initiative. He appears to support active involvement by Greece and Turkey and suggests that they exercise decisive influence on the two sides in Cyprus so that they accept the "new" Western formula as a binding basis for a final solution to the Cyprus problem.

The TA NEA contributor's information finally says that the Kliridhis-Cagatay meetings and the blatant attempt to abrogate the 19 May agreement are not irrelevant to the Western initiative but aim at the creation of an appropriate climate and prerequisites for facilitating the implementation of the Western plan.

Meanwhile, Turkish Cypriot leader Mr Denktas, in an interview with the chief editor of the Turkish newspaper ADALET, has reiterated that "it was decided a long time ago to strike out the word 'federated' from the 'Turkish Cypriot Federated State' because, even though it will occur slowly, those who intend to recognize the 'state' will recognize it."

Among other things, Denktas finally said: "It is not our objective to achieve immediate recognition by the United Nations. By developing our relations with Turkey and by concluding a treaty with it, we declare that the Turkish Army is, and continues to be, our protector."

CYPRIOT JOURNALISTS MEET IN TURKISH SECTOR OF NICOSIA

NC102101 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1900 GMT 10 Apr 80

[Text] The president of the Cyprus Editors Union, Mr Kannaouros, today visited the Turkish sector of Nicosia at the invitation of the president of the Turkish Cypriot Journalists Union, Mr (Akan) Cemal.

A statement on the meeting says that Mr Kannaouros and Mr Cemal had very friendly discussions on issues of mutual interest and stressed in particular the role of the press and the journalists in creating a climate of good will, understanding, trust and friendship among the Greeks and Turks of Cyprus. They also expressed their determination to work consistently to implement the joint declaration of the two organizations to 12 June 1979. For this reason, the statement adds, the contacts between the two organizations will continue.

TURKISH CYPRIOT ADMINISTRATION TO OPEN ALL OF FAMAGUSTA

NC131008 Nicosia O AGON in Greek 13 Apr 80 p 1

[Text] The Turkish Cypriot administration has decided to allow the movement of both Turkish Cypriots and mainland settlers through the whole of Famagusta City. At the same time, it has also leased and allowed the operation of all the places of entertainment along the waterfront area. According to our information, the lessees of the places of entertainment have applied to the Denktas administration for loans to equip these places so they can soon operate them.

The Turkish Cypriot administration's decision to allow freedom of movement in Famagusta is expected to be implemented very soon. At a first stage, movement will be allowed for a few days a week. It is not ruled out that, at a second stage, it will be allowed every day of the week. At the same time, the Turkish Cypriot administration is preparing to colonize many houses in the Strovilia locality. These houses, which until now were vacant, have been undergoing repairs for quite a few days.

TURKISH PAPER DISCUSSES NORTH CYPRIOT ECONOMY

NC091050 Istanbul GUNAYDIN in Turkish 7 Apr 80 p 3

[Report by Resat Akar from Nicosia]

[Excerpts] The Turkish Federated State of Cyprus [TFSC] is facing several serious problems today. In April, for example, 5,000 Italian tourists are expected to visit the north, but no one knows yet how they will come and which plane will carry them. Industrial institutions are in their last throes of death because they lack raw materials.

The Council of Ministers has exerted great efforts to introduce a "satisfactory regime" in foreign trade. It has tried to please Turkey and Turkish Cypriot businessmen as well as members of the party. But is has not pleased either side. What is important is the game that is being played behind the scenes. The successive governments during the past 5 years have tried to justify their decisions, which were taken against the will of the people, by saying: "What can we do? This is how the experts from Turkey want it. If we do not do it their way, aid to Cyprus may be suspended."

Now the same thing is once again being whispered in connection with the new foreign trade regime. Every aspect of it has been divulged. There is nothing secret about it any more. What really needs to be done is for the TFSC officials and the Turkish experts to meet in the presence of the press representatives and discuss the facts on the negotiating table. This will stop the endless whispers and efforts to avoid responsibility.

MINISTERS CONCLUDE ATHENS COOPERATION TALKS WITH IRAQ

AT150952 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1500 GMT 14 Apr 80

[Text] The talks which took place in Athens between the Greek Minister of Industry and Energy Evert and Iraqi Minister of Industry and Minerals at-Tawfiq have been concluded. The talks once again confirmed the existence of close cooperation between the two countries and mutual willingness for its further development. The basis has also been laid for cooperation between the two countries in new sectors.

Among other things, discussions were held on significantly increasing the quantities of oil which our country will receive from Iraq, on the construction of suitable installations for storing, refining and moving oil products, on establishing an alumina plant in Greece and an aluminum plant in Iraq, on establishing joint industrial units and on entrusting Greek shipbuilding industries with the building and repair of Iraqi ships. Furthermore, discussions were held on entrusting to the Greek aviation industry repair and maintenance work on Iraqi civil aviation planes. Finally, among other things, the establishment of a ferryboat line between Greece and Iraqi ports was discussed. Special committees will be formed to implement the plans that were discussed by the two ministers.

DEFENSE MINISTER CLAIMS WAR INDUSTRY READY TO EXPORT

AT121603 Athens Armed Forces Television Service in Greek 1500 GMT 12 Apr 80

[Text] The Greek arms industry, which during the past few years has rapidly expanded, has already begun exporting its products. This was announced, among other things, by National Defense Minister Averof during a special ceremony today for the decoration of the director of the arms industry, Air Force Lieutenant General Vaiakakos with the Supreme Order of the Phoenix. As stressed by Averof, during the past few years Greece started developing an arms industry worthy of its name, to the point where it has started to export.

I VRADHINI CRITICIZES PAPANDREOU'S STATEMENTS TO U.S. SENATORS

AT121514 Athens I VRADHINI in Greek 12 Apr 80 pp 1, 12

[Editorial: "Immovable on His Utopias"]

[Text] PASOK's well-known, immovable positions "which have as their goal the protection of our national independence, a goal possible only through an absolutely nonalined foreign policy," were explained by the chairman of PASOK to the group of U.S. Senators who visited him at Kastri, it was announced. Those who listened to him, crossed themselves!

Naturally this was not only because of the well-known positions but rather because of his "immovable" positions. It appears that the invitation (by Papandreou) for two of his deputies and two "ayatollahs" of PASOK's Executive Bureau to attend the meeting was specifically aimed at guaranteeing indisputable party testimony (but for whose benefit?) based on the fact that the chairman of PASOK truly did not move from these positions.

Naturally we did not cast suspicion on the fact that there was some probable intent to move from these positions. Instead, such suspicions should be sought in the extremist, Marxist wing of Papandreou's movement. [paragraph continues]

PASOK's party "mullahs" most certainly have their own reasons for being suspicious. They have not forgotten the Ovidian metamorphoses of their chairman: From an originally enthusiastic supporter of the European Community and Greece's accession to it, he changed into its severest critic and recently put some water in his wine when he discovered that more than 1/3 of PASOK's followers favor the community and Greek accession; from a former supporter of NATO he has become its uncontrollable opponent; from an unreserved accuser of the German Social Democrats 4 or 5 years ago he became the supporter of its progressive character and its contribution to detente and peace today.

A leading personality of the Movement explained to us last Sunday that all this does not mean a change of goals or aspirations, a change of course or a movement from immovable positions, but it means an adjustment of tactics toward an ever changing reality....

However, this ever changing reality should have led the chairman of PASOK to a new revision of his positions in the sector of foreign relations as well. It should have moved him away from utopias in support of nonalined positions. This, in a final analysis, would not have been the first time that Papandreou has moved from the "immovable" by making the tactics more realistic for the movement which he leads (if you prefer the terminology used by his followers.)

One must have lost absolutely all touch with international reality to repeat flim-flams about a nonalined policy in the Year of our Lord 1980, after the Soviet invasion of nonalined Afghanistan; after the Vietnamese invasion of nonalined Kampuchea; after all that happened in nonalined Ethiopia; after what is now happening in nonalined Lebanon; after the serious concerns of nonalined Yugoslavia; after the threats of a clash between nonalined Iran and Iraq. (It is true that in this instance the chairman of PASOK did not explain to us whether he supports the "expansionist, imperialist, fascist" friends of Iran's Ayatollah--as Na'm Haddad described them--or whether he supports the "corrupt"--according to Khomeyni and Qotbzadeh-Ba'th regime of Iraq, to which he is also devoted.)

At a time when threatening clouds are gathering on the international horizon and when the countries which have so far been truly nonalined (and not in name only) are frantically seeking the protection and guarantees of one of the superpowers, the chairman of PASOK considers it expedient to declare a change in the basic orientations of Greek foreign policy toward nonalinement. At a time when, unfortunately, the nonalined countries are losing their national independence one after the other, the chairman of PASOK considers it best to declare that strengthening our national independence is possible only through an absolutely nonalined foreign policy.

PASOK's statement regarding the meeting with the U.S. senators, however, also stressed the Turkish invasion on nonalined Cyprus and the Turkish provocations against Greece. Yet why does the chairman of PASOK "immovably" insist on his utopias about a nonalined foreign policy after all this? Has he not realized that if we ever change our orientation we would be strengthening Turkey's position at the expense of our own national interests (because then Turkey would have guaranteed absolute and total Western support) even though Karamanlis has repeatedly stressed this fact in the Chamber of Deputies--without anyone daring to question his statement.

Under such conditions this immovable insistence on this flim-flam about a nonalined policy only proves a voluntary blindness which, unfortunately, is not accidental and is very dangerous to the preservation of independence and the defense of this country's interests.

IRANIAN AIRCRAFT VIOLATE AIRSPACE, SHELL BORDER AREA

TA141625 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1620 GMT 14 Apr 80

[Text] Van, 14 Apr (AA)--The governor of Van has requested a border interview with Iranian authorities following the violation of the border Sunday by two jets and three helicopters in two separate incidents. The jets flew into Turkey only 2800 meters before turning back, but the helicopters shelled a spot near the customs and railway building at the Kapikoy border checkpoint, only 20 meters from the gendarmerie border patrol station. The governor said he wanted to discuss the local border violation with Iranian officials. Informed sources said the violations were probably a mistake by Iranian Government forces chasing ethnic groups holding villages near the border.

HURRIYET Report

[Text] Ankara, April 15 (AFP)--Air raids by Iranian jets have killed more than 200 Kurds and bombs fell by mistake near several villages over the border in Turkey, the Turkish newspaper HURRIYET reported today. It said Turkish aircraft responded with low-level warning flights along the border. Most of the Kurdish casualties were women and children in five Iranian villages, HURRIYET specified. No casualties occurred in Turkey. Kurdish warriors at Rezaiyeh [Urumiyeh] in northern Iran have seized the railroad station, shot down 2 helicopters and killed about 20 Iranian soldiers, reported HURRIYET's correspondent at Khvoy, Iran.

VOTCP ANNOUNCES TCP TO ATTEND PARIS CP MEETING, SCORES U.S.

TA150956 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 15 Apr 80

[Unattributed commentary]

[Excerpts] Dear listerners, Turkish Communist Party [TCP] publications carried an important announcement over the weekend. The announcement reported that the TCP Central Committee Political Bureau has accepted the appeal by the French Communist Party and the Portuguese United Workers Party [title as heard] to attend the meeting of European communist and labor party representatives in Paris on 28 and 29 April. The TCP notes that the Paris meeting on peace, detente and disarmament is vitally important.

The vital importance of the Paris meeting is due to the great threat against peace and security. NATO's decision to deploy nuclear warheads in Europe and, in particular, U.S. moves toward military escalation in our region make the threat even more concrete. Washington is openly engaged in war preparations against Iran. The Carter administration, which wants its NATO allies to support its adventurist policy of blackmail, is increasing its pressure through ultimatums.

The U.S. pressures on Turkey are becoming very coarse and embarassing. The rightist paper HURRIYET reported on 10 April that the United States, which is preparing for war in our region, has made critical decisions regarding Turkey and that our country, against its will, is included in the plans for an attack on Iran.

Foreign Ministry officials, on the other hand, are issuing deceptive statements on this subject. The statements by certain officials that Turkey will continue its friendly relations with Iran are merely intended to conceal from our people the Pentagon's dangerous plans to drag Turkey into the Iran adventure. However, no one is deceived by these statements. HURRIYET further reports that important meetings are being held at the Pentagon.

During these meetings it was noted that, in case of U.S. military intervention in Iran, the most suitable bases for the operation of reconnaissance and bomber planes and the parachuting of Marines are located in Turkey. The United States, which is 13,000 km away from our country, is planning Turkey's action in Middle East affairs. The United States is openly telling Turkey that the latter is a tool of the United States. Who grants this authority to the United States? It is the bilateral slavery agreement signed in Ankara on 29 March. As stressed in the 31 March TCP Central Committee statement, this agreement fully reflects the hegemonic interests of U.S. imperialism in our region and in Turkey. Besides giving the United States the opportunity to drag our country into the Middle East adventure, this agreement gives that country the right to interfere in Turkey's internal affairs whenever its position is threatened.

The TCP and communists firmly opposed to this slavery agreement, which disregards our country's national independence and which constitutes a great threat to regional and world peace and security, are waging an active struggle for peace and security, for insurance that the bases on our soil will be dismantled for the annullment of the slavery agreements.

GRAND NATIONAL ASSEMBLY AGAIN FAILS TO ELECT PRESIDENT

TA141620 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 14 Apr 80

[Text] Today's three rounds of voting held to elect a president at the joint session of the Senate and the National Assembly failed to yield any results. Justice Party Deputy from Istanbul Sadettin Bilgic was the only candidate in the 32d, 33d, and 34th rounds of voting held at the Grand National Assembly today.

Of the 525 members who participated in the 32d round of voting, 185 cast their votes in favor of Bilgic, 128 votes were received by RPP Senator from the Presidential Quota Group Muhsin Batur--who was not a candidate--56 votes were distributed among various members, 141 ballots were blank and 15 votes were declared void.

Of the 318 members who participated in the 33d round, 80 cast their votes in favor of Bilgic and 98 in favor of Batur. Twenty-six votes were distributed among various members, 107 ballots were blank and 7 votes were declared void.

The votes cast in the 34th round were not counted since there was no quorum.

The Senate and the National Assembly will meet jointly again at 1500 tomorrow to continue the presidential election.

Meanwhile, the RPP Senate and National Assembly groups met together this morning. The method to be implemented in the presidential elections was discussed at the meeting, which continued in the afternoon as well.

Meanwhile, RPP Senator from Kars Sirri Atalay and the senator from Adana Kemal Sari Ibrahimoglu have withdrawn their applications as presidential candidates.

DENKTAS, PAPAIOANNOU ADDRESS EUROPEAN ISLAMIC COUNCIL

Denktas Remarks

TA122001 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1930 GMT 12 Apr 80

[Text] President Rauf Denktas delivered a speech at the European Islamic Council meeting in London today and referred to the Cyprus issue as well. Pointing out that the need for unity among Islamic countries is great, Denktas said that through their unity the Islamic countries will be able to attain the necessary morale and strength to direct international developments.

Also calling on Islamic countries' delegates at international conferences to decide not to unite or vote against other Islamic countries or organizations which are struggling for their freedom, Denktas said that the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus has been successfully established and that it awaits assistance in every field from brother countries.

Denktas noted that the Turkish Cypriots do not desire to dominate the Greek Cypriots, who prefer to destroy a state based on partnership through the use of force and annex the island to Greece, and they do not accept that the Greek Cypriots have a right to dominate them. Denktas said: The Greek Cypriots have never in history possessed this right.

Papaioannou Speech

NC151100 Nicosia I SIMERINI in Greek 15 Apr 80 p 1

[Text] London, 14 Apr--Speaking at a gathering of AKEL cadres in England on 13 April, AKEL Secretary General Mr Papaioannou maintained: "We in AKEL would have very much liked for Cyprus to have signed an agreement with the Soviet Union as was done between Afghanistan and the Soviet Union."

At the beginning of his address Mr Papaioannou launched a most violent attack against the Democratic Rally (DISI) and party Chairman Mr Klerides, accusing him of promoting the interests of the West. Mr Papaioannou then tried to link the latest DISI youth congress with the bomb explosion at Kolossi to imply that "something is brewing."

The AKEL secretary general also said that his party will ask the abrogation of the Zurich and London agreements. At the same time, he strongly attacked the government which, he said, is mocking the people with the purge issue.

Mr Papaioannou then called for communal and municipal elections and implied that at the parliamentary elections in 1981 AKEL will most probably stand alone without cooperating with any party.

Answering a question from the audience, the AKEL secretary general claimed that, although his party is the largest, it does not, however, have an absolute majority. Asked why AKEL did not participate in the 1955 struggle, Mr Papaioannou claimed that the party's help and participation had not been requested.

Finally, on the cooperative movement issue Mr Papaioannou said that two dangers threaten it: poor management and big capital.

UK MEMBERS OF EUROPEAN PARLIAMENT URGE SOLIDARITY WITH U.S.

LD142020 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1952 GMT 14 Apr 80

[By Geoffrey Meade and Andy Webb, PRESS ASSOCIATION staff reporters]

[Text] Britain's Euro-Tories tonight called on EEC ministers to declare their solidarity with America over the Iranian hostage crisis.

The ministers meet next week to take the crucial decision on President Carter's request for sanctions. The Tory group is urging them to take joint action to help force the release of the captives.

Their resolution for debate by the European Parliament meeting in Strasbourg falls short of endorsing the President's sanctions call but emphasizes the need for a common policy from the Nine.

The Euro-Tory motion, tabled by their leader Mr Jim Scott-Hopkins and Adam Fergusson (Strathclyde West), is geared towards achieving at least a united voice, if not precisely the voice the President wants to hear. It condemns the Iranian authorities and repeats calls made in the European Parliament earlier this year for the immediate release of the hostages.

Tomorrow (Tuesday), the Parliament will vote on whether to accept the resolution for emergency debate. If, as expected, it is approved, the matter will be debated on Wednesday. Whether the Parliament as a whole supports the Tories will finally be known when voting takes place on Friday.

The European labour group has yet to decide what stand it will take, but its line is likely to be more cautious than both the Tory approach and the views of the party leaders in Britain.

Euro-socialists are critical of the unilateral action taken by President Carter and are concerned that Europe could get drawn into escalating sanctions culminating in military action, while members emphasise that action need only be taken on a state-by-state basis rather than a concerted EEC response.

DIE PRESSE: U.S. NOTE ON BOYCOTT CREATES 'ILL FEELING'

[Special DIE PRESSE report: "Ill Feeling Between Vienna and Washington; Austria Does Not Go In for Boycotts; Cold Shoulder Toward Carter's Wishes"]

[Excerpt] Vienna (T.C.)--A few weeks before the 25th anniversary of the Austrian State Treaty ill feeling between the United States and Austria has developed. In an aide-memoire the United States has bluntly demanded from Austria that it participate in the economic boycott of Iran. Austria will reject this demand for reasons inherent in its policy of neutrality.

The most profound indication so far of the cooling of U.S.-Austrian relations was the U.S. note that the new ambassador, Kaiser, submitted shortly before Chancellor Kreisky's departure to Yugoslavia. The United States had already made representations earlier to induce Austria to join the boycott of the Olympic games. According to a Foreign Ministry source, the tone of the representations was unusual both times, especially in the case of the latest aide-memoire: "They are really taking a lot of liberties." Thus they used the term "request" [last word in English, followed by translation "forderung" which, more closely translated, means "demand"] in connection with the economic boycott against Iran.

Identical notes have been submitted to all "allied and friendly nations," but Austria--obviously because of the chancellor's trip--received the aide-memoire even before the other neutral countries. It is intended to wait for their reply before officially announcing what has already been decided: In consideration of its neutral status, Austria will not participate in any boycott measures. However, it will be conceded to the United States that the present trade volume with Iran, which has already substantially declined, will not be expanded. On the other hand, the United States has remonstrated with Austria asserting that substantial Iranian capital transfers have been made to Austria.

It is known that Chancellor Kreisky does not go in for economic boycott measures: No one stands to gain anything by it, nor would it be of any help to the Tehran hostages. As far as potential political sanctions are concerned, no such measures have been requested from Austria: A recall of ambassadors or termination of diplomatic relations with Iran has been urged by the United States only from its NATO partners.

According to informed quarters, it is also virtually certain that Austria will participate in the Olympic summer games in Moscow. The government will not give any recommendation whatsoever, and it is to be expected that the Austrian Olympic Committee will come out in favor of participation. Thus the Austrian athletes, but not any government representatives, will go to Moscow. The planned performances of the Vienna Burgtheater in the Soviet capital--Austria's national theater is to perform Gorki's "Summer Guests" and Goethe's "Iphigenie auf Tauris" in Moscow--will in all probability take place as scheduled.

The program of the State Treaty anniversary celebrations has been altered, however: Since Soviet Foreign Minister Gromyko can come to Austria only on Friday, 16 May (before that he will attend the 25th anniversary of the Warsaw Pact), the ceremony at Belvedere Palace will be postponed by 1 day. It will take place on Friday morning.

The participation of all four foreign ministers of the signatory states is already certain. In addition, Austria has also invited the foreign ministers or other government representatives of all neighboring states. [paragraph continues]

Thus it is quite certain that on 16 May there will be talk, between Gromyko, Vance, Carrington and Francois-Poncet and, in addition, there will be a separate talk between Vance and Gromyko. As has been learned from diplomatic circles, it is particularly the American side that takes a strong interest in this first meeting with the Soviet foreign minister after the invasion of Afghanistan.

NUSSBAUMER TO HAVE ECONOMIC COOPERATION TALKS IN MOSCOW

AU151310 Vienna VOLKSTIMME in German 15 Apr 80 p 4

[Unattributed report: "Negotiations With the USSR on Long-Term Cooperation Projects"]

[Text] Vienna--Adolf Nussbaumer, secretary of state for the Chancellory, will leave this weekend for a 4-day visit to Moscow during which primarily long-term economic cooperation projects, especially in the energy sector, are to be discussed. He was invited by the Soviet State Committee for Foreign Economic Relations.

In addition, the secretary of state will also have talks at the State Committee for Science and Technology as well as at the Foreign Trade Ministry. As Secretary of State Nussbaumer declared in this context, this visit is of special significance because long-term cooperation projects must be taken into consideration in the new 5-year plan of the USSR for the period 1981-85, which is currently being worked out. The topics to be discussed include possibilities for intensified long-term energy deliveries to Austria--to be paid for partly by industrial equipment--cooperation in the production of heavy-truck engines, in the production of building materials and in the exploitation of raw material deposits in the USSR. Questions connected with cooperation projects in third countries are also expected to be discussed.

The talks at the State Committee for Science and Technology are expected to deal with topical questions connected with already existing contacts with the Austrian Ministry for Science. The contacts at the Soviet Foreign Trade Ministry are to serve additional preparations for the session of the grand joint commission slated for 20 May.

COOPERATION PROJECTS DISCUSSED WITH YUGOSLAVIA

AU111310 Vienna ARBEITER-ZEITUNG in German 11 Apr 80 p 5

[Summary] The economic talks held by the Austrian Government delegation in Yugoslavia from 8-10 April centered on numerous cooperation projects. Thus a 1.5-billion schilling cooperation project for joint tractor production is underway between the Austrian Steyr-Daimler-Puch Corporation and the Yugoslav Podeba Company, and a joint truck production is envisaged. At present, there are 40 bilateral cooperation projects between Austrian and Yugoslav enterprises, covering a wide range of products from tires to dairy equipment and burglar alarm systems. Several major projects are still in the neogiating stage including a ferrosilicone plant, a cutlery factory, an aluminum rolling mill and foil plant, a coal-drying plant, garbage incineration plants, as well as the delivery of heavy trucks by Steyr-Daimler-Puch and of low-railcars by the Simmering-Graz-Pauker Rolling Stock Corporation.

Joint projects in their countries include a lubricants factory in Algeria to be supplied by the Voest-Andritz works and some companies from Zagreb, a steel plant for the GDR (also Voest and Zagreb firms), a pump and transformer station project for Egypt (AEG Austria) and a cellulose and paper factory for Cameroon (Voest). Projects still under negotiation include a 3-billion schilling coal mining project in China and a 500 million schilling hydropower project in Iraq.

TIES TO IRAN DEPENDENT ON 'DUTCH INTERESTS,' EC ACTION

Foreign Ministry Spokesman

ID161025 Rotterdam NRC HANDELSBLAD in Dutch 10 Apr 80 p 1

["Own Correspondent" report: "Netherlands Still Uncertain"]

[Text] The Hague, 10 April--The Netherlands will not withdraw its ambassador from Tehran "as long as there are still Dutch interests to protect in Iran and if similar steps are not taken by other countries," according to a Foreign Ministry spokesman.

The policy which lies behind this statement is, moreover, unclear. According to the spokesman, the "Dutch interests" in Iran relate to the presence of 85 Dutch nationals in that country and Dutch-Iranian trade, including Iranian oil exports to the Netherlands.

However, the spokesman was not prepared to discuss the question of whether this means that diplomatic relations will not be broken off as long as the Netherlands imports oil from Iran. He also left us in the dark as to whether the Netherlands would break off relations with Iran if a number of countries do so, but France and/or the FRG do not seem to have any intention of doing so.

Van Agt Press Conference

["Political Correspondent" report: "Van Agt Will Not Let the United States Struggle on Alone"]

[Text] The Hague, 12 April--"It is disloyal to leave the United States to struggle on alone," Prime Minister Van Agt said when talking about the Iranian question at his weekly press conference yesterday. Van Agt said that if the European Community were to take no action in connection with Carter's attempt to boycott Iran, the Netherlands would be faced with a difficult dilemma. In any case the Netherlands will continue to play an active role within the EC since, according to the prime minister, there is no question of leaving the United States in the cold at this stage.

There is a possibility that the Netherlands will break off diplomatic relations with Iran if attempts by the EC to settle the question of the American hostages in Tehran are unsuccessful. "I cannot say what sanctions the Netherlands will take if the attempts are unsuccessful but no step has been ruled out, not even breaking off diplomatic relations."

As regards President Carter's call for an economic boycott of Iran, Van Agt said that the Netherlands can do little in that sphere. Dutch exports to Iran consist mainly of agricultural products which are excluded from the U.S. attempt. Van Agt said that the Dutch Government has already tried to persuade the banks to support the U.S. action against Iran.

If Iran decides to halt oil exports to the Netherlands, or if the Netherlands should break off relations, our country would not directly suffer serious problems. Iran supplies only 10 percent of our oil needs and, according to Van Agt, our country can manage without Iranian oil.

GOVERNMENT REPORTEDLY DECIDES AGAINST OLYMPIC PARTICIPATION

WA152015 London REUTER in English 2013 GMT 15 Apr 80

[Text] Ottawa, April 15, REUTER--Canada will join the American-led boycott of the Moscow Olympic games in protest of the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan, Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau said today. He said he has informed President Carter by letter of the Canadian position.

Asked in Parliament about Canada's stand on the Olympic boycott, Mr Trudeau said that "... in this matter, I have indicated in a recent letter to President Carter that we would support him in the measures he announced and we would join him in those measures."

Olympic Policy Clarified

WA152124Z London REUTER in English 2105 GMT 15 Apr 80

[Text] Ottawa, 15 April, REUTER--The Canadian Government has not yet decided whether to boycott the Moscow Olympics, a spokesman for Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau said today.

He was clarifying a statement by Mr Trudeau, who appeared to have said that Canada would support the American-led boycott, and that he had told President Carter so in a recent letter.

In fact, Mr Trudeau was referring to a letter he sent Mr Carter supporting his policy on Iran, spokesman Patrick Gossage said. "The Cabinet has not finally decided on Canada's approach to the Olympics," he said.

Mr Trudeau was asked in Parliament to declare Canada's support for the boycott. He repeated Canada's support for the January 14 United Nations vote by 104 countries condemning the Soviet action in Afghanistan.

"Our policy in the Olympics and other matters has not only been to take a stand of our own, and in this matter I have indicated in a recent letter to President Carter that we would support him in the measures he announced and we would join him in those measures. But it is important for us to bring other countries along so we maintain this front of 104 nations or as many as possible to continue in the condemnation of the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan."

The Canadian Olympic Association has said it plans to accept the Soviet invitation to the games and to send a Canadian team. But its officials have said they would reconsider their stand later this month after the government has made its own known.

U.S. Secretary of State Cyrus Vance is due to hold talks here on April 23 on the boycott and other issues.

CABINET MEETS TO DISCUSS SANCTIONS, OLYMPIC BOYCOTT

IE160749 Hamburg DPA in German 0719 GMT 16 Apr 80

[Text] Bonn: The Federal Cabinet, presided over by Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, met in Bonn today to discuss the question of possible economic sanctions against Iran and a boycott of the Moscow Olympic games.

It is thought certain, even before the official Cabinet decision, that the Federal Government will recommend that the German National Olympic Committee follow the U.S. example and not attend the Moscow games. After the Cabinet session, the Federal chancellor will receive a delegation of the National Olympic Committee headed by its chairman, Willi Daume.

In its debate on Iran, the Federal Government wants to establish its policy for the EC foreign ministers' conference which is to be held in Luxemburg on the 21 April. This conference is expected to result in a decision as to what measures West Europe will take in support of the Americans in their efforts to secure the release of the hostages held in Tehran.

DIE WELT SAYS SCHMIDT TO MEET BREZHNEV 'THIS SUMMER'

ID151854 Hamburg DPA in German 1754 GMT 15 Apr 80

[Text] Bonn--According to DIE WELT, the long-planned meeting between Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and Soviet State and Party Chief Leonid Brezhnev is to take place this summer, that is, before the Bundestag elections [on 5 October]. The paper reports in its Wednesday edition that it has learned this from reliable Warsaw Pact sources.

The paper cites information that a policy decision has been taken in Moscow that in the current international crisis the Soviet Government does not wish to have any breaks in talks with the West.

CDU Deputy Ottfried Hennig, in his party press service today, referred to hints from "knowledgeable" East bloc participants at the spring meeting of the interparliamentary Union in Oslo that Schmidt will meet SED Chief Erich Honecker "very soon" and go to Moscow before the Bundestag elections.

Government circles stated tonight: "there is nothing to it."

GENSCHER STRESSES NEED FOR CONCERTED WESTERN ACTION

ID151900 Hamburg DPA in German 1735 GMT 15 Apr 80

[Text] Bonn--Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher has reemphasized the need for the Western alliance to agree on concerted action in view of the extent to which theSoviet Union is prepared to take risks. The more united and able to act the alliance is after arriving at a consensus, the less danger there is of an increased Soviet readiness to take risks, he said in an interview with SAARBRUECKER ZEITUNG (Wednesday edition). He added that he is convinced that Moscow is as reluctant "as we are to jeopardize peace."

To overcome the international situation, which he described as "extremely serious," he said it is important "that we as Germans, through the clarity and prudence of our policy and its predictability for Europe, make an important contribution as a partner in the Western alliance."

[Excerpts] Hamburg--Hans-Dietrich Genscher stressed to the FDP parliamentary group the Federal Government's determination to continue the policy of safeguarding peace with levelheadedness and clarity. The predictability of German policy is an important element in European security. The Federal Republic will fulfill completely the obligations it has assumed in the Western defense alliance. Only a joint Western policy can convince the Soviet Union that an expansionist policy, such as that in Afghanistan, does not serve its own long-term interests. Genscher said that in particular because he believes that the Soviet Union also does not want to jeopardize world peace, it must be restrained by Western cohesion from a policy of increased readiness to take risks.

LAMBSDORFF ON SUPPORTING U.S. BOYCOTT, OIL SUPPLIES

DW160946 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0519 GMT 15 Apr 80

[Reporter Krawitz interview with Federal Minister of Economics Otto Graf Lambsdorff; date, place not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] On 21 April the foreign ministers of the European Community will get together. What boycott measures will be decided on against Iran?

[Answer] Well, at the moment nothing detailed can be said about that. But the session on the General Council of the European Community--by the way, it is not a special session that has been called, but a routine session of the foreign ministers--will discuss the problem of whether the Nine will be able to decide to act jointly. We believe that article 113 of the European Community provides a basis for measures by the Community which would then have to be executed by the Commission. So a legal basis exists not merely nationally--as is the case, for example, with regard to the foreign trade bill: Other countries have different stipulations. Some of them point out that they do not have such legal possibilities--but also with a view to the law of the European Community. This gives a basis for action a long the lines of economic sanctions.

[Question] What will happen, however, if individual European Community partners are not prepared to support sanctions?

[Answer] I hope that will remain a very theoretical question because we naturally assume that such measures--whose effectiveness one can discuss in general--will be effective only if they are jointly supported; in other words, if no one torpedos the measures of the others. This is naturally the main request and the main demand of the United States which wants to see united action by the allies.

But--I do not want to evade your question--if it actually turns out that no agreement can be found in the European Community, then as I have just pointed out that, for example, through its foreign trade law the FRG has the opportunity to make such decisions on a national basis. So we can do that on our own, and some others can also.

I certainly do not assume that all eight, except us, will say in the European Community: No, we will not do anything. But seen theoretically, we could also do it alone. I believe that in the meantime the situation has gathered such political weight that we would have to consider the matter very seriously.

[Question] It means that basically one would be prepared to follow completely the Americans sanctions--these four points?

[Answer] One must look at that individually. At the moment I do not want to be tied down with regard to the contents of these measures. In our country that would naturally call for a Cabinet decision and for a decision by the European Community's Council of Ministers in Brussels. But the important matter is probably the fact that we believe that the point has been reached on the part of the Americans which indicates to us that it is urgently necessary to demonstrate our solidarity here, not merely with statements but also with action. This is particularly so since we must fear and assume--and we ought to have understanding for it because the taking of hostages is in violation of international law--we must fear that otherwise the Americans will take further steps. After economic sanctions only military intervention really remains.

I think we all agree that this ought to be avoided insofar as possible. Then one has to pick the lesser evil and probably take part in the lesser evil. In other words: I think we must, as I said, think about it very seriously and finally decide to support the United States in the way it desires.

[Question] You just said that one could discuss the effectiveness of such boycott measures. Let us do it. According to some reports, differences of opinion have come up in last Sunday's coalition discussions between the SPD and the FDP about how to act. Are you really convinced that a boycott will be an effective measure? Isn't it possible for the boycott to be torpedoed by third countries?

[Answer] First: In Sunday's coalition discussion no contradictory measures came up on this problem. Very wide-ranging reports have been published in connection with this coalition discussion, on everything we discussed during the 2 hours. We would have to be supermen to do that. But let us leave that aside.

Boycott measures generally have a question mark to them with regard to achieving their direct aim. In this case by the United States' application of these measures means economic sanctions to achieve the liberation of hostages. Even in the United States doubts exist as to whether a direct connection can be established in this matter. We share these doubts.

In the history of economics and in the history of trade relations such measures have not helped to achieve immediate aims. The basic doubts, objections and reserve shown so far by the Federal Government and also other partners are based on that, not to mention the question you have touched on, namely that it would naturally be very harmful if such measures were taken in an incomplete way so that they could be torpedoed by other partners. This is why we try to achieve joint coordination.

But, as I have already said, a point has now been reached where our alliance relationship with the Americans has to stand in the foreground and where there can no longer be so much discussion about whether these measures would guarantee the achievement of this or that aim, 100 percent. The question is: What effects would a no, a refusal have on the American stance vis-a-vis the allies in Europe? The FRG is in a very special situation--as the American President correctly said in his Sunday television interview.

We are located directly at the interface between the East and the West. There is no need for me to mention Berlin at all. To a very high degree we are dependent on the Americans' loyalty to the alliance. It is understandable that this consideration--I believe it is not just understandable, but we are almost committed to do it--that we put this aspect right in the foreground of our considerations, letting it come before considerations about usefulness, advisability and chances for success.

[Question] We are in a special situation also with regard to the fact that we import quite a bit of oil from Iran, that we depend on it. There are also reports that Libya and Algeria have stopped oil and natural gas supplies to the United States and that they are threatening to do the same with Europe. It means that in case of sanctions the oil supply will be stopped. Is that the price we will have to pay for solidarity with the Americans?

[Answer] Reports from Libya and Algeria are very unclear so far. It has been said in part that these are announcements vis-a-vis the United States. It is also to be extended to some Europeans. But this has nothing to do with Iran. It is connected with the Middle East problem, that is, with the Israel problem. No clear picture can be discerned yet.

The oil minister of the United Arab Emirates who was in Bonn yesterday, with whom I had a long talk and with whom I also went to the federal chancellor, has clearly stated on German television that the United Arab Emirates will not use oil as a political weapon and certainly not against the Europeans. He has let us know that this is also Saudi Arabia's opinion, as far as he knows. It would be obvious, by the way, because the United Arab Emirates and Saudi Arabia have always pursued a similar and parallel oil policy. So one must view such announcement with some reservation and wait to see how matters will develop.

For the time being, our oil supply position is certainly not alarming. It has never been contested, however, that long-term and medium-term problems always exist and political events can create considerable difficulties for us with regard to oil supply. We all know that. We will have to live with this uncertainty, this insecurity and this danger.

Oil Supply Talks Viewed

DW151122 Mainz ZDF Television Network in German 1700 GMT 14 Apr 80

[Reporter Strobel interview with Minister of Economics Otto Graf Lambsdorff on the visit to the FRG by Mani' ibn Sa'id al-'Utaybah, United Arab Emirates minister for petroleum and natural resources; date, place not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] What significance should be attributed to the visit in view of the Tehran threat to possibly supply no oil at all?

[Answer] Well, we have cooperated quite well with the Emirates in the past insofar as we have regularly received oil from them, although the quantities were not too great. We have counted so much on the Emirates because they have always contributed to the moderate and sensible oil production and oil price policy in past years. Minister al-'Utaybah told me quite clearly and unambiguously here that this stance will prevail.

[Question] Can it be assumed that they might possibly replace the loss of oil we will have to expect?

[Answer] If something like that should happen, it will certainly not be fully replaced by one country. Possible oil replacement will not be localized to one country. It is very important, however, that such a basic approach will contribute to a balance; that is incontestable.

[Question] Threats have come from Algiers and Tripoli. What influence did they exert on this discussion?

[Answer] We did not discuss that threat today in detail, but we were once again given a clear statement by the United Arab Emirates petroleum minister that they do not want to use oil as a political weapon against Europe, and that they will object to it in OPEC. That certainly does not merely apply to the Emirates; it also applies to Kuwait, Saudi Arabia and hopefully also to Iraq. Minister al-'Utaybah mentioned again that Venezuela also finds itself in this company.

[Question] How do you assess our medium-term supply situation in the oil sector?

[Answer] As before, it is good--uncontested. Our supplies will last for about 120 days. In other words, I could also say that we are excellently supplied.

LAMBSDORFF: SANCTIONS AGAINST USSR SHOULD BE 'LIMITED'

LD160900 Hamburg DPA in German 0833 GMT 16 Apr 80

[Excerpts] Hanover--The Federal Government is opposed to imposing general export restrictions in the civilian industry sector in trade with the East. At the opening of the Hanover Fair today, Federal Economics Minister Otto Graf Lambsdorff (FDP) stated that trade sanctions against the Soviet Union for its invasion of Afghanistan should be limited to the military-strategic sphere.

According to Lambsdorff, agreement existed with Washington that, in the case of an "economic response," not all Eastern bloc states should be measured with the same yardstick. He would therefore accept invitations to visit Hungary and Romania during the next few weeks. Neither was there any disagreement that intra-German relations would continue to be developed without reservation. The Federal Government had therefore noted U.S. President Carter's understanding for the Federal Republic's and Berlin's special situation with great satisfaction.

In this respect the minister of economics welcomed the planned visit by SED Politburo member Guenter Mittag to the Hanover Fair. Mittag is expected at about noon today.

More than 5,600 firms from 49 countries have exhibits covering about 661,500 square meters at the Hanover Fair, the world's biggest industrial exhibition. For 9 days the latest technological developments will be on show. Among the 29 sections of the fair, the 'Energy 80' exhibition is particularly prominent.

In his opening address, Lambsdorff advocated the adoption of economic sanctions against Iran in conjunction with the other EEC partners to support U.S. efforts to secure the release of the hostages. If it were not possible to reach agreement on this, the Federal Government, under the foreign trade law, had adequate legal basis for taking appropriate measures.

According to the minister, in this respect the Federal Government is aware that trade sanctions against Iran could lead to economic disadvantages for the Western world, particularly in the energy sector. However, the gravity of the breach in international law resulting from taking diplomats hostage demands unmistakable actions.

STRAUSS DENOUNCES SCHMIDT SUGGESTION ON NEGOTIATIONS

[Excerpt] Hamburg--CSU Chief Franz Josef Strauss has strongly criticized Chancellor Schmidt's suggestion that East and West should forego the deployment of new or additional medium-range missiles for a certain number of years and use this period for negotiations. Strauss described the proposal as an "open affront to NATO and an unconcealed snub to the United States." The SPD Presidium, meeting in Berlin, strongly supported the chancellor's proposal.

Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher called on the Soviet Union today to take seriously and respond to the NATO disarmament proposals submitted in December--which still lay unchanged on the table. He told the FDP Parliamentary Group that the East-West dialogue must not be broken off, especially in the present situation.

BRANDT COMMENTS ON IRAN SANCTIONS, OLYMPIC BOYCOTT

LD151554 Hamburg DPA in German 1148 GMT 15 Apr 80

[Text] Berlin--According to SPD Chairman Willy Brandt, in the present international crisis efforts for safeguarding peace must be paramount to Social Democrats. Brandt told the SPD parliamentary group in Berlin today that immediately after this comes Europe, the NATO alliance, the will for detente and the honoring of agreements. He reaffirmed that, despite recent disappointments, "everything that can lead to purposeful negotiations must be taken up." German interests demand the continuing reduction of tension and manifold worldwide cooperation.

On the questions of economic sanctions against Iran and an Olympic boycott, Brandt asked for "understanding for decisions which the Federal Government will probably take." But here too sanctions ought to be decided on and imposed only after close consultations within the EC and with the full solidarity of all the partners. He said that honoring all agreements signed is a political necessity, naming in particular the agreement on long-term economic cooperation with the USSR and the agreements with the GDR. Also, a decision by the Feueral Government in the matter of the Olympic boycott does not absolve athletics from its responsibility for an independent decision.

On relations with the United States, Brandt said that for decades the SPD has opposed all forms of "stupid anti-Americanism." But by the same token "we must counter in a dignified, factual and clear way any stupid anti-European emotions are whipped up in the United States."

Berlin's Governing Mayor Dietrich Stobbe called for Europe's "active solidarity" with the United States. Any country like the United States which has given its protection and assistance to Berlin in all the postwar crises must also be accorded solidarity when it happens to ask for it.

SPD'S WEHNER SEES IRAN BOYCOTT AS INEVITABLE

LD151738 Hamburg DPA in German 1528 GMT 15 Apr 80

[Text] Berlin--SPD floor leader Herbert Wehner believes that a response by Bonn to the American demand for an economic boycott of Iran is inevitable. After the meeting of the SPD Parliamentary Group in Berlin, he told journalists today that he saw "no alternative." At the same time, he stressed his continuing concern that intra-German relations might suffer as a result of a boycott of the Olympic games in Moscow. Referring to Bonn's and East Berlin's integration in the different power blocs, he said: "They [the GDR] will be unable to do what they really consider necessary--we shall be unable to do what we think makes sense."

Wehner summed up his personal view on the present international crisis, the key topic of the group meeting, in five points:

1. Unqualified and undiminished respect for the United States as the protecting power.

2. Bonn's loyalty as a NATO member without any reservations.

3. Readiness to support all possibilities for resolving the conflict to stop the crisis from growing into disaster.

4. Bonn's participation in all EEC measures to promote peace.

5. The Federal Republic's loyalty to treaty commitments.

He said that the group's discussion on foreign affairs had revealed different shades of opinion, but that it had been a "businesslike exchange of views without real conflicts."

At the start of the meeting, SPD Chairman Willy Brandt gave priority to the efforts to secure peace. The governing mayor of Berlin, Dietrich Stobbe, referred to the protective function of the United States in the postwar period and called for "active solidarity by Europe" with the United States.

OPEC'S AL-'UTAYBAH REMARKS ON 'UNCHANGED PRICING' DURING VISIT

LD161100 Hamburg DPA in German 0956 GMT 16 Apr 80

[Text] Hamburg--In the view of the current OPEC Council chairman, Mani' ibn Sa'id al-'Utaybah of the United Arab Emirates (UAE), at its next conference in May OPEC will not yet restore the oil-producing countries' earlier price cartel. "I believe that the situation will remain unchanged for the moment. We will try to solve the problem at a later date," Al-'Utaybah stated in a DPA interview during his visit to Hamburg.

This system had been abandoned after the breakdown of the OPEC conference in Caracas because the member states could not agree on the on the price level. The price of crude oil to be used as a reference, which hitherto had been fixed jointly by all OPEC states, determined practically on a worldwide scale the price of crude oil which was marked up or down according to the quality of the individual crudes.

During the interview, the minister stressed that the supply of crude oil to the Western industrial states should not be used as a "means of terrorism or threat." "We are sitting on an oil vat and consider it very important for peace and calm to reign in our region. This also depends, however, on Israel vacating the occupied Arab territories and on the Palestinian people finally getting their full rights."

Al-'Utaybah, who arrived in Hamburg from Bonn on (?Tuesday) evening to meet representatives of the mineral oil industry, repeated in the interview the assurances he had already given in Bonn that the UAE, to the best of their technological ability, will meet any demand arising as a result of cuts in oil supplies from Iran or other Arab countries. The UAE, which ranks sixth on the list of oil-producing countries, is not in a position, however, to compensate for major cuts in supply.

PLO'S KHALID AL-HASAN MEETS WITH DEPUTIES IN BONN

LD151047 Hamburg DPA in German 0944 GMT 15 Apr 80

[Excerpt] Bonn--Khalid al-Hasan, a leading member of the PLO, had talks in Bonn on Tuesday with deputies of the Bundestag. Hasan, who until recently was a member of the PLO Executive Committee, is chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the Palestine National Council--the PLO's decisionmaking body. He received promises of meetings with all three lower house parliamentary groups.

Further Details

[Text] Bonn--Khalid al-Hasan, a leading PLO official, said in Bonn today that the PLO is meeting with growing understanding in Bonn for the problems of the Palestinians. After talks with several Bundestag deputies of all parties, he told journalists tonight that, unlike the past, German politicians are showing more courage in speaking on Palestinian issues.

Al-Hasan, chairman of the Palestine National Council's Foreign Affairs Committee, had talks in Bonn with Juergen Moellemann and Manfred Vohrer, both FDP deputies; Lenelotte von Bothmer and Wolfgang Roth (SPD) and Hans Graf Huyn (CSU). According to Al-Hasan, the talks dealt mainly with drawing the Palestinians into a comprehensive Middle East settlement and the proposed EEC initiative on the Middle East.

Five SPD deputies, including Annemarie Renger, vice president of the Bundestag, said in a joint statement today that talks with PLO representatives made sense only if they led to the Palestinians rejecting the use of terror and the objective of destroying Israel. Gerhard Schmidt, member of the DGB Executive, spoke along similar lines. He cautioned against "silently watching, from indifference, ignorance or political opportunism, the increasing isolation of Israel."

At a news conference, the Israeli Parliamentarian Josef Tamir, who is visiting Bonn, also cautioned against cooperation with the PLO because, for all its fine words, it sought the destruction of Israel and had become a tool of Moscow.

In his conversation with Al-Hasan, CSU deputy Graf Huyn said the PLO should renounce the use of force, recognize Israel as a state and dispel German fears that a Palestinian state [gemeinwesen] might succumb to Soviet influence. FDP Deputy Moellemann called for a renunciation of force between the PLO and Israel.

Al-Hasan told journalists that, in view of Israel's occupation policy, its imprisonment of 20,000 Palestinians and shooting at demonstrators, Israel must be prepared for "violent reactions". He said people who celebrated the Afghan mountain tribes as "freedom fighters" against Moscow could not possibly describe the Palestinians as "terrorists".

He called the proposed EEC initiative a "last chance" for securing a peaceful Middle East settlement. But this initiative must in fact be implemented and not share the fate of many UN resolutions. The Israeli-Egyptian peace talks were about to fail and had already led to an incipient "instability" in the Middle East region. If this continued, West Europe and Japan, who depend on oil imports, would suffer most.

He explained the PLO demand for a Palestinian state by saying that initially a Jewish and an Arab state could coexist, but they must have a common goal: a united Palestine. Both states must be demilitarized and receive superpower guarantees.

DIE WELT VIEWS CONSEQUENCES OF MOSCOW'S KILLER SATELLITES

DW141230 Bonn DIE WELT in German 12 Apr 80 p 6

[Adalbert Baerwolf editorial: "All-Sided Confidence"]

[Excerpts] An arms race of the two big nuclear powers in the cosmic sphere seems unavoidable. [paragraph continues]

One week ago the Soviets opened a new arms round in outer space with the launch of an interceptor satellite "Kosmos 1117" which is designed to be launched from a hunter satellite. They are obviously no longer interested in a standstill agreement on anti-satellites. Thus the efforts of the United States to keep satellite interceptor weapons out of the East-West arms race have failed.

Washington had hoped that Moscow would not resume the antisatellite tests it had voluntarily discontinued since 1978 as a contribution to detente. American experts conclude from the recent launching of the satellite that the Kremlin does not expect ratification of the SALT II arms limitation agreement by the American Congress after the Soviet invasion in Afghanistan, and that Moscow is now trying with all its power to legally develop an arms technology lead in the cosmic spheres.

The Soviet Union is the only country in the world that has antisatellites ready for action. In an emergency these hunter satellites which are steered from the groundcan destroy American telecommunications satellites on whose information the entire command structure of the Western command apparatus is built. The submereged nuclear submarines of the United States in particular depend on data from the satellites.

The Soviet Union has been pursuing an active antisatellite program for 12 years. From 1968 through 1971 the Soviets flew seven antisatellite sorties. From 1976 to 1978 Western observation points registered eight hunter sorties against satellites.

It must be clarified in this connection that a destruction of the American satellites would not at all paralyze the capacity of American missiles, or make them ineffective. The missiles have been programmed, and they will find their targets without satellites. One part of the command structure would be out (but after an antisatellite strike the President could immediately mobilize the U.S. missiles on the ground via cable) and the early warning system would be out. The Americans would no longer see whether the Soviets were firing their missiles or not, so in practice the President would be challenged to make--a still possible--preventive strike.

He could very well content himself, after having set up his own antisatellite system, with making the Soviets blind and half deaf by shooting down their satellites. But if both sides were then unable to see what the other side was doing, an antisatellite strike would practically be a challenge to each side to launch the "first strike."

The military-political side of the project lies in the fact that the Soviets pursue such a program at all. It is the absolute opposite of a confidence-building measure; rather it makes it clear that the Soviet side seriously and pragmatically counts on the most extreme means. That calls into question the basic idea of every kind of arms restriction--also a restriction that is not contractually agreed on. America is being challenged to answer with all its technological means far beyond the antisatellite problem.

But if the utter precision mechanics such as laser technology and microelectronics is in demand--and that is what outer space armament amounts to--Moscow is not doing itself a favor by challenging the Americans. This is a field where the Soviets will hardly be able to keep pace in the long run--after all, they constantly want to buy computers from the Americans and not vice versa--and it is not economical. Also the oft-cited ability of a dictatorship to make savings in the civilian sector will end at some point in a country which is living on the verge of the minimum needed for existence anyway. The Soviets might rely on the experience that democracy is too indolent to react until it is almost too late. But that is an expectation which after Afghanistan and the taking of hostages in Tehran cannot be bet on with certainty.

LE MONDE: 'NO QUESTION' OF BREAKING RELATIONS WITH IRAN

LD151231 Paris LE MONDE in French 15 Apr 80 pp 1, 5

[Jacques Amalric article: "The Iranian and Afghan Crises"]

[Text] President Carter's statements have had a fairly unfavorable reception in Paris, although Paris does not want to "argue" with the United States. "This is the wrong way of tackling the question," authorized circles say regarding the "precise date" mentioned by the White House chief on which the West European countries should rally to the U.S. policy on Iran. While taking care not to "argue," these circles have made it clear, however, that there is no question of complying with Mr Carter's stern warnings and breaking off diplomatic relations with Tehran. Similarly it is stressed that the decision to recall French Ambassador to Iran Raoul Delaye to Paris does not herald a decision to break off relations. Mr Delaye, like the other EEC countries' ambassadors to Tehran, has been recalled for several days' consultations to report on the results of the interview he had with President Bani-Sadr on Saturday, 12 April, together with his European colleagues and the Japanese ambassador. He will stay in Paris for only a few days to report on his mission and give his analysis of the situation.

Authoritative French circles who were surprised by Mr Carter's outspoken remarks also say they are surprised by the U.S. President's allusions to "a precise date" which was apparently given to the European leaders and after which, failing any tougher line in European policy, the United States would not rule out military action against Iran. Paris, like London, is wondering exactly what the United States President meant. Two hypotheses on the "date" have been put forward. The first places it around mid-May and the second on 21 April, when the nine European foreign ministers meet in Luxembourg with the aim of reviewing Community initiatives in the Tehran hostages affair.

However, it has been pointed out that 21 April does not feature in any message received from Washington. It was merely mentioned by Deputy Secretary of State Warren Christopher in a television interview on Sunday, 13 April, which was shown before the interview with Mr Carter.

"We expect [words apparently dropped] and not words," Mr Christopher said. "I am convinced that our allies realize that we have entered a new phase and that they will take steps in 2 or 3 weeks."

As for the mid-May date, it has been specified that it did figure in a message from Mr Carter sent to Mr Giscard d'Estaing on 25 March but in connection with the development of the internal situation in Iran and not as any kind of ultimatum: Indeed, it is around mid-May that the Iranian National Assembly will be in a position to discuss the fate of the U.S. hostages since the second round of the parliamentary elections will not take place until 2 May, and it will take several days to count the votes and announce the results.

There have been two other contacts between Paris and Washington since then: Last Monday, 7 April, Mr Chapman, minister-adviser to the U.S. Embassy, handed another memorandum to the Quai d'Orsay while Mr Carter had a telephone conversation with Mr Giscard d'Estaing. However, it has been stated that the memorandum which Mr Chapman gave Mr Robin, Foreign Ministry political affairs secretary, contained no date.

While stating that they are aware of the gravity of the situation--the dangers of U.S. military action against Iran have never been so great--government circles stress the "internal" dimensions of the new crisis: The United States is in the middle of an election campaign and Mr Carter's popularity is falling sharply. [paragraph continues]

To silence his critics, who are increasingly standing up against his policy in the Iranian and Afghan affairs, Mr Carter must show his strength. However, he is wrong in thinking he can offload a responsibility which is his onto the European countries. That may be so but the results are there for all to see: The Tehran hostages affair in which Mr Carter had hitherto shown exemplary moderation is now degenerating seriously. Mr Carter's performance is particularly significant in that throughout his interview this religious man seemed determined and deeply convinced of the justice of the U.S. cause. In any case this episode will have been welcomed in Moscow: Aside from the usual protests the Kremlin will note that the differences between the United States and Western Europe are constantly widening.

SOISSON: U.S. OLYMPIC COMMITTEE VOTE DOES NOT CHANGE STANCE

[Unattributed report: "Mr Soisson--The Government's Position Is Unchanged"]

[Text] "The French Government's position is unchanged after the U.S. Olympic Committee's vote for a boycott," Youth, Sports and Leisure Minister Jean-Pierre Soisson said. "There is no change in the French National Olympic and Sports Committee's [CNOSF] position but it would not be anxious to take part in a spartakiad," Mr Soisson added. Mr Soisson had already had occasion to specify that the French Government did not intend to interfere in sporting affairs and that the decision on French participation in the Moscow Olympics depended on the CNOSF.

European CP Meeting Discussed

[Unattributed report: "Talks Between the PCF and the League of Communists of Yugoslavia [LCY]"]

[Text] Central Committee secretary and Politburo member Maxime Gremetz received the LCY delegation led by Presidium member Mahmut Bakali at Central Committee headquarters on 10 April (Note--participating in the meeting were, for the PCF, Yves (Serdenif,) member of the Central Committee foreign policy section, and, for the LCY, Mirjana Pocek-Matic, Central Committee member: Alojz Gojcic, executive secretary to the Central Committee of the League of Communists of Slovenia; and Vojislav Maletic of the international section). The talks gave rise to a broad exchange of views on both national and international questions. Reciprocal reports were exchanged on the situation in each of the countries and particular attention was paid to international questions.

In particular, the discussions dealt with various aspects of the international situation, the problems of detente, the struggle for a new world order and also the role of the nonalined movement. Within this context they discussed the forthcoming communist parties' meeting on peace and disarmament due in Paris on 28-29 April. On this latter question Mr Bakali mentioned the reasons for the LCY's nonparticipation in this initiative. He reasserted how well the LCY appreciates the open nature and form of the meeting and expressed the LCY's intention to inform its members and Yugoslav public opinion of the preparations, conduct and conclusions of this meeting. Mr Bakali further recalled the importance the LCY attaches to the deepening and development of cooperation abetween the two parties.

After explaining the significance of the Paris meeting, Maxime Gremetz emphasized the importance of the communist parties' participation in this initiative for peace and disarmament. He indicated that the PCF is aware of the unique place of Yugoslavia's commitment to the nonalined movement, and that, for its part, the PCF would reject any form of polemic harmful to relations between the communist parties. The PCF believes that each party must determine its own course in complete independence and it is for this reason that the French Communists are working zealously to establish new relations within the international workers and communist movement. In the PCF's view, the differences of position which may appear on this or that question should not harm a fruitful cooperation.

Maxime Gremetz expressed satisfaction at the cooperation and relations of friendship and solidarity between the PCF and LCY, marked in particular by the June 1979 meeting between Georges Marchais and Josip Broz Tito. The talks, which took place in a warm and fruitful atmosphere, enabled the two sides to establish their joint desire to develop links and cooperation between the PCF and LCY still further.

DIRECT ACTION GROUP CLAIMS ATTACKS ON MINISTRIES

[Summary] There were three bazooka attacks in Paris at about 8400, against the Ministry of Transport, an annex of the ministry and a bank in the 14th district. The attacks were all carried out the same way: from a passing car. Nobody was hurt but there is considerable damage. An eyewitness says that the head of a rocket was found embedded in a wall, and the rocket may have been fired at the Ministry of Transport from the other side of the Seine. "Responsibility for the three attacks has been claimed by the Direct Action group in a telephone call. The group has already claimed responsibility for the shooting and attacks against the Ministry of Labor and Ministry of Cooperation. About 15 members of the group were arrested some days ago by the police in an antiterrorist sweep."

PREMIER RETURNS FROM BONN, COMMENTS ON OLYMPIC BOYCOTT

LD151436 Lisbon in Portuguese to Europe 1230 GMT 15 Apr 80

[Excerpts] Prime Minister Sa Carneiro spoke to reporters at Lisbon Airport on his return from Bonn in the early hours of this morning.

On the question of the Olympic games, the prime minister said that the trend among the European countries seems to be in favor of a boycott. He added that if the games become a mere exercise of political and ideological propaganda, our athletes will surely refuse to participate.

Views Soares Carneiro Candidacy

LD151424 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 0300 GMT 15 Apr 80

[Excerpts] Prime Minister Sa Carneiro arrived in Lisbon from Bonn in the early hours of this morning.

Asked by reporters at the airport to comment on the announcement of the Democratic Alliance's support for General Soares Carneiro in the coming presidential elections, Sa Carneiro said that the reporter's question was in fact the first news he had heard of the announcement, and added:

[Begin recording] [Sa Carneiro] I hope that this announcement--which I am hearing about for the first time--of the Democratic Alliance's support for the candidacy of General Soares Carneiro may help toward political stabilization and open up prospects for a stable equilibrium and harmony between the parliamentary majority and the presidency.

As to the reactions to the announcement, I know nothing about them, so I cannot comment.

[Question] [Words indistinct] fears that the candidacy of Soares Carneiro might create serious divisions among the military?

[Answer] I do not think so. I would have thought that possible with a candidate representing the armed forces as such, but with a military candidate backed by political forces, chosen by political forces, who will come forward as such when the right time comes. I see no risk of a split in the armed forces; quite on the contrary, I hope that this candidacy will serve to highlight the difference between political power and the armed forces, and the fact that the armed forces should never hold power, that power must be held exclusively by civilians while the armed forces should remain a force carrying out the missions, and following the guidance, required and provided by a democratic government in a democratic context. Democracy is eminently civilian by nature. [end recording]

GOVERNMENT SET TO ESTABLISH RELATIONS WITH ZIMBABWE

In an airport statement, the minister announced that Portugal will immediately establish diplomatic relations with the imminently independent nation, where Portuguese immigrants constitute the second largest foreign community.

THATCHER ATTACKS NATIONAL OLYMPICS COMMITTEE CHIEF

LD151524 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1502 GMT 15 Apr 80

[Text] The prime minister attacked British Olympics chief Sir Denis Follows in the Commons today for his determination to send a British team to the Moscow Olympics. Mrs Thatcher said she "fully understood and agreed" with Tory MP Mr Cranley Onslow (Woking) who urged her to "get it into the thick skull of Sir Denis Follows that there is a war going on in Afghanistan." It would be a "matter of national disgrace" for British athletes to go to Moscow, Mr Onslow said.

Mrs Thatcher told him: "I understand Sir Denis said only a war would change the decision of the British Olympic Committee to go to Moscow. There is just such a war going on in Afghanistan. Russia is using troops to hold down a people, and in those circumstances it would be quite wrong for British athletes to go to Moscow if they value their freedom as much as we do," she said.

AID PROGRAM ANNOUNCED FOR ZIMBABWE ANNOUNCED

LD151648 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1444 GMT 15 Apr 80

[Text] The government is to give pounds sterling 75 million aid to Zimbabwe over the next three years, the foreign secretary, Lord Carrington, announced in the Lords today. His statement came as Rhodesia prepared for independence on Friday as Zimbabwe.

The foreign secretary told peers: "The bulk of the pound sterling 75 million will be devoted to a substantial bilateral aid programme which will be allocated in agreement with the Zimbabwe Government."

This programme would include assistance with police training, broadcasting, the Civil Service and the Foreign Service at the request of the new government of Mr Robert Mugabe. Britain was also providing separately from the aid programme, assistance with training the future Zimbabwe Army, said Lord Carrington.

The foreign secretary also announced that the government would grant an amnesty to British firms which had broken sanctions. He said: "The Zimbabwe Act 1979 granted an amnesty in United Kingdom law for political offences connected with UDI [United Declaration of Independence]. A similar amnesty was granted in Rhodesian law, and has subsequently been extended by the governor (Lord Soames) in a general pardon covering all political offences up to the elections. Now that full amnesty has been granted to all those responsible for the situation which led to the imposition of sanctions the government feels that it would no longer be appropriate for any further prosecutions to be initiated for sanctions offences."

Lord Carrington said that the measures applying sanctions in the United Kingdom law had been revoked. "Only one case, an appeal, was at present before the courts, and no other prosecutions were pending. The amnesty will not reopen past judgments. An order will be laid before her majesty in council in due course to give effect to this decision."

Lord Carrington said that Zimbabwe's "welcome" accession to the Commonwealth as the forty-third member called for further legal provisions. "An order under the Zimbabwe Act will be laid before Parliament in draft in the next two days for approval by resolution. The principal purposes are to continue the application of certain United Kingdom laws in relation to Zimbabwe notwithstanding its change in status. Similar provision has been made for the application of United Kingdom law in respect of other republics within the Commonwealth."

Opposition spokesman Lord Goronwy-Roberts said it seemed that pounds sterling 75 million spent over the next three years was a "substantial sum" when linked with certain multilateral advances to the new state possibly from the European Community, and other offers of cash aid which had already been made public. Although there was anxiety that when we offered the aid we would offer advice on how it should be spent, the whole tenor of the Zimbabwe Government had been to turn to Britain as a friend. He was sure decisions of disposal of the cash would be made in the same spirit. He was glad that the Zimbabwe Government had sought Britain's advice on the formation of important sectors of the country's life such as the police force, the Civil Service and Foreign Service as well as army training. It was "significant of the attitude of the new prime minister" and the people as to the way the country wished to go in the future, he said.

Lord Carrington said there was no reason to suppose that any money Britain provided would "go down the drain," in reply to Liberal Lord Byers who called on the EEC and its (?food) surpluses within the Community to combat malnutrition which was "rampant" in Zimbabwe. Lord Byers asked for teachers and instructors to be sent out to help the population with the minimum of "red tape."

Lord Carrington said although the pound sterling 75 million had been described as substantial, there had been generous pledges of support from other countries. War in Rhodesia had caused enormous damage, and this had to be made good before any money could be spent on productivity. But Zimbabwe was an African country which could "stand on its own feet. Economically it is perfectly viable," he said.

In the Commons, shadow foreign secretary, Mr Peter Shore attacked the decision to offer amnesty to all British firms previously engaged in sanctions busting. He said: "It is absolutely right to give political amnesty to all offences committed during the period of UDI, necessary to achieve the spirit of conciliation in that country. To extend that to British firms who have broken sanctions is in my view a mistake, and a big mistake. I do believe we have a duty to uphold our own laws and it is necessary for us to do so if we are to get respect for our laws, and if we are to carry the right impact in countries abroad as well."

Shore paid tribute to those responsible for "this legitimate and proper solution in Zimbabwe." He welcomed the announcement of aid but added: "I cannot help but have in mind the assessment that was made three years ago that Zimbabwe would need between 500 million pounds sterling and 750 million pounds sterling--while of course it is not just for Britain alone to undertake that burden. I hope that we are going to make, along with the new Zimbabe Government, a general appeal for international funds." Countries such as Sweden and Canada would be willing to join the United States in providing aid, he suggested.

Deputy Foreign Secretary Sir Ian Gilmour said other countries would be providing aid, and it was "absolutely right" for Britain to provide the lead. He dismissed criticism of the decision to grant a general amnesty. "It would be quite wrong now to bring prosecutions for offences that are no longer offences," he said.

He told Liberal leader Mr David Steel: "Of course we believe that there are many countries that will wish to subscribe to the aid program for Zimbabwe. We are confident these will amount to a substantial sum."

Sir Ian told former Labour Home Office Minister Mr Alex Lyon that he was unable to say how much the EEC and the United States proposed to contribute to the Zimbabwe aid programme. "This must be a matter for discussion between the countries concerned and the new government," he said.

Mr Shore repeated his misgivings about the "blanket nature" of the amnesty and about the lack of details on aid. He claimed the 75 million pounds sterling was merely an additional 15 million pounds sterling on 60 million pounds sterling in the contingency fund which had been earmarked for aid. That 60 million pounds sterling was now being handed over to Rhodesia at the expense of other countries in the aid programme, he said. Mr Shore attacked Sir Ian for announcing the aid in the absence of any information about Rhodesia's balance of payments situation, the cost of resettling refugees, or future land reform. Sir Ian, however, dismissed Mr Shore's criticism as "inappropriate niggling."

ARABIC PAPER ON PROPOSED U.S. SANCTIONS AGAINST IRAN

[Jihad al-Khazin article: "Continuing Escalation"]

[Excerpts] The indications are that President Carter has decided to step up U.S. measures against the Iranian regime because of the continuing hostage problem as well as against the Soviet Union because of its invasion of Afghanistan. The escalation this time involves actions, not words. The reasons for this are many, but the most important is the fact that a hard line is beneficial for Carter's reelection following the failure of his campaign in New York, and, too, both the Iranian regime and the Soviet Union, each in the context of the problem concerning it, have left him no option other than a hard line.

Adopting a hard line does not necessarily mean that President Carter will achieve anything positive with regard to the release of the hostages or the withdrawal of Soviet forces from Afghanistan. The Iranian regime seems to be isolated from what is happening in the outside world and is under pressure from the man in the street. As for the Soviet Union, it did not enter Afghanistan in order to withdraw and will not do so unless the disadvantages of the invasion greatly outweigh its advantages, which is not going to happen in the near future.

In imposing sanctions on the Soviet Union or Iran President Carter realizes that the United States can succeed only with the cooperation of its allies. But these allies do not want to refrain from sending their athletes to the Moscow Olympics. Therefore, it is illogical for him to expect them to participate in any economic sanctions that might generate a Soviet reaction in Europe which they could do without.

It is obvious now that President Carter wants to solve the hostages crisis on the grounds that it concerns only U.S. citizens being held in Tehran and in the hope that settling this crisis would lead to an improvement in U.S. relations with the Islamic countries in general and therefore make it possible to take more effective measures against the Soviet Union in Afghanistan.

President Carter's measures against Iran have so far received wide support from the U.S. public, and what the Iranians must understand before it is too late is that the Americans will support any escalating measures that their President might take.

The irresistible temptation for Carter to adopt such retaliatory measures is that it helps him in his election campaign, which means that Iran might suddenly find itself facing a U.S. naval blockade which, no matter what it says, it will be unable to resist.

Of course, the Soviet Union will hasten to support Iran only with words in the hope of distracting attention from what it is doing in Afghanistan. But the Soviet Union would be unable to resist U.S. pressure if the U.S. administration seemed determined to use it and, in any case, would not do so for the sake of the present regime in Tehran.

I VRADHINI INTERVIEWS IRAQI MINISTER ON VISIT, IRAN SITUATION

AT151546 Athens I VRADHINI in Greek 15 Apr 80 p 5

[Text of interview by unidentified correspondent with Iraqi Minister of Industry and Minerals Tahir at-Tawfiq in Athens on 14 April]

[Text] Question: What are your impressions of your visit to Greece?

Answer: Greece has made great progress in all fields in recent years and its level of development is high. From our visits, especially to aircraft and armaments manufacturing plants and to shipyards, we learned that great technological progress has been made.

The cordiality and hospitality which was accorded to me and to those accompanying me represent the hospitality and the sincerity of the Greek people and the friendly relations which exist between our two historic peoples.

Question: What is your opinion of the condition of Greek-Iraqi economic relations and what do you think are their prospects?

Answer: Our economic relations are excellent and it is obvious that in the past 3 years they have expanded greatly, while future prospects for these relations are even better.

The mutual visits of ministers and delegations certainly promote cooperation between the two countries in all fields.

The joint interministerial committee for cooperation in the economic and technical fields, which is currently conferring in Baghdad, helps effectively and constitutes one more step toward improved Greek-Iraqi relations.

There are many Greek companies in Iraq which are engaged in large projects and in the new 5-year development plan these companies will be asked to undertake many projects in order to help in the implementation of this plan.

This 5-year plan (1981-1986) will be of great significance for Iraq because it will enable us to enter the ranks of the developed countries thanks to the rate of development which has been fixed.

Question: Do you believe that there are additional opportunities to develop closer relations between the peoples of the two friendly countries?

Answer: There will be many and great opportunities for developing and expanding cooperation and for closer relations between the two countries.

Certainly contacts at the level of parties, popular organizations, associations and trade union organs will help to further strengthen relations between our two peoples.

Question: What are your expectations concerning the result of the next nonaligned conference which will be held in Baghdad and which will confirm Iraq's emergence as one of the leading powers of the Third World?

Answer: We expect that the results of the Baghdad conference will be very important for the neutral and nonaligned countries and that they will lead these countries along the road which confirms and guarantees their independence and their abstention from alliances with the great blocs.

We realize that our responsibilities are very great because we are the organizing country for the conference. For this reason, after the conclusion of the Havana conference, we began a program of reciprocal visits and exchanges of viewpoints among neutral and nonaligned countries so that positive prerequisites could be established for the success of the conference.

Basically what concerns us is the implementation of all the goals and principles of the nonaligned nations so that the so-called Third World can play a more positive role in international politics and can contribute to enduring pressures from the two opposing superpowers.

Since the Havana conference, some events have taken place which have influenced the international political situation in general and the nonaligned movement in particular. The most significant of these has been the intervention in Afghanistan and the occupation of that country by the Soviet Union, while the dangerous situation in Iran and the manipulated crisis of the U.S. hostages have given the U.S. a pretext for movements in the Persian Gulf and the Indian Ocean.

These events have provided the United States and Russia with the opportunity to begin a dispute over the extension of their influence in the area and the establishment of their bases.

In the wake of these events, the Iraqi Government's responsibility toward the Arab world and the nonaligned nations has led to the drafting of the national contract which is composed of eight points which seek to regulate the Arab countries' relations with their neighbors so that the course of interventions and influences can be halted and the independence of these countries can be strengthened in order that the dangers of international antagonism can be removed from the area.

This national contract of President Saddam Husayn was favorably received by most Arab governments and the Arab world.

Question: How dangerous do you think the aggressive and expansionist policy of the Khomeyni regime is for the peace in the area and for international peace?

Answer: The regime of the shah was reactionary and expansionist, it represented U.S. imperialism in the area and it was prepared to receive orders to be the area's gendarme.

After the success of the revolution of the Iranian people we became optimistic that the new Iranian regime would be the opposite of its predecessor. Unfortunately, however, with the forces it inherited from the past within Iran, imperialism succeeded in diverting the revolution from its course and in drowning it in a sea of problems, contradictions and anarchy.

All the manifestations and decisions of the new regime are anarchronistic, reactionary, racist and chauvinistic and express the spirit of expansionism in precisely the same aggressive manner as the regime of the shah.

The new regime has gone so far as to stir up again the expansionist designs the shah had abandoned, such as the annexation of Bahrain and the continuing occupation of the Arab islands in the Persian Gulf.

These things have caused instability in the area which threatens local and international peace because of the area's vital economic and strategic importance.

The new Iranian regime uses the Muslim faith as a cover for its services--which are precisely similar to those of the shah--to imperialism and its base, the Zionist regime in Arab Palestine.

The new Iranian regime must put an end to the quagmire of anarchy and irresponsibility in which Iran is currently sinking. Furthermore, it must give up its expansionist policy and create good and frank relations with Iran's neighboring states, erase the negative traces of the shah's policy in the area, forge good relations among the peoples of Iran, respect their legal rights and put an end to the chauvinist policy toward Iranian minorities, Arabs, Kurds, Turkomans and Baluchis.

We believe that the Iranian people will correct the situation and will put an end to the tragedy which has been imposed on them. However, we are not prepared to suffer damages.

In Iran there are the Arab people of Arabistan [Khuzestan] who were a part of Iraq until the end of World War I whom we support and we want to preserve the rights of these people to humane treatment. We also want to preserve the rights of the other Iranian people, Kurds, Baluchis, Turkomans and so forth because we are living in the 20th century and not the 15th, to which the Khomeyni regime wants to return Iran.

In Iraq there are Kurds to whom we have given national rights. These Kurds govern themselves and they have their own organizations. Soon elections will be held for the legislative council of self-government and for a national council.

In Iran, however, these people have been sacrificed. In the incident in which a cinema caught fire and 400 people were burned. All these people were Arabs.

The Khomeyni regime too has treated them with inhuman barbarity. What more should we say than the current rulers of Iran forbade doctors from examining wounded people during the uprising which took place 4 months ago in Arabistan and that in Kurdistan even greater atrocities occurred?

Question: How will Iraq react if Iran attacks Arab lands?

Answer: We shall cut off their arm from the shoulder. We are sure the Iranian people will receive the Iraqis because we are the only regime in the area that is loved by the people, has the people rallied around it, rules them with an ideology and treats them with a spirit of equality.

During the 12 years our revolution has existed we have created prosperity for the people, we have enlightened them and we have developed the country. Our people are ready to fight and if Iran tries to attack, it will be punished.

Question: After the nationalization of your country's national wealth the government embarked on the implementation of the most important program in the Arab world for industrial development.

Answer: The development programs which were implemented by the Iraqi revolutionary government after the nationalization of the country's national wealth have been great and their results so significant that our economy currently constitutes the mainstay of our national independence.

However, our aspirations are much greater than what we have actually implemented in the economic and industrial sectors. Within the framework of these aspirations we decided upon the 5-year program of 1981-1986 and the goals and details, which are now being discussed, will bring Iraq into the circle of developed countries.

Question: During your discussions here was any decision made concerning the establishment of an industrial complex for oil products?

Answer: A final decision has not been made on this issue but some of its aspects have been discussed with the Greek minister of industry who has expressed Greece's absolute readiness for cooperation in this sector. The Iraqi Ministry of Oil will study this project in depth and will give its final reply to the Greek side.

Question: During your stay here did you examine the possibilities for cooperation on a new alumina plant and what has the decision been?

Answer: Yes, we discussed the possibilities for cooperation on a new alumina project. We are interested in this project and we certainly want to find a way to establish this cooperation. We agreed with the Greek minister of industry to give a final opinion soon in connection with the method of cooperation that has been proposed. We have agreed on the future establishment of a joint committee to make a detailed study of the issue.

Question: What possibilities are there for an increase in the sales of Greek technical and military materiel to Iraq?

Answer: Specifically now, after we were briefed on the Greek possibilities, there are possibilities for an increase in sales of Greek technical and military equipment and for commercial transactions.

We shall endeavor to expalin these possibilities to the competent Iraqi officials. There are many evaluations which can help the development of cooperation in these sectors.

DHROSOS ASSESSES MIDEAST ISSUES IN I KATHIMERINI

AT151737 Athens I KATHIMERINI in Greek 15 Apr 80 p 4

["Political Issues" column by G.N. Dhrosos: "Heavy Clouds in the Middle East"]

[Text] The developments in recent months in the Middle East are well known and of great significance and it is certain that they will not end soon.

In addition to these great issues which occupy literally the entire world, there is a small issue which concerns us especially. Specifically, after many Turkish efforts the general meeting of the International Islamic Congress recently took place in Famagusta. Representatives from 37 Muslim countries and 7 Muslim organizations participated. Of course, this congress has a private character but it dealt with Cyprus and it issued a relevant resolution. The resolution essentially recognized the existence of a Turkish Cypriot state and asked all Muslim countries and organizations to form all kinds of ties with the federated Turkish Cypriot State. These resolutions, however, have a somewhat theoretical character. In any case, the Islamic conference of foreign ministers will soon convene in Pakistan and there is a danger that it may adopt the Islamic congress' resolutions on Cyprus. After all, both the Turkish Government and the very active Mr Denktas are exerting efforts in that direction.

Admittedly, nobody can accuse the Turks of hiding their intentions. They want a separate Turkish Cypriot state and they want to retain the lands they have occupied. All the rest about negotiations, United Nations resolutions, and a "solution" to the Cyprus problem are for the naive or for those who have an interest in appearing to be naive while seriously discussing with the Turks the implementation of the rules of international law and so forth. Naturally the issue hurts us because we are Greeks, but within the maelstrom currently prevailing in the Middle East one should not expect the great to devote much attention to this issue which is very small to them.

If one wants to view the entire situation in the Middle East in a practical spirit, one is obliged to conclude that the issue of Afghanistan has ended in favor of the Russians, that relations between Iran and the United States will continue to be very bad without going as far as war and that what is of more interest and presents more danger of a military clash is the issue of relations between Iraq and Iran. That issue is which of these two countries will play the primary and guiding role in the rich and strategic area of the Persian or rather the Arab Gulf.

In recent years the issue had been solved in Iran's favor, principally because of U.S. support and to its well organized and excellently well armed military forces. Thus the Iranians had occupied three disputed small islands in the Persian Gulf and had caused much uneasiness among the other small but rich ministates of the area. After all, Iran was a much greater and stronger country than Iraq, which at the time was rather backward. After all, this excessive support of the regime of the shah by the Americans was one of the causes of bad relations between Washington and Baghdad and of the latter's rather overly close approach to Moscow.

Now, however, things have changed. The Americans have no reason to support Iran. Quite the contrary. On the other hand, Iraq is modernizing itself and is becoming stronger, and the Islamic lectures of Ayatollah Khomeyni are worrying the Baghdad regime, given the fact that there is a rather large segment of Moslem Shi'ites in that country, that is, the sect which is prevalent in Iran. After all, the value of the Iranian Armed Forces has been greatly reduced because of both successive purges and the lack of materiel. All Iranian arms are of U.S. origin and of course the Americans do not even contemplate renewing this materiel or providing the necessary spare parts to the Iranians.

We set aside the various minority uprisings which Iraq may possibly be inciting somehow.

Therefore, al this change in scenery in the area inevitably brings Iraq closer to the United States while Iran not only cannot rely on any help from that side but also cannot expect any help from Moscow. Tehran has repeatedly disapproved of communism, and Moscow cannot ever support a theocratic regime heading a pan-Islamic movement very near its own areas which are inhabited by majority Muslim populations.

Iran has entangled itself in many ways and Iraq knows this very well and perhaps it thinks the appropriate time has come to dynamically play the primary role it has always claimed in that area.

AIRSPACE VIOLATION CONFIRMED; DECISION AGAINST EMBARGO INDICATED

TA151513 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1509 GMT 15 Apr 80

[Text] Ankara, 15 Apr (AA)--Sources in Ankara confirmed that Iranian aircraft violated Turkish airspace across the border last Sunday, but denied reports of bombing by the same aircraft. The sources in Ankara noted there was no question of Turkey making a formal protest since the border violation was probably a mistake. They brought the incident to the attention of Iranian authorities so that it would not be repeated.

There was no question either, the same sources said, of Turkey joining the economic embargo against Iran led by the United States.

VOTCP CITES U.S. PRESSURE FOR IRANIAN ACTION

TA160939 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 16 Apr 80

[Unattributed commentary: "Turkey Should Not Be Dragged Toward Imperialist Adventures in the Middle East"]

[Excerpt] Dear listeners, an eventual U.S. military intervention in Iran has been discussed at the Brussels meeting of the NATO military planning group--in which Turkey also participated. Revealing parts of the detailed Pentagon plan for aggression, the U.S. war minister's [as heard] advisor Komer said that some of the U.S. troops and military equipment in Europe would be transferred to the Persian Gulf. Komer, who is well known in Turkey as a CIA agent, made threatening statements like: You must take your own measures to insure your own security. This diplomatic language used by U.S. diplomats in their dealings with their NATO allies in Europe becomes an oppressive ultimatum when used in Turkey. The Carter administration is telling its Western allies that they should support the U.S. economic and military measures imposed on Iran if they do not want the transfer of U.S. troops to the Persian Gulf, which are insuring their security. There is no place for diplomatic double talk in the oppressive methods that Washington uses with Turkey. It presents its demands to Ankara as an order or an ultimatum.

The latest ultimatum presented to the Turkish Government by the U.S. ambassador to Ankara openly informs the government that Turkish soil will be used in an eventual act of aggression in Iran. The government has apparently been studying this ultimatum for 5 days. The result will be the same even if this study period lasts 10 days or 1 month. Could the Demirel government say: No, we will not permit the use of our soil as a (?base) for threats and aggression against our neighbors? No, it cannot. Even if it could, these statements would only be made to deceive public opinion, because this government has already signed the bilateral slavery agreement with the United States. This recent agreement gives the United States the possibility of using our country as a tool for threats and aggression against our neighbors, the Soviet Union, the socialist countries, and Iran, as well as against the Muslim Arab peoples in our region. Based on this slavery agreement, the Pentagon has already drawn up a plan for Turkey in the case of an eventual aggression in Iran, determining which of the U.S. bases on our soil will be used in what way.

THREE TERRORISTS KILL U.S. CITIZEN IN ISTANBUL

[Text] Three terrorists killed two persons, one of them an American, in Etiler-Akadlar in Istanbul. The terrorists were then apprehended in an ensuing clash with the security forces. Four persons were wounded in the clashes between the terrorists and the security forces in various places. One of the wounded is a guard, one a policeman and another is a gendarme commando.

Our correspondent has learned from eyewitnesses and security directorate officials that the incident, which began at 0830 this morning, developed as follows: Three terrorists attacked an American, (Sam Noello), and his house guest, Ali Sabri Baysar, as they left the former's house on Fidan Street, off Zeytinoglu Avenue in Etiler-Akadlar, and were getting into the American's car. The terrorists fired from three different directions killing (Noello) and Baysar, reportedly employed by an American company. The terrorists then got on a motorcycle and began to flee. A police team from the Besiktas security directorate spotted them and a clash ensued. Policemen Nusret Celebi was wounded in the clash. Theterrorists then began to flee toward Bebek on a motorcycle. Police teams alerted by radio surrounded the area. There were clashes between the terrorists and the police in four different places in Emirgan. The terrorists were then surrounded by the police in Cinaralti in Emirgan. Following a 10-minute clash, the three murderers were caught. Two ofthem were reportedly wounded.

Menderes Ataseven, a gendarme commando, Riza Karabal, a guard, and (Adriya Mustaraki), a citizen who was fishing at the time, were wounded in the incident. The police found 4 pistols, 112 rounds of ammunition and 9 clips on the terrorists and about 100 spent cartridges at the scene of the incident.

Officials said that the identities of the murderers will not be disclosed for the time being during the investigation.

PLO, IRAQIS WALK OUT OF EUROPEAN ISLAMIC CONFERENCE

LD151035 London ASH-SHARQ AL-AWSAT in Arabic 14 Apr 80 p 2

[Text] London, ASH-SHARQ AL-AWSAT--European-Islamic Council Secretary General Salim 'Azzam has vehemently criticized the Camp David agreement. His criticism came in the speech with which he opened the Islamic conference organized by the European-Islamic Council at London's Royal Albert Hall. The Iraqi and Palestinian representatives withdrew from the opening meeting.

At the largest Islamic gathering ever assembled in the West, 'Azzam denounced the occupation of Palestine and the American attitude to the Arab cause. He also condemned the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan.

'Azzam regarded the Iranian Revolution as an Islamic one. This drew violent objections from those who did not support this revolution and from the Iraqi Muslims, who withdrew from the conference in protest.

'Azzam h d announced that a speech would be delivered on behalf of PLO Executive Committee Chairman Yasir 'Arafat by his representative, Nabil Ramlawi, but when time came for Ramlawi to deliver his speech, 'Azzam announced that the Palestinian representative, who had been present in the hall, had withdrawn without giving a reason.

The topic of the conference is "Phrophet Muhammad, may God's prayers and mercy be upon him, and his message." The conference meetings will continue for 4 days.

The conference issued an international Islamic statement elaborately discussing the true Islamic religion. It said: "The application of Islamic law is the duty of the sons of the Islamic nation, who should establish a world Islamic system based on justice."

After discussing the practices of Islam, the statement reviewed the present cultural crisis. It said: "By virtue of advanced science, technical systems and economic capabilities, mankind has been able to achieve tremendous scientific, technical and economic progress, but this magnificent progress has not been accompanied by similar spiritual and moral progress."

The statement denounced the secular capitalist and communist systems and called for an Islamic system. It said that the Islamic system is based on political, economic, educational, social and military principles.

The statement then dealt with the subject of Islamic solidarity. It said that the steps that must be taken to achieve "the unity of the Islamic nation," including efforts to establish a "treasury" to organize aid to the Islamic countries, a currency system and a common market; to coordinate cooperation in the production and services sectors; to establish a fund to offset the fluctuations in the prices of raw materials and natural resources; to set up an Islamic court of justice; to standardize and chart an Islamic educational and cultural policy; to take care of the interests of Islamic minorities; and to make Arabic the spoken language throughout the Islamic world.

The statement called on Muslims to mobilize all their capabilities in the struggle to liberate Jerusalem and all the Islamic territories. Concluding, the statement said that the Islamic nation has been split into states and ministates, which is not pleasing to God and to his prophet. Despite public statements of adherence to Islamic laws, Islamic principles have not been applied in private life or in public institutions.

Delegations from 25 Islamic states participated in the conference. Also participating were Rauf Denktas, president of the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus; As-Sadiq al-Mahdi, former Sudanese prime minister; Ibrahim Yazdi, member of the Revolutionary Council of the Islamic Republic of Iran; Dr (Sayyid Burhan ad-Din), leader of the (Baharah) community; (Ghafur Ahmad), deputy chief of the Islamic community in Pakistan; (Karakuk Ozal), member of the Turkish Salvation Party; Kamal ad-Din Husayn, former Egyptian vice president; (Burhan ad-Din Rabbani), representative of the Islamic Alliance for the Liberation of Pakistan; Salah Abu Isma'il, member of the Egyptian People's Assembly; (Al-Haj Yusuf Rawa), representative of the Islamic Party of Malaysia; representatives of the Moro Liberation Front of the Philippines; Sadiq 'Abd al-Majid of Sudan; Muhammad Abu dhin of Syria; 'Abd ar-Rahman Khalifah of Jordan; and Shaykh Mustafa Kamal at-Tarazi, mufti of Tunisia.

The conference was also attended by the Iraqi, Jordanian, Omani, Bangladesh, Sri Lanka and Turkish ministers of religious affairs and awqaf, representatives of some Islamic countries, a number of ambassadors and diplomats of Islamic states, and a number of British prominent personalities.

WORLD ISLAMIC FORUM APPROVES EAST TURKESTAN RESOLUTION

WA161300 Nicosia BOZKURT in Turkish 30 Mar 80 p 1

[Text] A portion of the delegates who attended the eighth General Council of the World Islamic Conference left the island yesterday. Some of the remaining delegates are expected to leave the island today. As is generally known, the General Council of the World Islamic Conference concluded its work following yesterday afternoon's session. It was announced that the resolution presented by the East Turkestan representative Ismail Cengiz indicated that the resolution, which he submitted and which was subsequently approved, calls for the discussion of the East Turkestan Turks' demands at the first executive council meeting of the Islamic Conference.

The resolution contains such demands as the call for a visit by a delegation from the Islamic nations to East Turkestan, which is under Red Chinese control, the shipment of a sufficient number of copies of the Koran to East Turkestan and the free passage into and out of East Turkestan, in addition to the abolition of the fabricated name "Xinjiang'.

TURKEY TO RECEIVE $1.162 BILLION IN 1980 FROM OECD

[Text] A meeting was held in Paris today in connection with the aid to be extended to Turkey in 1980 within the framework of the OECD. The meeting began at 1000 Turkish time and was shorter than expected, lasting until 1330. The representatives of the 17 countries that will extend aid to Turkey as well as those from the EEC, World Bank, IMF and European Investment Bank met and reviewed the situation for the last time during the first 75 minutes of the meeting. After that, the Turkish delegation headed by Turgut Ozal, under secretary at the Prime Minister's Office and deputy under secretary of the State Planning Organization, was invited to the meeting which was chaired by OECD Secretary General Van Lennep. The Turkish delegation members were then informed of the amounts to be extended. Addressing the meeting, Ozal talked about the recent economic situation in Turkey and pointed out that a certain decrease was observed in the rate of inflation.

According to an announcement made after the meeting, the aid to be extended to Turkey within the framework of the OECD totals $1.162 billion. Officials have said that, unlike last year, almost 80 percent of this amount will be able to be used for importing goods without the need for licenses.

In a statement he made to the press immediately after the meeting, Ozal said: We have achieved our aim. We will receive $1.162 billion without the export credit, which raised the total last year. We will be able to use almost all of this amount for importing goods without the need for licenses. There are few project loans in this year's amount. The distribution of the $1.162 billion from among the countries is as follows: France, $100 million; Canada, $10.5 million; the FRG, $295 million; Luxembourg, $1 million; Switzerland, $37.5 million; Austria, $15 million; Italy, $115 million; the Netherlands, $21.5 million; Norway, $10 million; the United Kingdom, $33 million; the United States, $295 million; Denmark, $5 million; Finland, $3.5 million; and the EEC, $100 million. Although it participated in the meeting, Australia did not participate in the aid to Turkey.

OECD Press Statement

[Excerpt] A press statement issued following the OECD meeting held in Paris today on aid to Turkey says that the economic aid of $1.162 billion undertaken by the 16 OECD countries [not counting Australia] and organizations will be supplied as soon as possible after bilateral agreements are signed with Turkey. The statement says bilateral talks will begin immediately so that the agreements can be signed as soon as possible. It adds that the EEC and the countries which will extend the aid support the economic policies pursued by the Turkish Government. The press statement issued in Paris says the $300 million credit granted by the IMF to Turkey has been received with pleasure. It also describes as "positive developments" the credit agreements signed between Turkey and the World Bank, the European Investment Bank and the EEC.

EEC CONSERVATIVES WIN SUPPORT FOR RESOLUTION ON IRAN

[By Geoff Meade, PA staff reporter in Strasbourg]

[Text] Tories in Europe tonight won the backing of Euro-Liberals and Christian Democrats in a call for action over the Iranian hostage crisis. After a day of behind the scenes political manoeuvring, the Conservatives appeared to have mustered sufficient support for a full-scale debate on the issue during this week's session of the European Parliament in Strasbourg. Politicians recognize the need for the Parliament to give its views before the spotlight turns to Luxembourg next Monday when EEC foreign ministers will be considering President Carter's controversial call for European sanctions against Iran. It is still not certain when the matter will finally reach the floor of the House, but the Conservatives are anxious enough to have offered to give up a Tory-initiated debate on the Common Market institutions to allow time. Changing the agenda, however, needs the approval of the Parliament's group leaders, and that decision will be announced tomorrow.

The final resolution agreed by the three parties takes a tougher line than the Tory-only motion first suggested on Monday. The latest version still falls short of calling for the sanctions President Carter has urged, but does demand the suspension of diplomatic relations between the Community and Iran unless the hostages are freed. It calls on the Iranian authorities to name an early date for their release. The resolution also calls on the foreign ministers next week to demonstrate, "in countering this grave threat to peace and to international law, their support for the United States of America, as the principal victim at present of this outrageous breach of the normal conduct of peaceful relations between states."

REPORTAGE ON EUROPEAN ISLAMIC CONFERENCE IN LONDON

PLO Walkout Noted

LD161449 London ASH-SHARQ AL-AWSAT in Arabic 15 Apr 80 p 2

[Unattributed report: "Why the Palestinian Delegation Withdrew From London Conference"]

[Text] London--PLO London office director Nabil ar-Ramlawi has told ASH-SHARQ AL-AWSAT: "We attended the opening session of the European Islamic Council meeting in London 12 April 1980 in the response to an invitation from [Council Secretary General] Salim 'Azzam, but we were not asked to participate in the working sessions of the meetings.

"We were surprised when 'Azzam, in his welcoming speech, launched into an attack on the brothers, friends and allies of the Palestinian revolution. This did not encourage us to continue listening to such an attack, especially because those brothers, friends and allies are in the same trench with the Palestinian revolution on the Arab and international levels.

"On this occasion I emphasize that this situation should not be misinterpreted. I also reaffirm, on the one hand, the Palestinian revolution's firm and stubborn stand against the Camp David agreements, and the ensuing agreements between Egypt and Israel, and, on the other hand, the Palestinian revolution's support for the Iranian Revolution against any American or imperialist aggression against the fraternal Iranian people and their revolution."

Call for Solidarity With TFSC

TA161216 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1030 GMT 16 Apr 80

[Text] At its conference on the Prophet Muhammad and his lifetime organized in London, the European Islamic Council called on Muslim governments, organizations and communities to cooperate with and help the Turkish Cypriot community in overcoming all its difficulties. The conference, which was held at the Royal Albert Hall in London and which began with a speech by President Dentkas on 12 April, ended yesterday.

A final communique issued in connection with the conference refers to the Cyprus issue as well. It says that the Council is aware of all the difficulties facing the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus, and it calls for solidarity and support in all fields.

The conference discussed the problems of the Palestinian Muslims and the Muslims living in Greece, the Soviet Union, Yugoslavia, the Philippines, India, Sri Lanka, Canada and the United States.

BULGARIA VOTES AGAINST USSR IN IPU COMMITTEE SESSION

LD161215 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 12 Apr 80 p 40

[Unattributed report: "Soviet Invasion Clearly Condemned, Bulgaria in Agreement"]

[Text] The Soviet invasion of Afghanistan is condemned and the Soviet Union is exhorted to withdraw its troops from the country. This is the main content of a resolution adopted yesterday by 43 votes to 12 in the Political Committee of the Interparliamentary Union (IPU) which is now winding up its spring meeting in Oslo. Three delegations abstained, according to NORSK TELEGRAMBYRA (NTB); Romania did not take part in the voting. However, Bulgaria did, and it voted for the resolution, Norwegian broadcasting reports.

The resolution refers to the unambiguous UN pronouncement adopted by an overwhelming majority on 14 January this year, the IPU demands that this resolution be implemented. The resolution was adopted late on Thursday in the Political Committee and will be taken up for discussion in plenary session at the IPU fall meeting in East Berlin.

The United States [delegate] stressed in a statement to NTB that the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan has jeopardized the work on detente, and it is not impossible that this fall's Madrid Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe could be endangered if the Soviet Union continues to pursue its present course in Afghanistan.

The work of the IPU meeting committees finished on Friday evening and Saturday is devoted to the IPU Council. It is expected that both the situation in Afghanistan and the hostage crisis in Iran will be discussed at the Council meeting.

"I take these meetings as pure raining [word as published], for myself, and I believe that they have great justification," one of the American delegates, Republican Edward Derwinski, told NTB. He had just talked with the Jordanian delegates who were eager to know how King Husayn would be received if he visited the United States.

CUBAN POSITION OUTLINED AT UNESCO COMMUNICATIONS CONFERENCE

FL151903 Havana Domestic Service in Spanish 1823 GMT 15 Apr 80

[Text] Cuba today showed interest in cooperation for development of information systems in developing countries. However, it clearly warned that such cooperation should not lead to a greater degree of dependence.

Manuel Tepe, vice president of the Cuban Radio and Television Institute (ICRT), today spoke at the plenary debate of the UNESCO intergovernmental conference on cooperation for development of communications. The conference is being held in Paris, France.

The Cuban delegate focused his attention on emphasizing attempts at undertaking transfers [presumably of technology] that are not in keeping with development strategies. He also supported a declaration of fundamental principles on mass communications media. Cuba also approved a resolution on a new international information order suggested at the 20th UNESCO conference. This resolution is based on principles formulated by the non-aligned countries.

Manuel Yepe, chief of the Cuban delegation to the UNESCO conference, supported the right to modern electronics technology but warned that in situations of political dependence, a transfer that is not keeping with development strategy could have grave consequences. This position was supported by abundant data on the tactics and strategy in this field by countries such as the United States, showing that 75 percent of the world's communications media is controlled by only 80 big transnational companies.

The ICRT vice president questioned why there has been a sudden willingness to assist in a long-delayed transfer of technology and why countries of the so-called Third World are being offered technical equipment.

EUROPEAN PARLIAMENT TO HOLD DEBATE ON TIES WITH IRAN

LD161204 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1053 GMT 16 Apr 80

[By Geoffrey Nead, PA staff reporter, Strasbourg]

[Text] Tory Euro-MPs today finally won agreement in the European Parliament for a debate on the Iranian hostage crisis.

It will be held tomorrow afternoon, when the Conservatives will call for diplomatic relations between Iran and the Nine to be suspended unless the American hostages are freed at an early date to be specified by the Iranian authorities.

They will call on EEC foreign ministers, who meet next week to consider President Carter's request for European sanctions, to take "all necessary and practicable steps to oblige the Iranian authorities to release the hostages".

An overwhelming majority of members supported the call for a debate after Euro-Tory leader Mr Jim Scott-Hopkins warned that the Iranian crisis was one of the most serious since 1945, and said it was important that the Parliament expressed its support for America.

The new Italian Foreign Minister Signor Emilio Colombo, who will chair next week's crucial talks in Luxembourg, was in the Parliament today and was due to make a declaration on Iran to the House this afternoon.

Before today's vote Baroness Elles (C. Thames Valley), said it was "absolutely incredible" that some members seemed to be against a debate on Iran.

"If this Parliament is to have any authority at all it has a duty and obligation to advise the foreign ministers," she added.

Most British Labour members agreed to a debate, but Mr Roland Boyes (Durham) and Mr Richard Balfe (London South Inner) were among the few Euro-MPs who voted against.

The Socialists can now be expected to put down their own resolution in time for the debate.

It is unlikely to go as far as the Tories--who have the backing of the Liberals and Christian Democrats--in demanding a suspension of diplomatic relations.

CHANCELLOR SAYS NO DECISION YET ON IRAN BOYCOTT

AU161140 Vienna WIENER ZEITUNG in German 16 Apr 80 p 2

[Unattributed report: "No Decision on Boycott"]

[Text] Austria has not yet made any decision about whether it will participate in the boycott measures against Iran desired by the United States. This was stated by Chancellor Kreisky yesterday [15 April] after the cabinet meeting. He added that at present all the international law aspects of this question are being carefully studied. It is also necessary for a neutral state to observe certain principles, he said. When it has concluded these deliberations, Austria will adopt a clear-cut position. To date, only a few governments have taken an unequivocal stand on the U.S. demands, the chancellor stressed.

A boycott of the summer Olympic games in Moscow is regarded by the chancellor as not expedient from Austria's viewpoint. The Austrian position in this respect would not be affected by an EEC decision, either. The decision about participation rests exclusively with the Austrian athletes; the government has no say in the matter, he declared.

The latest development in the Iraq-Iran relations was described by the chancellor as disquieting. He said the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan had produced disastrous effects, and the situation was very serious. Hence all those who can exert a moderating influence must live up to this task.

Cuba's endeavors to establish contacts with Pakistan and Afghanistan were assessed by the chancellor as "less hopeless" than other attempts.

Response Expected 22 Apr

AU161141 Vienna DIE PRESSE in German 16 Apr 80 p 3

[Excerpt] According to every indication, a negative Austrian reply to the United States regarding its request that Austria participate in sanctions against Iran will be decided at the next cabinet meeting [22 April]. In a talk with DIE PRESSE, Foreign Minister Pahr called the American note "unusual" for two reasons: first, because of its tone--the word "request"--and, second, the foreign minister regards it as unusual that the Americans have sent the same text both to allies and non-allies. The note has been received, together with the NATO states, by Australia, New Zealand and the three European neutrals.

Austria is expected merely to concede to the United States that the volume of trade with Iran will not be expanded. A similar attitude was taken in the past by Switzerland regarding the UN sanctions against Rhodesia. According to well-informed sources, this concession will refer merely to the level of exports in 1978--1.8 billion schillings--which dwindled to half that amount last year, however, and will probably decline to one third this year.

FRENCH-SPEAKING PARTIES INSIST ON PRIMACY OF REGIONALIZATION

[Pierre de Vos dispatch: "French-Speaking Parties Demand That the Next Government Give Priority to Regionalization"]

[Text] Brussels--Are the French-speaking parties moving toward a joint front to block the Flemish Christian People's Party [CVP]? All the signs point to this being so. While the king was continuing his consultations with a view to solving the crisis opened by the resignation of the Martens Cabinet, the presidents of the French-speaking parties were holding consultations on Thursday, 10 April.

Following the meeting called on Socialist Party [PS] leader Andre Cools' initiative, Mr Paul Vanden Boeynants (Social Christian Party) [PSC] stated that the French-speaking parties had pledged not to take part under any circumstances in a new government "which did not place prompt regionalization as first priority in its program," on an equal footing with economic and social problems. In addition to the PS and PSC, which belong to the outgoing majority, three opposition parties are henceforth bound by this pledge: Mr Jean Gol's Liberal Party, Mrs Antoinette Spaak's Brussels French-Speaking Front and Mr Henri Mordant's Walloon Rally.

This categorical stance thwarts attempts by some CVP members and their President Leo Tindemans who were proposing that regionalization be frozen and that the next Cabinet should restrict its action to the economic and social problems which have become particularly worrying

The French-speaking party presidents have found an unexpected ally in outgoing Prime Minister Martens who said on radio at noon on Thursday that he too thought it vital to find a quick solution to the quarrel over Brussels' status. The prime minister has no hesitation therefore in contradicting the spokesmen of the party which he chaired for several years until April 1979.

Divisions Among the Flemish Parties

On the Dutch-speaking side, several voices have spoken out in favor of setting up a "Flemish counterbloc." However, a common front of Flemish parties is clearly impossible in the present climate: The Flemish Socialists are in open conflict with the CVP, which they accuse of wishing to dominate Flanders and Belgium. The Liberals in the country's northern district are cautiously refraining from taking any initiative which could jeopardize their participation in a new coalition. Furthermore, the CVP is no longer concealing its internal divisions.

The Belgian political world is unanimous only in rejecting the idea of early elections. Right and left, Flemings and Walloons, say that a return to the polls would not alter the country's political face and would in no way make it easier to solve the crisis.

MARTENS: ELECTIONS 'TO BE AVOIDED AT ALL COSTS'

LD160857 Brussels LE SOIR in French 12 Apr 80 p 2

[G. Dt. report: "Mr Martens on Belgian Radio and Television French Service [RTBF]: 'We Must Guarantee Peace Within the Community in Order To Settle Our Serious Economic Problems'"]

[Text] "I have experienced much grief in recent years. I have lived through some personal dramas but, even after this difficult period I can tell you that I am more determined to fight than ever, whatever post I hold, whatever my place, be it that of an ordinary citizen."

Mr Martens remained true to his image on RTFB on Thursday. He answered questions asked by radio listeners throughout the morning. Questions, of course, on the Christian People's Party (CVP), on Martens-Tindemans relations, on state reform and on the health of our franc, but also many questions which showed public weariness of our community problems. Mr Martens rejected "simplistic" or "Poujadist" ideas advocating the "mothballing" of our language and referendum problems. He reaffirmed that we have to settle our economic and community problems courageously.

Mr Martens regretted the division within the CVP. In his view a political group must be united. Even if he respects the views of those who voted against his regionalization plan the prime minister believes that a party participating in the government must be united in action. "When the CVP participates in the government there is only one possible line of conduct--namely, to support the government totally. That was my attitude when Mr Tindemans was prime minister. I am a loyalist; I try to be loyal to my party, its president and my political partners."

Divergent Parallels

Should we then contrast the good Mr Martens with Mr Tindemans, the gray traitor with his pockets full of disowned agreements?

no, replies Mr Martens, "there is no quarrel or personal animosity between the two of us. We are simply defending objectively different positions. Mr Tindemans believes it his duty to defend his party's positions of principle before all else."

A typical example of this divergence of analysis between the two "great men" of the CVP concerns the fall of the government. For Mr Tindemans, the rejection of article 5 was simply an incident which did not oblige the government to resign. Each article of this bill was, however, essential for Mr Martens. Another divergence: the greater or lesser parallel between the state reform and the clean out of our economy. "We are losing 15 billion [Belgian francs] per month," Mr Tindemans had said. "Our community quarrels have no part in this."

The shepherd's reply to the shepherdess:

"There must be a basic mutual trust," Mr Martens said, "a fundamental consensus on the transformation of our institutions to make everything possible again in this country for our living standard and our economy."

Does the CVP still want regionalization? Does it not wish to preserve the advantages of a united state?

"On the contrary," Mr Martens affirmed. "The conclusions of the 16 December congress embody a firm political will to establish real autonomy for the regions and the communities. If the CVP remains loyal to these resolutions there is a chance of a way out. [paragraph continues]

"There can, of course, be differences of opinion on the ways of achieving this autonomy, and we must still find a specific solution for Brussels."

But Mr Martens admits that if the CVP is a strong party it also has it weaknesses and has many independent minds. He recognizes that he must convince the country's silent majority of the need for state reform.

The Days To Come Will Be Hard

But this silent majority was also thinking of their own little economies and of the specter of the freeway tax, and they questioned the prime minister in these terms:

"We have the necessary means to avoid any devaluation, but those in political office must still bear their responsibilities and try to resolve our political crisis soon. The future government will have to ask parliament to accept the law-program and the 50 billion Belgian franc clean up that it contains. The motor tax will only be the equivalent of the cost of the French freeway between Lille and Marseilles.

"This future government will have to take further economic measures, but it should not decide on the latter without consultation with its social interlocutors."

After Martens, the superstar, will there be Martens, the creator of the next government? "Elections are to be avoided at all costs; they would settle nothing. We must first analyze the political situation. Everyone must express his deepest thoughts and, if conditions exist to form a government which could take the urgent socioeconomic measures and achieve peace within the community, then I would not refuse."

PLO AMBASSADOR TALKS WITH GOVERNMENT, PARTY LEADERS

[Diplomatic correspondent report: "PLO Diplomat Visits The Hague"]

[Text] The Hague, 3 April--Isam Sartawi who, as PLO roving ambassador usually tours Western Europe on behalf of PLO leader 'Arafat, had talks with N. Van Dijl, secretary for Africa and the Middle East, at the Foreign Ministry last Wednesday. Among other things they discussed the chances of the tripartite negotiations on Palestinian autonomy in the West Bank succeeding before 26 May, and the visit which Van Dijl and Foreign Ministry Political Affairs Secretary H.J.C. Rutten made to Israel last month.

Sartawi's visit is the first that an official PLO spokesman has made to the department and at the same time, it also provided him with the opportunity to introduce himself. Last February Van Dijl visited Damascus to meet PLO foreign policy chief Qaddumi and Palestine National Council Chairman Khalid al-Fahum.

In the talks with Sartawi the Dutch once again emphasized how important secure borders are for Israel.

The real purpose of Sartawi's visit to the Netherlands was to talk to second chamber members Den Uyl and Ter Beek (Labor Party) about the Middle East tour they are due to make.

SCHMIDT INVITED TO VISIT USSR IN 'SUMMER'

LD161312 Hamburg DPA in German 1257 GMT 16 Apr 80

[Text] Bonn--Soviet Party Leader Leonid Brezhnev has proposed to Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt that the Bonn government leader pay his long-planned visit to the Soviet Union in the summer. Government Spokesman Armin Gruenewald told the press today that the chancellor had not yet decided on the date of his visit.

According to Gruenewald, the Soviet leadership conveyed its proposal to the chancellor in Bonn on the date of the latter's visit via the Soviet ambassador in Bonn, Vladimir Semenov, a few days ago. Gruenewald gave no exact details as to the proposed date of the visit.

In the view of Government Spokesman Klaus Boelling, the fact that General Secretary Brezhnev remembered the invitation confirms that the Soviet leadership retains its interest in the dialogue with the Federal Government. In an interview with DEUTSCHE WELLE today, Boelling stressed, however, that any ideas about the Federal Government taking on a mediation role in the present crisis situation were quite unrealistic. What was important was that "contacts be set in motion again at high level" between the United States and Soviet Union. Federal Chancellor Schmidt had repeatedly stressed "that there is no substitute at all for this, nor do we desire one", stated Boelling. He also pointed out, however, that in times of critical developments not only the superpowers had to hold a dialogue but others too should use their opportunities to dissipate such conflict situations.

In reply to questions, Government Spokesman Gruenewald specified the date of the visit, proposed by Semenov, as early summer.

Friedrich Zimmermann, chairman of the CSU Parliamentary Group, conjectured that the Kremlin was not interested in discussing current problems in East-West relations with the chancellor. It was hard to believe, he said, that the chancellor's recent renunciatory proposal in the arms issue was unconnected with the readiness for talks now signaled by Brezhnev.

Considering Semenov's threats in the event of a German boycott of the Olympic games, one had the impression that "Moscow was taking the carrot-and-stick approach to the Federal Republic." The Federal Government must make it clear beyond any doubt, he said, that the Kremlin had no chance of separating Bonn from its major ally, the United States, or driving a wedge into NATO. Otherwise, the chancellor's visit to Moscow would be a "journey into ambiguity."

Philipp Jenninger, the parliamentary secretary of the CDU/CSU group, believes that the chancellor's visit to Moscow would make sense only if Schmidt acted there as the representative of the Western alliance and a joint NATO concept in the current crisis, that included insistence that the USSR should fulfill the UN resolution to withdraw its troops from Afghanistan. Schmidt's visit to Moscow would be pointless if it took place close to the Bundestag election date of 5 October, with the chancellor liable to misunderstand his meeting with Brezhnev as a mere propaganda enterprise for the SPD.

U.S., French Leader Contacted

[Excerpts] Bonn, 16 April, REUTER--Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, who recently made a new suggestion concerning the East-West balance of arms, has consulted President Carter on a renewed Soviet invitation for the West German leader to visit Moscow, a government spokesman said today.

The spokesman, Armin Gruenewald, said Mr Carter was among Western leaders Mr Schmidt consulted by telephone after Moscow's ambassador in Bonn, Vladimir Semenov, renewed the long-standing Soviet invitation some days ago. Mr Schmidt, originally invited two years ago during a visit here by Soviet leader Leonid Brezhnev, has repeatedly called for the East-West dialogue to be maintained despite current world tensions.

In a speech on Saturday he chided the United States and the Soviet Union for not talking to each other enough and at the same time called for progress toward curbing the spread of nuclear weapons in Europe.

In remarks that escaped notice until the text of the speech was distributed this week in Bonn, Mr Schmidt proposed that the United States and the Soviet Union refrain from deploying additional or more modern tactical nuclear weapons in Europe for about three years. The interval could be used for talks on limiting the European nuclear arsenals of NATO and the Warsaw Pact with the aim of agreeing on a balanced ceiling, he said. Mr Schmidt's proposal went a step further than a NATO call for arms reduction talks last December, when the alliance decided to modernize its defenses in Europe with American Pershing and cruise missiles.

Mr Gruenewald said at a press conference today that a period until 1983 was proposed because the new NATO weapons would not be ready for deployment before then. Mr Gruenewald said West Germany would consult its allies before deciding on the timing of the chancellor's trip to Moscow and said Mr Schmidt already had spoken with President Carter and French President Valery Giscard d'Estaing.

The chancellor's latest disarmament proposals would be among possible topics for a Soviet-West German summit, although Mr Schmidt would not travel to Moscow just to discuss known views, the spokesman said.

SCHMIDT URGES 'MORE MODERATE TONE' TOWARD USSR

LD162016 Hamburg DPA in German 1955 GMT 16 Apr 80

[Text] Merzig/Saar--Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt has called for a more moderate tone toward the Soviet Union. He told an SPD election meeting in Merzig tonight: "Nothing would be worse than for us at the end of this century to revert to the grandiloquence of the Wilhelminian era." The Afghanistan crisis could be resolved only by compromise. So one has to ensure that the Soviet Union does not lose face at home by marching its 80,000 or so soldiers out of Afghanistan. Schmidt regretted the Soviet failure to respond to the offers of negotiations by the EC foreign ministers. He said: "I fear that this can no longer be useful for the Olympic games in Moscow."

REPORTAGE ON MOSCOW OLYMPIC BOYCOTT ISSUE

Government To Recommend Boycott

LD170937 Hamburg DPA in German 0852 GMT 17 Apr 80

[Text] Bonn--The Federal Government will for foreign political reasons advise the German National Olympic Committee not to attend the Moscow Olympics. However the formal decision will not be taken until the Cabinet meeting on 23 April. Following the talks between Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher and Interior Minister Gerhart Baum--who in the meantime has fallen into line with the government--with seven leading representatives of German sport none of those attending were in any doubt that Bonn cannot avoid following President Carter's demand for "punitive Olympic action" after the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan.

The meeting also made it clear however that the final decision will be with the sportsmen. "Sport is free to decide," said Baum last night when addressing participants of the Lake Placid Winter Olympics. There will be no pressure on the Olympic committee, even though Schmidt has made it clear that he expects an Olympic committee decision "which takes account of the whole political situation." The Bonn meeting only resulted in a definite clarification for the stand by the Federal Government. Sport is now left "holding the ball."

The question now is: How will the National Olympic Committee decide on 15 May? Four weeks before the meeting it is completely open how sport will decide between what it wants and the state's reasoning. This has also been made clear in statements by the committee's President Willi Daume, the President of the German Sports Federation Willi Weyer, and Committee Vice President August Kirch following their meeting in the chancellor's office.

Schmidt Meets Sports Officials

[Text] Bonn--The federal chancellor has met top representatives of German sport this afternoon in Bonn for an exchange of views on a possible boycott of the Moscow Olympic games. During the meeting Schmidt is to brief the sports officials on opinion among the Social-Liberal coalition.

The Federal Government, which discussed the subject of a boycott in the Cabinet today, is to make a political recommendation to the National Olympic Committee (NOC) for Germany at a given time, probably 23 April. If there is no change in the situation in Afghanistan this recommendation, as Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher and Government Spokesman Klaus Boelling have already made clear, will be in support of U.S. President Carter's appeal for boycott.

Present at the meeting in the chancellor's office were, in addition to NOC President Willi Daume, the second federal representative in the International Olympic Committee, Berthold Beitz, and President of German Sports Federation Willi Weyer. The chancellor later held a reception for the German participants at the Lake Placid Winter Olympics.

Chancellor Addresses Athletes

[Excerpts] Bonn--In the present political circumstances, Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt does not think that the Federal Republic's participation in the Olympic games in Moscow is possible. At a reception for German competitors at the Lake Placid Winter Olympic games, the chancellor referred to his statements in the Bundestag and at the end of his talks with President Carter, that it was up to the Soviet Union, by changing the situation in Afghanistan, to create the conditions for the attendance of all sportsmen.

"Today I note with deep regret that the aforesaid conditions have still not been created," he told the competitors. At the same time, the chancellor made it clear that the decision on the attendance of Federal German sportsmen lay with the German National Olympic Committee (NOC) and the sports associations. "The Federal Government will discuss a recommendation and state its assessment of the situation to the NOC. The hope is that the NOC will make its decision with due regard to the overall situation."

Schmidt asked the Olympic competitors "to consider whether solidarity with U.S. sportsmen is not now called for." In a democracy, sportsmen are entitled to canvas and demonstrate for their concerns and attendance at the Olympics. But equally, they must consider hard facts as well as their own wishes.

Before the reception for Olympic competitors, Schmidt, Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher and Federal Interior Minister Gerhart Baum, in a talk lasting about 1 hour, explained to the German sport representatives the feelings of the coalition for a boycott of the Moscow games. NOC President Willi Daume said afterwards that the recommendation which the government will give is on the whole clear. "We were heard with great fairness. It was probably the best conversation we have had so far in such a circle."

Daume told the sportsmen that the Federal Government's advice would carry great weight with the NOC. "But we must weight things well so that our decision will hold up." The Federal Government will probably decide on its recommendation at next Wednesday's Cabinet meeting. The NOC will make its decision at a plenary meeting on 15 May.

CDU/CSU Seeks Boycott

LD151750 Hamburg DPA in German 1518 GMT 15 Apr 80

[Text] Bonn--The CDU/CSU opposition will ask the Bundestag to call on German athletes to boycott the Olympic summer games in Moscow. The CDU/CSU Parliamentary Group unanimously decided today to consider such a resolution. The Bundestag is to condemn the invasion by Soviet Armed Forces of Afghanistan and their "continued imperialist war of subjugation" against the people of Afghanistan.

The draft resolution describes Moscow's conduct as incompatible with the fundamental principles of peace and international understanding, which are enshrined in the Olympic Charter as the objects of the Olympic games. The Bundestag is to be asked to call on Olympic athletes and their organizations not to attend the Moscow games.

In support of its resolution, the CDU/CSU group points out that participation will be tantamount to "toleration" the Soviet Union's conduct. Moscow had so far failed to react to the UN condemnation of Soviet intervention and the appeals by the Muslim countries and the Western world. It was ruthlessly continuing the bloody war of suppression in Afghanistan.

The draft resolution is likely to be discussed with representatives of the SPD and FDP groups in the Bundestag Sports Committee on 23 April. The resolution by the European Parliament on the Olympic boycott issue is on the agenda of the committee meeting. It is understood that the purpose of having the opposition's motion discussed in parliament is to get the coalition groups to take a clear stand on the boycott issue.

Bundestag President's Statement

LD152020 Hamburg DPA in German 1624 GMT 15 Apr 80

[Text] Bonn--According to Bundestag President Stroklen, no German parliamentarians will visit Moscow if the German National Olympic Committee decides to boycott the summer Olympic games in Moscow.

In an interview for BILD-ZEITUNG (tomorrow's edition) he said: "If German sportsmen cancel their participation in the Moscow games as a protest at the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan, it is a matter of course for me that I will not sanction any official trips by members of the German Bundestag." He added: "In view of the Soviet aggression the Western world must show solidarity in coming out for indivisible peace."

CABINET EXPECTED TO DECIDE ON IRAN SANCTIONS 23 APR

LD161430 Hamburg DPA in German 1408 GMT 16 Apr 80

[Text] Bonn--The Federal Cabinet will probably make a decision at its Cabinet meeting next Wednesday on participating in the economic sanctions against Iran. Government Spokesman Armin Gruenewald told the press in Bonn today that the Cabinet would then examine the situation following the preceding talks by the nine EC foreign ministers in Luxembourg on Monday and Tuesday. Only then would it be possible to decide whether a final decision could be made.

BOELLING VIEWS IRAN SANCTIONS, BREZHNEV INVITATION

DW170842 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 1110 GMT 16 Apr 80

[Excerpts from reporter Heribert Schwan interview with State Secretary Klaus Boelling, chief of the Federal Press and Information Service; date, place not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] A paper said that Bonn now follows the motto "shut your eyes and rush through." Was today's Cabinet session a crisis session?

[Answer] No, it was an extremely factual session in which, as in every one of last week's Cabinet sessions an analysis of the international situation was made first, completely undramatic, extremely factual, together with a discussion on the further consultations with our allies in Washington and in the European Community. In connection with this issue, the federal defense minister reported rather thoroughly on his visit to Southeast Asia, to Japan, and actually that was all. Today we finished the Cabinet discussion rather early.

[Question] Key word: Iranian crisis. It has been clear to the experts for a long time--and thus also to the Bonn politicians--that sanctions against Iran will have practically no effect, particularly since East bloc states long ago entered into business relations with Tehran. But because of understandable reasons of solidarity with America, Bonn is clinging to the attempt to have the European Community follow a sanctions course. Is that correct?

[Answer] That might be formulated too one-sidedly. We have always made it clear in past weeks and months that we cooperate closely with our American allies and that we will act as a friend and a partner in this critical situation. We have pointed out our own opinions, and they have been listened to attentively. We maintain close contacts with the American allies and the allies of the European Community on the necessary consequences.

You know that the foreign ministers of the Community will meet in Luxembourg next week. There is agreement in Washington as well as in the European capitals that we want to continue to exploit all political opportunities which exist; but we have always made it clear that we will muster the necessary degree of solidarity, and we have always said that the effect of every measure that has a sensible aim will increase to the extent that it is supported by all allies.

[Question] Would the Western alliance and particularly our relations with the United States really be so endangered if Bonn and the European Community did not join the American sanctions against Iran?

[Answer] I think that this question will not come up, because the American leadership, the American President, will naturally consider and decide only on such measures that will serve to make the Iranian leadership release the hostages. People should stop trying to find new conflicts between the Europeans and the United States. The talk the federal chancellor had yesterday with the American President confirmed again that we agree in the basic assessment of the situation and on the consequences to be drawn from it.

[Question] The chancellor also had a telephone conversation with the French president. Have they reached a consensus as well?

[Answer] Definitely, as far as the assessment of all questions is concerned about which the West will have to form an opinion in the next few days and weeks.

[Question] As never before the chancellor, and many members of the government along with him, have made it plain in the past few days that a boycott of the Olympic games seems to be inevitable, and this probably in full awareness of the fact that presumably a considerable hardening in East-West relations will have to be taken.

[Answer] May I remind you that several times in the Bundestag the chancellor has advocated the view that it is up to the Soviets to create the precondition for the participation of all nations in the Olympic games. If you look around today you will find with great regret that nothing has happened in this respect. During the Washington meeting between the chancellor and the President we said that participation is inconceivable unless the preconditions are created. Besides, you are aware that the decision on the participation of our athletes rests with the National Olympic Committee, and we expect, we assume, that the FRG National Olympic Committee will make its decision under consideration of the overall political situation, in keeping with what Mr Daume said himself at the time. We as the government, in turn, have made it clear that we will decide in the very near future on a recommendation to the National Olympic Committee on this issue of participation, and that this recommendation will then be passed on to the National Olympic Committee. Thus, we will put forth our assessment of the situation in the National Olympic Committee, being receptive, of course, to an exchange of ideas. This is why, as you know, a conference is being held today in the chancellor's office between the chancellor and the presidents of the sports associations, that is to say, a dialogue with Messrs Daume, Weyer, and others.

[Question] Will the chancellor advance a recommendation to them at that time?

[Answer] No, as I said we will make this recommendation very shortly. What matters today is exchanging ideas, with everybody expounding his stance.

[Question] The paper DIE WELT reports today that a meeting with Brezhnev this summer is growing more and more probable. Is this sheer nonsense or does this perhaps contain a grain of truth?

[Answer] No, this is not nonsense, as you put it. Ambassador Semenov inquired the other day, per instructions, about whether a date for a Moscow visit this summer would be acceptable to the chancellor. A decision as to a specific date for such talks has not yet been made. After all, we have just received this news, and it is absolutely clear that a Moscow visit by the chancellor must also be viewed in the overall matrix of East-West relations, because this involves an invitation first issued in May 1978 by General Secretary Leonid Brezhnev who at the time invited the chancellor on behalf of the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet.

At the time the invitation was issued to Federal President Scheel and to the chancellor to make such an official visit and, just as a visit at that time would have provided some motivation in German-Soviet relations, that is to say, in bilateral relations, it would do so again now. But as I said, such a visit must also be viewed in the overall matrix of East-West relations.

SPD'S BAHR RESTATES STANCE ON IRAN CRISIS

DW161602 Hamburg Norddeutscher Rundfunk Network in German 0615 GMT 15 Apr 80

[Unidentified correspondent's interview with SPD Federal Manager Egon Bahr in Bonn; date not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] The Federal Government made it clear yesterday that in all probability it will recommend an Olympic boycott as Washington desires. What is the SPD's attitude regarding this matter?

[Answer] Yesterday the SPD Presidium discussed the overall situation, the international situation and the conclusions to be drawn. We have taken note of the fact that the Federal Government will issue a recommendation. We are not surprised by this development because the Federal Government has utilized the time available for weeks if not months in anticipating indications of changes in the situation in Afghanistan. In the event that these indications fail to materialize, the Federal Government has left no doubt about its recommendation.

[Question] Do you mean to say that the SPD quite unequivocally supports this recommendation as well?

[Answer] The SPD is taking note of it.

[Question] What is the Social Democrats' attitude toward the question concerning economic sanctions against Iran?

[Answer] The party Executive Board did not discuss the subject of a trade embargo. So far there has not been any opportunity for the party Executive Board to do so. We talked about it in detail in the Presidium yesterday. I assume that the Bundestag group will also discuss the issue. My stance on it is the following:

I fully understand that the U.S. President must shift into a faster pace. I think this is not only in the interest of the United States but also in the overall interest. Sometimes I have the impression that the Ayatollah Khomeyni wanted to implement or prove Mao's thesis that the United States is a paper tiger.

For the maintenance of world peace we need a United States which is secure, stable, predictable and sure of itself. But for yet another reason it is necessary for the U.S. President to move at a faster pace. He wants to be reelected, and he will not even be nominated in the first week of August unless the hostages are no longer hostages by then. This means that for this reason and in view of the situation which involves a fantastic violation of an elementary international law--taking envoys hostage--we fully understand the proper cause of the United States. But you can lead a proper cause erroneously just as well. This is the actual point of discussion, namely, the question whether the U.S. administration is perhaps pursuing the correct cause with the wrong means. As far as the trade embargo is concerned, we can, even must, raise a number of questions.

The principal point is this: I have the impression, and justly so, that the U.S. measures were not coordinated with the allies nor were the allies consulted.

The United States should not be surprised if all this takes a bit longer, because we want to think about the issue, especially since it would be absolutely nonsensical for the FRG to act all alone. Even if all European countries together participated in the trade embargo against Iran, it would not work unless the Islamic states of that region participate as well. All this must be ascertained to find out whether the goal would be achieved, namely, a change in Khomeyni's attitude in the hostage issue.

[Question] But obviously the administration in Washington does not want to answer questions but to see deeds now at long last, and you can hardly put it any plainer than the U.S. President did the other day. When will these deeds be forthcoming from Bonn?

[Answer] On that point you must consult the Federal Government's spokesman.

[Question] Right, but what is the attitude of the party, the SPD, the government party, in this matter? After all, the party shares considerably in the decisionmaking process.

[Answer] Our view is the following: First, the Federal Government's reserved, sober, circumspect attitude is appropriate. There is no such thing as urging the Federal Government. Second, it is also correct for the Federal Government to coordinate its stance with its partners in the European Community prior to defining its position.

[Question] Can you visualize the Federal Government providing political backing, as it were, for military actions in the Persian Gulf, for instance?

[Answer] Definitely not.

[Question] No political backing, let alone military?

[Answer] Much less military.

[Question] How do you assess the Federal Government's leeway for action in this situation?

[Answer] The leeway for action of the Federal Government or the Federal Republic, but not only of the Federal Republic but of all states between the two great powers, is growing narrower the more the tensions between the latter increase. This is also a reason, by the way, why we advocate detente, since our own room for maneuvering increases along with the degree of detente. If a real confrontation came, this room would be practically or nearly nil. Today it has been reduced by the international tensions, but it is still adequate.

[Question] Do you expect any military action in the near future?

[Answer] No, I do not expect military actions, not even in the near future. Above all, I hope that they can be avoided. Yet the situation is such that we cannot definitely tell, as we could have about a year ago, that nothing will happen in the Middle East and that the conflict will be manageable.

EXECUTIVE ON IRANIAN STRATEGY IF OIL BOYCOTT DECLARED

[Excerpt] Bonn--Rolf-Roger Hoeppner, board member of the state-owned Iranian company Iran Commercial and Industrial Service, Inc. in Hamburg, estimates that in the event of an oil boycott, Iran could reduce its oil production from the present 2.3-2.5 million barrels a day to 1.5 million barrels a day.

He told the German-Iranian Society in Bonn on Monday evening that this would be the "absolute minimum," however. He considers that with such a drastic reduction Iran will be forced to ask top prices for Iranian oil in order to guarantee food supplies for the population. He said that the present official Iranian recommended price of $35 per barrel (159 litres) of crude is already above the Rotterdam spot market price. Iran will then probably try, together with the "price hawks" Libya, Algeria and possible Nigeria, to force through a policy of top prices within OPEC.

PRESS COMMENTS ON OLYMPIC BOYCOTT, IRANIAN SANCTIONS

DW170938 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0505 GMT 17 Apr 80

[Press review]

[Text] AUGSBURGER ZEITUNG writes: The obvious impotence of the superpower United States and the pressure to which the Bonn government has been subjected demand that the sportsmen act politically. This can only mean not making the President of the United States the first Olympic loser, albeit with gritting teech. At the moment the solidarity of the Western world--and it is by far not Afghanistan alone that matters anymore--is not so much judged by the criterion of whether any ship carrying U.S. grain or IBM computers reaches the Soviet Union, but by the question of whether the Olympic games will take place as if nothing had happened or whether half the world will be absent. The leader of the Western world has put his prestige on the scales, and sports must foot the bill.

The following comment is from HANNOVERSCHE ALLGEMEINE ZEITUNG: The Western sports associations have an extremely hard time realizing that you cannot celebrate where there is torture and shooting. They voice outrage at politicians who force them to make a decision which they cannot muster the courage to make. What they want is games and, from the politicians, at best the funds for their sports. If the politicians are confronted with problems which they cannot solve with their instruments, they should not, please, bother sports, the finest immaterial matter in the world. This is the behavior of an ostrich, because sportsmen, too, are embedded in their political, and unfortunately unpeaceful environment. They cannot dodge their political and moral duty.

DIE WELT discusses the Iran conflict: Iran's strongman seems to feel really well at the moment, to go by what they are saying. The leading ayatollah praises the problems he has caused through the confrontation course with the United States like an elexir of life. And Hasan Habibi, the spokesman of the Revolution Council, feels real gusto when he declares that Iran is prepared for world war. The United States, says he who is prepared for war, should thoroughly ponder the question of whether it would not be worthwhile to survive. This sounds more like bravado than true strength. And some of it is probably attributable also to the highly inflammable national temperament of the Iranians. Yet their bragging should not gloss over the danger of the indeed obvious, irrational longing by leading revolutionaries to prove themselves in their hate for the civilized world of the United States and in overcoming this world, says DIE WELT.

Bremen's NORDSEE-ZEITUNG makes general reflections: It is symptomatic of the development of the past few weeks that measures are being taken about which experts say in the same breath that they will not do much good. This continues to hold true for the Olympic boycott, for the economic sanctions against Iran, and for the sanctions against the Soviet Union. Nevertheless, this game is joined more or less for reasons of solidarity with the allies, above all with the United States. No doubt about it, solidarity is vital for us. Still, it remains dangerous if action is taken beyond commonsense, through thick and thin, by hook or by crook, as it were. Then solidarity easily turns into Nibelungen loyalty. Yet, this was the catchword when World War I broke out.

STRAUSS VIEWS SCHMIDT'S NEGOTIATIONS PROPOSAL

[Manfred Schell interview with Franz Josef Strauss, Bavarian minister president and CDU/CSU chancellor candidate, in Bonn; date not given]

[Text] Welt: Mr Strauss, how do you assess the federal chancellor's new arms control proposal?

Strauss: It is not a new arms control proposal by the chancellor. It is a capitulation by Helmut Schmidt to Herbert Wehner.

Behind the foreign minister's back and with the chancellor's knowledge an authorized representative of Herbert Wehner conducted negotiations in Moscow recently. The result of these negotiations is the proposal, which really is not new but has long been publicized through all diplomatic and political channels, that the Brussels decision by NATO on an arms gap closure be cancelled and that disarmament negotiations be held with the Soviet Union for an indefinite number of years. The federal chancellor deliberately puts up with the fact that the Kremlin during this period can accelerate, unhindered, the development of its medium-range missile arsenal which is already a threat to Europe today.

This shows again Helmut Schmidt's duplicity, his yielding to the leftists in his own party, his shifting to a well-knit community with the opponents of the arms gap closure decision. Thus, the true character of the resolution adopted by the Berlin SPD congress on the issue is revealed. The criticism of this resolution voiced at the time by the CDU/CSU and especially by me was assessed as polemic and agitation by Helmut Schmidt and the SPD. Now Helmut Schmidt has done exactly what we predicted at the time. Therefore, Helmut Schmidt has practically become an opponent of this decision.

These statements by Helmut Schmidt are an open affront against NATO and an undisguised provocation against the United States. Thus Helmut Schmidt has become what he likes to consider others, a security risk.

WELT: Federal Foreign Minister Genscher has said that the arms gap closure decision made by NATO remains valid, making it clear that he does not support the chancellor's move.

Strauss. Either this is a marked double game between Schmidt and Genscher, with the one having to satisfy the Russians and the other the Americans, or there are no longer any genuine common interests between the chancellor and his deputy in the most important issue of our nation, namely, the preservation of our security, the safeguarding of peace and freedom. Genscher could only prove his credibility if he takes the consequences, or forces Helmut Schmidt to retreat.

WELT: How do you as candidate for chancellor assess the attitude of the federal chancellor and the federal foreign minister in the recent months of crisis?

Strauss: Since Afghanistan it has become clear that Genscher represents the foreign policy of the CDU/CSU here, makes smart statements in America and for America, while Helmut Schmidt makes lukewarm statements in America, recommends a policy contrary to Genscher's course, in speeches before his party with both then declaring their full harmony of views in public.

It is a scandal. It also cheats the electorate. It misleads the alliance partners.

Comments on Russian Attitude

LD162050 Hamburg DPA in German 1730 GMT 16 Apr 80

[Text] Duesseldorf--Regardless of the present international tensions, in the view of CSU Chairman Franz Josef Strauss, Soviet state and party chief Leonid Brezhnev, wants to avoid a major military conflict "almostat any price." He expressed this view in a conversation with the Duesseldorf RHEINISCHE POST, a summary of which was prereleased to DPA. Strauss said: "I am still banking on the Russians wishing to avoid a third world war." He called for a boycott of the Moscow Olympic games and said: "Sports must yield to the flag."

POLITICIANS COMMENT ON SCHMIDT'S DISARMAMENT PROPOSAL

[Text] Bonn--Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt's recent disarmament proposal remains a topic of discussion. Government Spokesman Armin Gruenewald and a German Foreign Office spokesman both told journalists, in reply to some critical questioning, that the chancellor and his foreign minister hold identical [deckungsgleich] views. Schmidt's suggestion that East and West should for some time refrain from placing medium-range nuclear missiles in Europe in no way impinges on the thin decisions taken by NATO last December.

Gruenewald conceded that the chancellor in his Essen speech, has injected a "new element." He said: "It does contain something new" and pointed out that it referred to a halt not only in the production but also in the deployment of medium-range nuclear missiles. While it is true that stopping production would be "even better", a decision not to "deploy" such weapons would nevertheless be something.

Diplomatic circles recalled that last fall Genscher repeatedly asked the Soviet Union through press statements and in the Bundestag, not to deploy new medium-range missiles.

SPD disarmament expert Alfons Pawelczyk accused Franz Josef Strauss of failing, by his criticism of the chancellor's proposal, to take seriously NATO's offer to negotiate with the Soviet Union on medium-range nuclear missiles and of frivolously risking an arms race in Europe. Pawelczyk told DPA that, for technical reasons, NATO cannot deploy new medium-range nuclear missiles for at least 3 years, so the arms control aspect of the NATO decision must be to the fore. He came out against the interpretation that the chancellor's proposal tends to "mitigate" this decision.

For the FDP, Juergen Moellemann emphasized the "complete agreement" between Schmidt and Genscher. To infer any departure from the NATO decisions, he said, is "absurd." It is irresponsible of Strauss to try and drive a wedge between the Federal Republic and its Western allies. In Moellemann's view, Schmidt's proposal takes up a suggestion made repeatedly last year by Genscher.

William Borm, a member of the FDP Executive, condemned Strauss's reaction as irresponsible and harmful to German security interests.

16 APR PAPERS REACT TO SCHMIDT DISARMAMENT PROPOSAL

DW161455 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0505 GMT 16 Apr 80

[Press review]

[Excerpts] WESTFAELISCHE RUNDSCHAU writes: While the two superpowers threaten to become deadlocked with each other in the Near and Middle East, the Europeans cannot do much more than make every effort to prevent commonsense from getting lost altogether in world politics, each European state for itself, in its own worlds and with its own possibilities. This is an extremely serious situation. Besides, whoever agrees that the Germans bear a special responsibility for world peace in view of their history will understand the chancellor's endeavor for patience and moderation by the Americans despite Afghanistan and especially Iran, just as he will understand his concern that the idea of disarmament might completely go to the dogs in view of the present confrontation ranging from the Olympic games to the Near and Middle East. Schmidt's initiative which is aimed at calling on the Americans at this particular time to ratify SALT II and on the Soviets to introduce a pause for thought in medium-range missile armament is, therefore, an almost desperate attempt to put up resistance to this development.

The Kassel HESSISCHE-NIEDERSAECHSISCHE ALLGEMEINE notes: Chancellor Schmidt suggests that both East and West introduce a pause, that is, interrrupt armament. A government spokesman calls this a constructive gesture, the coalition partner FDP shows irritation, and Chancellor Candidate Strauss speaks of treason. The word of the constructive gesture suits the state of facts best. After all, we must not forget that the Soviets have brusquely rejected negotiations on medium-range missiles and that month after month they deploy new SS-20 missiles targeted on Western Europe. NATO will need at least 3 years before the first improved missile will be ready for action. The principal addressee of the chancellor's message, therefore, is Moscow. Aside from that, what he had in mind was surely to mollify those in his party who have always objected to the arms gap closure and who derive additional arguments from the explosive world situation.

SCHWARZWAELDER BOTE of Oberndorf has this to say: Chancellor Schmidt's proposal that East and West refrain from stationing new medium-range missiles for a number of years and utilize this time for arms control negotiations, a proposal which at first was hardly noted, has suddenly moved into the center of discussion. After all, this suggestion by the chancellor sparks the quarrel between two schools of thought once again: the one which primarily seeks the weal of the Federal Republic in leaning closely on the United States, and the other which, with a view to detente, proceeds from the special interests of the old continent and, in doing so, occasionally also shows neutralist tendencies. Schmidt himself in his basic political attitude must be counted among the Atlantic advocates, but it may be assumed that he now wants to give at least some consolation to the rather Europe-oriented leftwing of his party which has to swallow some bitter pills with the Olympic boycott and the sanctions against Iran.

FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU's editorial reads in part: Comparisons are always lame. That also holds true for the comparison between 1914 and 1980, which hopefully is lame in both legs. Nevertheless, it does make sense for the chancellor to recall the conflict situation of the summer of 1914 which led to World War I even though none of the powers involved really wanted it. Surely one should not proclaim a national state of emergency rashly, and this also means refraining from immediately calling for a supraparty foreign policy whenever things become unpleasant in the world.

A democracy thrives on the clash of opinions, and not only in calm times. But a controversy of opinions is hard to keep separated from demagogy, and there are indeed limits at which a halt is in the national interest.

The LUDWIGSHAFEN DIE REHINPFALZ advocates the following view: Obviously the Kremlin still expects the determination to fill the dramatic gap in the field of medium-range weapons to peter out in the West and that the Warsaw Pact armed forces will retain their superiority in nuclear weapons delivery system in addition to their superiority in conventional arms, without having to develop any new, costly systems. If only because of the draft treaty on the limitation of nuclear armaments, SALT II, which has been put on ice, Moscow is bound to be most keenly interested in retaining the superiority in nuclear weapons technology in Europe. This is why the Bonn initiatives concerning negotiations and arms control policy will not meet with any echo, at least for the foreseeable future.

Essen's WESTDEUTSCHE ALLGEMEINE ZEITUNG says: It remains to be seen whether the Russians will react to it. In their case the stationing of new weapons has been in progress for quite a while now. In our case at least another 3 years will pass until similar weapons will be available at all. If it were possible to agree to try out a plan to stop deployment and possibly to extend it after 3 years if it turns out to be successful on both sides, then this may well be some encouragement for further negotiations.

DIE WELT CALLS FOR 'CLARIFICATION' OF SCHMIDT'S PROPOSAL

[Commentary signed W.H.-E.: "What Does Schmidt Want?"]

[Text] The occurrence is just as mysterious as it is unusual. In two public speeches toward the end of the week the chancellor made Moscow the offer "that both sides simultaneously refrain from deploying new or [illegible]ional medium-range weapons for a specific number of years and utilize this period [illegible]egotiations." The press, however, did not react to this initiative. But Schmidt wants his initiative brought to the light of public attention and therefore had the text distributed to the press yesterday. And then something highly unusual happened. Vice Chancellor and Federal Foreign Minister Genscher had the statement by the government chief corrected if not denied by the Foreign Ministry: It is not intended to change the attitude of the Federal Government; the NATO decision of December 1979 on closing the arms gap remains in force.

Being the chancellor's spokesman, Boelling, too, hurried to affirm that the NATO decisions continue to stand. In interpreting Schmidt's remarks he went so far as to formulate something contradictory. He said that by the six words "for a specific number of years" the chancellor "surely" means those 3 years which the United States needs for producing the medium-range missiles which are to be added in Europe under the NATO decision in the event arms control negotiations do not produce a positive result. This interpretation is contradictory because the chancellor has not advanced an offer to Moscow but demanded a unilateral concession from the Soviets. They should, please, desist from further enhancing their superiority in medium-range weapons in Europe for the duration of the period which the Western alliance must weather until the new missiles from U.S. production are available.

Had Schmidt only wanted to say this, then it would have been an exaggerated effort to disseminate his text post facto. Therefore, what is interesting in Boelling's remarks is actually only the confirmation that the chancellor probably took his initiative on his own, not having talked about it with anybody in the government or in NATO. [paragraph continues]

And this is exactly where the matter becomes cryptic: With whom, if not with his coalition partner Genscher and with the allies, did the chancellor discuss his offer which burdens the NATO decision with uncertainty at least as far as the time elements are concerned?

The occurrence urgently calls for clarification. For months the durability of the coalition in Bonn has not been guaranteed by the two parties, the SPD and the FDP, but solely by the Schmidt-Genscher team. Since this unilateral action by the chancellor it has come to seem as though the personal grip has also been exposed to erosion. In that case the last foundation of the Bonn government coalition would fall apart in the middle of the twin world political crisis of Afghanistan and Iran.

GDR's MITTAG ARRIVES FOR OFFICIAL VISIT

[Text] Hanover--Top GDR economic official Dr Guenter Mittag has arrived today at the 1980 Hanover Fair for a visit lasting several hours. The SED Politburo member arrived at Hanover-Langenhagen Airport in a special Interflug aircraft and was welcomed by Lower Saxony Finance Minister Walther Leisler Kiep.

A written statement by the GDR delegation says that Mittag wants to use the opportunity to discuss questions of trade between the GDR and the Federal Republic. "The GDR proceeds from the premise in this respect that what has been laid down in the treaty on the principles of mutual relations between the GDR and FRG is being implemented," according to the statement. Furthermore, he wants to see the fair and visit various exhibition stands.

At the fair Mittag visited the Krupp stand as well as other exhibitors from the Federal Republic, the Soviet Union, France, the GDR and other states. Later this afternoon he will go to Bonn where talks are scheduled with Federal Economics Minister Otto Graf Lambsdorff and Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt. On Thursday Mittag will visit a Krupp mining works in Duisburg and discuss plant construction with leading Krupp representatives.

Discussions With Bundestag Officials

LD170840 Hamburg DPA in German 0753 GMT 17 Apr 80

[Text] Bonn--Guenter Mittag, member of the Socialist Unity Party of Germany Central Committee Politburo, today held separate talks with the FDP and SPD parliamentary floor leaders, Wolfgang Mischnick and Herbert Wehner.

They discussed the continuation of relations between both German states and the effects of the international crises surrounding Afghanistan and Iran. Mittag will also meet Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt later this morning.

Following Mittag's meeting with Mischnick it was learned from the FDP side that both politicians had advocated the continuation of the policy of detente between East and West as well as the expansion of economic relations between both German states. Economic cooperation was discussed last night with Federal Economics Minister Otto Graf Lambsdorff.

Received by Schmidt

LD171028 Hamburg DPA in German 0848 GMT 17 Apr 80

[Excerpt] Bonn--Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt today received Guenter Mittag, member of the Socialist Unity Party of Germany Central Committee Politburo. According to government circles the chancellor will explain to the GDR politician the Federal Government's motives for its policy in connection with the international crises in Iran and Afghanistan. LAMBSDORFF COMMENTS ON TRADE WITH EAST EUROPE

[Text] Bonn--Federal Economics Minister Otto Graf Lambsdorff has emphasized that in the event of a possible restriction on supplies of strategically important goods to the USSR the other Eastern bloc countries, and especially intra-German trade, would not be affected. Speaking in the Bundestag today in the debate on the annual economic report he said that "there are no differences of opinion whatsoever between ourselves and the United States." He announced at the same time that in a few weeks he will visit Hungary and Romania for economic talks.

Lambsdorff also spoke about his meeting last night with the leading GDR economic politician Guenter Mittag, which he described as "constructive and sensible." Both sides are interested in an expansion of economic relations. There is fundamental agreement that economic and political relations contribute toward peaceful togetherness, but that they cannot replace peaceful coexistence and peace generally.

Lambsdorff pointed out that talks are currently taking place on the supply of further complete plant from the Federal Republic to the GDR. The development of intra-German trade so far is described by both sides as satisfactory. In spite of world economic difficulties in 1979 trade between both German states has expanded.

Lambsdorff said that at his talks in Bonn Mittag gave the assurance that the GDR will not permit violations of the rules of intra-German trade, as has taken place in the case of imports of cheap textiles from third countries, and that the GDR will take the relevant punitive steps. In Lambsdorff's words that was a "helpful statement," because such violations could threaten the whole substance of intra-German trade. Neither Bonn nor the GDR are interested in this.

FRANCOIS-PONCET ADVISES 'MODERATE TONE' TOWARD USSR

[Text] FRG Chancellor Helmut Schmidt believes that one should use a moderate tone with the Soviet Union and that it would be dangerous to use a stronger tone. This is also the opinion of French Minister Jean Francois-Poncet, who opened the foreign policy debate in the National Assembly this morning. Mr Francois-Poncet outlined France's position on the events in Afghanistan and on France's relations with the Soviet Union:

[Begin Francois-Poncet recording] Dialogue is never more essential than in a period of crisis. Certainly talks alone are not enough for understanding one another and I do not claim they are. But by renouncing them one loses even the possibility of making oneself understood. France has things to say to the Soviet Union. There is no doubt that there is no one in a better position than France to make it understood that it is up to the Soviet Union to take the necessary measures to reestablish relaxation and to show the USSR the risks that it would be taking by going father along the path on which it has embarked. What was presented as a limited and temporary action on 27 December is becoming a massive and permanent operation. [end recording]

This theme will certainly be at the heart of the talks which Mr Gromyko, the minister of foreign affairs, will have in Paris next week. This visit, which is an important one, comes within the framework of the annul consultations between the foreign ministers of the two countries as stipulated in the protocol signed by Leonid Brezhnev and Georges Pompidou in 1970.

EQUESTRIAN FEDERATION REVIEWS MOSCOW OLYMPICS STAND

NC161204 Paris AFP in English 1153 GMT 16 Apr 80

[Text] Paris, April 16 (AFP)--The French Equestrian Federation (FEF) is to review its participation in the Moscow games, Federation President Christian Legrez told a press conference here today. The FEF have officially heard from their counterparts in the United States, Britain, West Germany and Switzerland and unofficially from Canada that they would not be taking part at Moscow, he revealed.

"The FEF has been called upon to consider the participation of a French team in the three disciplines scheduled for Moscow," he said. "A competition which is evolving very clearly towards a kind of spartakiad diminishes the quality and standing of the Olympic games."

Mr Legrez said he would be informing his colleagues of the situation in order to take the correct decision.

Mr Legrez's statement was the first official French reaction to last weekend's news that the United States National Olympic Committee were to boycott the games. The French Government had previously said it would not call for a boycott and that it was up to the various French sports federations to make up their own minds.

Decision Not To Go

LD170858 Paris Domestic Service in French 0600 GMT 17 Apr 80

[Summary] The French Equestrian Federation has just decided that its members will not go to the Olympic games in Moscow. The news has caused quite a stir among sportsmen.

LE MONDE: TRANSATLANTIC CRISIS NOT A NEW PHENOMENON

[Editorial: "Transatlantic Crisis"]

[Text] Although it is no exaggeration to describe the present state of transatlantic relations as a "crisis" it would be wrong to regard this as a new phenomenon. The various recent international crises have merely revived a malaise which has always been latent and which has gradually been aggravated in recent years by the changes which have taken place on the world scene.

The Atlantic pact was founded more than 30 years ago on the basis of a de facto situation--the overwhelming superiority of the United States in a world which had just been divided into two blocs--and with a basic goal: to prevent a direct attack by the USSR on Western Europe. Relations within this alliance remained extremely unstable, but Europe, in exchange for the protection offered, did not really have any alternative than to accept the faits accomplis--usually military--imposed by the Americans: easily in Korea but with more difficulty in Vietnam, the latter war being another argument for General de Gaulle to move away from the Atlantic organization.

The weakening of U.S. positions has radically altered this situation: On the economic plane the European revival, contrasting with the dollar's weakness and falling productivity in the United States, has led to an increase in the old continent's political influence and to the diversification of its interests in a world which has become multipolar. On the military plane the increase in Soviet power is increasingly deterring the United States from reacting with as much strength as before even where its interests are directly threatened. So far Washington has replaced its former gunboat diplomacy by economic and diplomatic sanctions, but this approach can only really be effective if other countries join in. The present paradox is that the United States has more need of its allies at a time when they have every reason to regard its policy as less "credible."

For instance, when the affair first started the European governments, especially the French Government, would very probably have turned a blind eye to the unilateral use of force by the Americans to release their hostages from Tehran. No such action was carried out and U.S. allies are being presented with increasingly peremptory demands for sanctions which they do not really believe will be effective and which would, in addition, damage their interests. In the face of their reticence Mr Carter went so far as to appeal directly to public opinion over the heads of the European governments which, moreover, are being indirectly held responsible for a possible U.S. military intervention; it is doubtful, however, that the average European, despite the legitimate sympathy he feels for the U.S. hostages, will be prepared to show himself to be "more American than the average American," or even as American as he.

The Afghan crisis has demonstrated a similar phenomenon: The Europeans had grown used to basing their security on a combination of deterrence--essentially American--and political detente--mainly national. [paragraph continues]

They are worried by the idea of this second element being endangered while the Americans are seeking their support in "punishing" Moscow by nonmilitary means. The loud protestations of pro-American solidarity heard in the most loyal capitals, such as London and Bonn, may contrast with the political-juridical quibbling indulged in by Paris. However, even they could not replace the decisive action demanded by Washington nor overshadow this fundamental problem: The Atlantic edifice built to counter postwar tensions is finding it difficult to withstand the tensions of the eighties.

LE FIGARO SEES U.S., EUROPE CAUGHT IN IRAN 'TRAP'

LD161405 Paris LE FIGARO in French 14 Apr 80 pp 1, 5

[Serge Maffert article: "A Two-Way Trap"]

[Text] There is something both pathetic and absurd in the moral pressures exerted by the United States on its European and Japanese allies to make them impose sanctions against Iran. Pathetic because President Carter appears to be thrashing about in a political and electoral trap, and absurd because whenever he acts he seems, as they say, to miss the target.

When the United States was a great power, that is, before Watergate and before Congress and the U.S. East Coast press deliberately weakened the executive, Washington used to show neither this kind of mawkishness with respect to events nor this kind of emotionality in relation to its allies. President Carter's problem lies not only in his nature and capabilities but in the fact that he is, as it were, heir to Watergate, with the inhibitions, self-reproach and impulses which this entails.

The enormous political blunder which the Soviet Union made by brutally occupying Afghanistan gave the United States some unique opportunities--in Pakistan, Iran and the Near East. A series of political errors, indecision and lack of determination have in the end deprived Carter of a resounding diplomatic victory throughout the Islamic world and, consequently, in the entire sphere of East-West relations.

In Iran, for instance, where the Kabul coup had aroused great anxiety, it was necessary to admit past "mistakes" as well as the facts that Iran had been used as a military base and that the shah had been given too much support, and to propose a new basis for relations. Carter had certain advantages which could have insured success: He is an upright, honest and God-fearing man. He could have convinced not only the Iranians but all Muslims that a new era was within reach. However, he has acted in such a way that it looks as if the USSR may well again appear as Islam's champion despite Afghanistan.

And what about Europe? Together with the United States it has been involved in a big and continuous game in which world peace is at stake. It is being said that solidarity between Europe and the United States is a duty. It is also and above all a necessity. But solidarity in effectiveness, not in error.

This means that whenever the United States is either "impeded" or paralyzed, Europe must take over and try to do what the Americans have been unable to do. Independent action by Europe does not have to be inconsistent with U.S. interests. On the contrary, it can be an indispensable complement to these interests.

However, in the present case, Europe, that is the governments of European countries, does not deserve any congratulations. Whether or not it participates in any sanctions, which will remain ineffective anyway, is not the real problem. What it could rightly be blamed for is that since the seizure of the hostages in November 1979 the Europeans have wasted valuable time and have failed adequately to recognize the seriousness of the crisis resulting from this seizure. In short, apart from some discreet moves, they have done nothing.

As a result, they have been caught in a trap, just like Carter. If the Nine yield to the American appeals they will lose Iranian oil and quarrel, at least to a certain extent, with the Islamic world. And if they refuse to impose sanctions, Carter will first cut Iran's oil route. As for what will follow....

In the end and after playing for time, the Europeans, albeit unwillingly, will follow America, dragging their feet. All this does not amount to a policy. However, Europe and the United States will be able to say: "We do not know where we are going but wherever it is we are going together."

'IMPERIALIST SOLIDARITY' EXPECTED AGAINST IRAN

[Dominique Pari commentary: "A Discreet Sharing of Roles"]

[Text] The sanctions taken on Monday by Mr Carter against Iran and the constant threats of military intervention against that country--only recently liberated from the yoke of dictatorship--reveal only too clearly Washington's policy, which endangers peace. Deaf to the Iranian people's legitimate claims, the U.S. Government has preferred to take escalation one step higher.

But Mr Carter does not intend to be alone in this crusade against Tehran, which resists in the name of its national independence. He made this known by means particularly his own: pressure. "We hope," a high level White House official stated, "that our allies will understand that it is in their best interest to work with us rather than force us to take unilateral decisions which could involve extra risks for them." You could not be any clearer than that.

U.S. diplomats serving in Western capitals--particularly in Paris--have not been slow in taking the appropriate measures. While it was being announced yesterday that the U.S. nuclear aircraft carrier "Eisenhower" was preparing to leave its base at Norfolk, Virginia, to join the 24 U.S. warships cruising in the warm waters of the Arabian Sea-Persian Gulf, the White House was officially asking the EEC to support the U.S. action. It even expressed the wish that the European Community act as though the 13 January UN Security Council resolution had been adopted. This text envisaged in particular breaking off economic exchanges with Iran, and was rejected by virtue of the Soviet veto.

What will be the French Government's answer to such urgent entreaties? The silence of these last 48 hours is disturbing.

Last December France yielded to Washington's demands to "freeze" Tehran's property in Eurodif [European Diffusion Agency]. Mr Giscard d'Estaing did not prohibit U.S. banks from "freezing" Iranian deposits in their French branches, as our country's laws permit.

There have already been the remarks of Mr Poniatowski, the president's close adviser, regretting the "late" nature of Mr Carter's measures, which leave one to suppose that the Giscard government is ready to align itself once more with Washington.

This will not displease the newspaper of Mr Hersant [publisher of LE FIGARO] which broadly echoed the White House's "entreaties" yesterday morning. Under the title "The Effective Method," LE FIGARO purely and simply preached an anti-Iran crusade under the U.S. flag. Nevertheless, as the editorialist of this daily recognized, these measures, "on the contrary," will not hasten the hostages' release.

The key to the real political motives guiding Western leaders is to make the Iranian people eat dirt for being guilty of ridding themselves of a dictatorship which these same leaders supported to its last breath.

Speaking not without Machiavellianism on Europe 1 radio, Alain Duhamel lists the "pros and cons" of alignment--certainly not in the interests of the French and Iranian peoples, but in the name of effectiveness. In Mr Duhamel's view, "If it is clear that the most categorical censure of Iran is implicit, if it is no less clear that it would be discourteous and even offensive to replace the goods that Iran is going to lack by European, Japanese, Canadian or Australian products, it would not be very clever for the Europeans to burn their bridges completely and push Iran toward Moscow...." "If there is to be no obvious and clumsy discord between Washington and its allies, a discreet sharing of roles would doubtless be useful."

All this within the most total imperialist solidarity in which France, by virtue of the Giscard government, would again participate.

GOVERNMENT CENSURES ISRAELI INCURSION INTO LEBANON

LD161501 Paris LE MONDE in French 13-14 Apr 80 p 2

[Unattributed report: "Paris 'Can Only Deplore' Israeli Military Action in South Lebanon"]

[Excerpt] The Quai d'Orsay criticized Israel on 11 April for setting up advanced defensive positions in South Lebanon after the Palestinian attack on the frontier kibbutz of Misqav 'Am, in which the Israelis suffered 3 dead and 16 wounded. A Quai d'Orsay spokesman stated: "We can only deplore the Israeli action which can do nothing but complicate still further the task of the 'blue helmets' of the interim force in Lebanon." He recalled meanwhile that, at the beginning of the week, France had condemned the attack on the Misqav 'Am kibbutz and that it still adheres to respect for Lebanese sovereignty and territorial integrity.

BULGARIAN, CUBAN SUPPORT FOR MARCHAIS CITED

[Unattributed report: "International Support Against the Plot"]

[Excerpts] The violent campaign against Georges Marchais and the PCF has aroused an energetic response from thousands of working people who have added their protest to that of the PCF's organizations and of numerous prominent people. There is no lack of foreign support, either, and we now publish a new series of messages to Georges Marchais and the PCF from foreign communist parties:

Todor Zhivkov, first secretary of the Bulgarian Communist Party [BCP] Central Committee, states in his message to Georges Marchais that "the Bulgarian Communists react indignantly to the odious slander campaign against the PCF and against you, its secretary general.

"The political aims of these lies are clear. They aim at striking a blow against the PCF, which is the loyal and consistent defender of the French working people. Condemning this slander campaign personally and on behalf of the BCP Central Committee, I express our warm class solidarity with you."

The Cuban Communist Party Central Committee states: "We are aware of the slanderous campaign unleashed by the forces of reaction and imperialism to undermine the prestige and authority of Georges Marchais, your party's secretary general, in the eyes of the working people's party and the French people.

"Cubans are not surprised at such methods, which conceal the fear created by the firm and clear position of the PCF and of Comrade Georges Marchais in the struggle against the reactionary forces and against the imperialist schemes which seek to return the world to the cold war times, which would have unforeseeable consequences for mankind's future.

"This campaign is inspired, moreover, by the deep-seated anticommunist hatred felt by the representatives of society's most retrogressive forces, which try by every means to halt the struggle of the working class and other progressive forces.

"The working people and people of France will not be fooled by those who have never struggled for their legitimate interests. We are firmly convinced that truth will triumph and that the PCF will emerge strengthened and victorious from this new confrontation with the forces of reaction and imperialism.

"On this occasion, as ever, we give you the expression of our firmest solidarity."

'EUROLEFT' SEEN AS TACTIC SERVING IMPERIALISM

LD151157 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 11 Apr 80 pp 1,8

[Francette Lazard article: "Euroleft or Euroconsensus?"]

[Text] I do not know whether the socialist Mr Cheysson and the reactionary Mr Davignon met recently to prepare for the coming European summit. But, as usual, Chancellor H. Schmidt will play the leading role with the active assistance of President Giscard d'Estaing who, without being a social democrat, is nevertheless his friend.

Euroleft? Euroright? The West German Social Democratic foreign minister states that they must "immunize the Third World against communist influence." A fitting echo, you will agree, to F. Mitterrand's remarks on the need to apply the "safety catch" on the development of Comintern.

For its part, LE MONDE asserts that "by rejecting the Euroleft notion, the PCF has consummated the split with Eurocommunism to which it has finally committed itself...."

In other words, by rejecting the "Euroleft," the PCF has put Eurocommunism in doubt along with the advances made by recent congresses, the prospect for union and for change, and for self-governing, democratic socialism.

Far from it....

Let us return to the fundamental questions of the 23d congress: Is there a possible way out of the crisis in France and in the present international conditions? If so, what are its prospects and how can they be opened up?

Exactly 1 year ago the preparatory discussion at the congress emphasized the need to avoid isolating the question of the union and change in France, the analysis of the crisis and the development of the world correlations of strength. That is, of the socialist countries' role in its development, of the actions of the emancipation movement, of the peoples and of imperialism's counteroffensive.

Developing the implications of the 22d congress, the 23d outlined the prospects for self-governing socialism by showing why and how all the possibilities for concrete progress in the struggles could be seized immediately.

Thus you can see quite clearly the reasons which turn what is now called Eurocommunism into a deceptive impasse at a time when, more than ever before, the alternative is a way out of the crisis which is a real attack on the domination of big capital. This is an alternative unprecedented in a highly developed country and is without any previous parallel.

Courage Not Caution

The rejection of any kind of model, whatever it may be, is in this respect inseparable from the desire to grasp all the details in all their complexity of the movement throughout the world and in French society.

And this in order to define more clearly the lines of force of democratic and revolutionary transformations which we do not intend renouncing, while the crisis makes them current in France as the only possible response to the material and human destruction of the capitalist regime. "Our proposals are ambitious," G. Marchais underlined in his report to the congress, "but we are dealing with no ordinary crisis. We will not truly overcome it or make progress by enclosing ourselves in old schemes and by submitting to the laws of the existing system.

"The crisis calls for new answers. It demands not caution but courage. It is precisely for this reason that we will not postpone the necessary changes."

By insisting thus on the originality of the self-governing socialism that we are proposing, G. Marchais recalled--along with Eurocommunism--the convergence of that approach with that of the other communist parties which have placed the development of democracy in the middle of the road to socialism which they proposed for their respective countries. Despite the prophets who have announced its death, he noted (already!) this present approach will last because it stems simultaneously from the acceptance by all of the universal, democratic demands of socialism and the analogies which exist between those countries dominated by big capital and subject to profound crisis.

THE QUESTION OF A WAY OUT OF THE CRISIS IS THUS POSED, AND POSED MOREOVER AT THE VERY HEART OF THE SPHERE OF IMPERIALIST DOMINATION IN A COUNTRY WHICH, IN THE CASE OF FRANCE, COUNTS AMONG THE FOREMOST IN THE WORLD. UNDER THESE CONDITIONS, HOW CAN IT BE IMAGINED THAT ALL THE FORCES ON WHICH BIG CAPITAL CAN STILL GAMBLE WILL NOT MOBILIZE TO PREVENT PROGRESS IN THIS DIRECTION? [capitalized passage in italics in original]

Neither the Thirties Nor the Fifties

At the same time, you can understand the situation now is not comparable with either the thirties or the fifties.

Since what is at stake is the possibility or otherwise of moving toward transformations of historic scope, toward a new type of growth, a new world political and economic order and a new civilization, by making democracy the means and the end of the progress of the class struggles.

When we reject the idea of a "Euroleft" brought to the baptismal font by the Socialist International, we are not rejecting a future prospect but an impasse, since we are obliged to establish the part played by the Socialist International at present in the counteroffensive of imperialism's leading circles, by saying that we are not giving way to a dogmatic or sly vision which would conceal a rejection of the possible developments.

Impasse and Blank Windows

The 23d congress resolution explained it in these terms: "Insofar as it influences a section of the working classes in the direction of change and claims kinship with socialism, (social democracy) cannot remain insensible to the development of social and democratic struggles, particularly in the countries where communist parties exist, act and develop. But characteristic of its development since 1974-1975 is its active participation in the counteroffensive strategy of the forces of capital. The activity of the Socialist International testifies to this as much by its orientation as by its intensity."

By permitting the dominating forces of the big bourgeoisie to stabilize their foundations and to develop their political maneuvers, this strategy strengthens the overall disposition of imperialism and its attempt to enclose each country in a supranational halter which will prevent any original step forward, any national solution and thus, in our time, any real solution.

But in a country like ours this strategy implies the quest for blank windows, especially when the truth begins to appear. F. Mitterrand's busy search for a leftwing guarantee, by meeting with E. Berlinguer in Strasbourg before going to Santo Domingo to state his intention to cut off communism at the root, shows a certain feverishness at the very least.

Against this dead end, this national decline and Euroconsensus, the French Communists are employing all their forces to keep open, by struggle, the prospect of union and change, the national and democratic solution whose realism and necessity was demonstrated by the 23d congress.

Which is why the question of their influence and the development of their capacity to act is now a major question in France on which the nation's entire future depends.

L'HUMANITE HITS MITTERRAND'S 'DENUNCIATION' OF COMMUNISM

LD150917 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 3 Apr 80 p 1

[Rene Andrieu editorial: "The Conquest of the West"]

[Text] The great information media have shown a remarkable discretion over Francois Mitterrand's speech at the Santo Domingo Socialist International. Has he organized this conspiracy of silence himself? Was he unaware--as is likely--that a L'HUMANITE journalist, our Havana correspondent, was in Santo Domingo?

This is not the first Socialist International at which he has made comments whose outspokenness he has tried to dilute for obvious electoral reasons. [paragraph continues]

You will recall that in Vienna in 1972, the very day after signing the joint program, he crudely justified the Union of the Left by the need to take 2 million votes from us.

The Socialist Party [PS] daily newsheet accuses us of distorting Francois Mitterrand's stance. In fact it confirms that the latter made not the slightest reference to the Union of the Left--with which he claims kinship in France--and that he indeed proclaimed his intention to combat communism, in his view, the destroyer of human rights.

What this modestly omits to emphasize is that F. Mitterrand denounced communist societies as "another form of imperialism" and that, carried away by his own enthusiasm, he placed the Pinochet and Videla dictatorships side by side with Fidel Castro's regime.

You can measure F. Mitterrand's drift to the right by recalling his statements during his official visit to Havana in 1974: "In the vast collective effort by which Cuba is carving its own road toward socialism, its people are setting an example of steadfastness, generosity and a love of life which can only have a profound effect on French socialists." (LE MONDE 23 October 1974). Or again, this assessment of Castro: "A modest man who wants to be understood, open and generous in search of a new ethic." Or again, this passage from the communique where "the Socialist delegation (affirms that it) has managed to establish Cuba's dynamic and often exemplary role in promoting justice and dignity in international relations" (LE MONDE 24 October 1974).

Well? When was F. Mitterrand telling the truth? Now or then? Or never? But perhaps the fraternal sympathy he formerly showed toward Cuban socialism was simply intended to carry off a few leftwing votes.

Especially since you will note the same scale of variation in assessments of the other socialist countries. Let us recall the words of the PS delegation (led by F. Mitterrand) to Hungary in May 1976: "The PS delegation was favorably impressed by the Hungarian people's success in building socialism under the leadership of the working class and its party." And the same F. Mitterrand on the Soviet Union: "We are concerned and excited by the admirable effort of a people who, for 50 years, have gradually reconstructed their way of life. Especially since their revolution was based on analyses close to our own" (Luxembourg Radio-Television, 19 April 1975).

Now he accuses the socialist countries of "destroying basic freedoms" and calls for "the safety catch to be put on Comintern." He thus associates quite naturally once more with the old language of the classic right and prepares a new alliance with it, forgetting former commitments and deliberately turning his back on the Union of the Left.

Under these conditions you will not be surprised that he and his friends stand beside Giscard d'Estaing and Washington on all the great international questions, whether it concerns in particular the deployment of new U.S. missiles in Europe or the situation in Kampuchea, Iran or Afghanistan. Aside from the clash of personalities presently shaking the PS, its leaders are in agreement on this strategy which, if left unchecked, would inevitably lead the democratic movement into an impasse. The other evening at the "Press Club," Pierre Mauroy shrewdly exhumed the facetious remarks of his great ancestors and accused the communists of being not on the left but in the East. To pay it back as it deserves, the Socialist Party is firmly encamped in the West, even the far West.

PLO DENIES SUPPLYING RED BRIGADES WITH WEAPONS

[Text] Rome, April 16 (ANSA)--The Palestine Liberation Organization today hotly denied having supplied Italy's "Red Brigades" terrorists with weapons or having any contact with the urban guerillas as alleged in statements attributed to the "repentant (?Brigade soldier") [word indistinct] Peci, captured February 19 in Turin. The PLO statement was contained in an official communique released in Italy by representatives of the organization.

According to [words indistinct] picked up by the Italian press, Peci has told investigators that all the arms of various national origin used by "Brigade" members in a series of [words indistinct] over the past few years came directly from Palestinian sources. In relation to the spring 1978 kidnapping of Christian Democrat Party Chairman Aldo Moro, the killing of his five-man police escort and the slaying of the statesman, Peci is said to have declared that Mario Moretti, thought to be the brains behind the operation and still at large, travelled to the Middle East one year before the spectacular terrorist act was staged.

The PLO communique released today declared that, "The PLO, (?through) the statement of its chairman, Yasir 'Arafat, has declared its firm (?condemnation) of terrorism in Italy, considering it a threat to democracy and an instrument for strengthening reactionary and subversive forces.

"Especially at the time of the kidnapping of Christian Democrat Party Chairman Aldo Moro", the communique continued, "who we always considered as our friend in that he was the first European government figure to express solidarity with the Palestinian people, Yasir 'Arafat appealed for his liberation".

Today's PLO document also recalled that the organization "expressed its complete willingness to undertake any attempt which the Italian authorities felt would be useful for freeing Moro". The communique also underscored the "total disassociation of [words indistinct] (?with this affair and the complete willingness to cooperate with) [words indistinct], pointed out in the communique [words indistinct] in the Middle East and especially in Lebanon" as well as in other areas of the world. "For this reason," the statement concluded, "we have called on all the forces (?committed to) [words indistinct] to cooperate and step up efforts to combat terrorism".

BERLINGUER PREVIEWS PRC TRIP, DISCUSSES EUROCOMMUNISM

[Unattributed report: "Berlinguer on Television Discusses China Visit, Eurocommunism"]

[Text] Rome--On the eve of his visit to China, Comrade Enrico Berlinguer was interviewed yesterday evening on television Channel One's "Tam Tam" newsreel program. The main issues discussed were relations with the CCP and Eurocommunism.

With regard to the Beijing visit he said that relations between the parties are resuming after a period characterized partly by fairly harsh polemics. This doesnot mean that there are no longer any disagreements, but it is very important that they can now be discussed frankly in an effort of understanding. In Beijing there will be discussions on relations between the parties but also on the overall world situation, its dangers and tensions.

With regard to the PCI's internationalist outlook, Berlinguer explained that the PCI considers it necessary to consider the overall alignment of peace-loving and liberation forces, of which the communist parties are an important but not exclusive part. In particular, the PCI believes that it is in the fundamental interests of the West European workers movement to establish positive relations with Third World revolutionary movements. This, bearing in mind the great lesson of history, namely that the roads to liberation are manifold and often unprecedented (and in this context he pointed to the examples of Iran, Nicaragua and Zimbabwe).

Berlinguer also explained that in Beijing there will be discussion on the tensions and conflicts among the socialist countries, stressing that the PCI favors a solution to the Kampuchean issue based on self-determination and, at the same time, favors a relaxation of tension between China and Vietnam.

With reference to the PCI's refusal to attend the Paris conference, Berlinguer explained yet again that this is due to the fact that we were confronted with a unilateral decision by the PCF and Polish United Workers Party and an abandonment of the principle of consensus and collegial preparation by the participants. Furthermore, the conference is mistaken in limiting to just the communist parties the forces available for the detente and disarmament struggle. The Eurocommunist outlook, however, (that is, the democratic building of a West European form of coalition) embodies the quest for an understanding and unitary relations with the other components of the European workers movement and with the advanced Catholic forces. This does not mean that we are moving toward social democratic stances, from which we stand apart explicitly, but we do take into account the strength and stances of these worker-based parties.

With regard to the PCF's foreign policy stances, the Italian Communists' disagreement concerns the process of European unification which the PCI determinedly supports, naturally with a view to a thorough regeneration and an autonomous European role in the world to assist the resumption of the dialogue between the two major powers and cooperation with the emergent peoples.

L'UNITA ON SITUATION AT PERUVIAN EMBASSY IN CUBA

LD150835 Milan L'UNITA in Italian 9 Apr 80 p 16

[Unattributed commentary: "Most Obvious Answer Is Not Conclusive"]

[Text] Why do they want to leave? The simplest, the easiest and basically the most reassuring answer is as follows: They are the ones who refuse to shoulder the burden of the effort implicit in building a new kind of society; they are the "antisocial" ones, the ones dazzled by the lures of capitalist society, consumerism, the illusion of easy money, the nostalgia for lost privileges and so forth. There is some truth in such an answer--how can one deny it? How can one forget the conditions from which Cuba started, the tragic heritage of poverty, exploitation and death? How can one forget the immense difficulties of a country whose economy was based on the single-crop cultivation of sugarcane bound to U.S. interests and which is still striving to build even a minimal industrial apparatus and to convert its agriculture? How can one forget that the option for literacy, with the social costs and priorities which it demands, implies in those specific conditions very major sacrifices in other directions--and this is just one example?

And we are not talking about the distant past. Unfortunately, this applies to the present as well. Though nobody has mentioned it in the past few days' commentaries, even after 20 years the U.S. economic blockade is still affecting Cuba. But anyone wanting to assess the tasks facing a revolution--not for socialism, even, but simply for democracy and independence--in Latin America could easily refer to Nicaragua, El Salvador or the conditions of the people of Honduras or Guatemala. The list is a long one.

Having said this, as one is dutybound to do, there remains the need to explore every possible aspect of an affair such as this, because the simplest answer is not the conclusive one, yet again. It is difficult to dismiss the problem with the contemptuous remark: They are antisocial. There are over 7,000 of them and of course they are only part--the most visible part--of a composite and diversified world of people who want to leave a country which plans to build a new kind of society.

The questions which arise are many. Even events such as this pose the problem of a reassessment of schemes, models, forms of organization and management of the economy, the politics and image of the state, at a time such as the present, when the entire world is having to face unprecedented dilemmas. Has the time not come, perhaps, for everyone to reflect on what more and what else socialism--in whatever situation it is being built--can give, to respond to the profound changes underway on the world scene and in the peoples' awareness? As far as we are concerned and without wanting to lecture anyone, we h e been asking ourselves these questions for a long time.

FIAT MANAGER COMMENTS ON U.S. PARTS FOR IRAQ FRIGATES

[Text] Turin, April 16 (ANSA)--"Nothing has changed" in the American authorization to the FIAT auto group to buy American-made parts for the turbines needed to power four frigates which Italy hopes to sell to Iraq, according to a high-ranking FIAT executive here.

Speaking with journalists yesterday, the managing-director of the FIAT aviation division, Giancarlo Boffetta, said that the Washington Commerce Department's authorization for the parts to be used in the eight LM-2500 engines had been confirmed "as late as (this) Monday".

His statement followed rumors that Washington had vetoed the sale of the vessels, the deal, which involves another six naval units, has still to be finalized and, to date, there is only an "agreement of understanding" between Italy and Iraq.

According to Boffetta, American authorization was in any case needed only for the parts of the turbine produced by the U.S. firm, General Electric. Authorization for the American-made parts was granted on January 23 and lasts until January next year--"more than enough to acquire the American material and fully corresponding to FIAT's own requests", Boffetta commented.

"At the American Commerce Department, FIAT openly declared the turbines' final destination" Boffetta added.

The total value of the turbines, including spare parts and personnel training, is about 25 billion lire, of which the Italian share is seventy percent. The IM-2500 turbines were originally designed to power planes, but FIAT aviation has adapted them for naval use.

ENVOY DEFENDS HUNGARY'S ATTITUDE TOWARD ROMAN CATHOLICS

LD151117 Milan L'UNITA in Italian 2 Apr 80 p 15

[Unattributed report: "Hungarian Ambassador's Rome Press Conference"]

[Text] Rome--An initial, polite answer to John Paul II, who last Sunday reintroduced the old formula of the "church of silence," came yesterday from the Hungarian ambassador in Italy. Questioned in this connection by a journalist, Ambassador Palotas said that the expression "church of silence" is not valid for Hungary. He detailed the various stages in the normalization of relations between the People's Republic of Hungary and the Holy See, pointing to Kadar's visit to the Vatican, the Catholics' role in Hungarian society, the freedoms they enjoy and the recent award of the top state honor to Cardinal Lekai, primate of Hungary.

During a frank conversation with journalists, the Hungarian Government's representative discussed the conclusions reached by the recent Hungarian Socialist Workers Party congress, emphasizing in particular the economic options within the framework of international trends and domestic requirements. Palotas confirmed Hungary's aspiration to open its doors to the world economy and thus to strengthen economic relations with Western Europe, and explained that Budapest wants to move beyond mere trade relations and to intensify economic cooperation. "Our options," he said, "are characterized by realism in both domestic and foreign policy."

NEW SOCIALIST MINISTERS ON AIMS IN GOVERNMENT

LD161033 [Editorial Report] Rome AVANTI in Italian on 6-7 April carries on pages 2-3 brief statements by all the Socialist ministers in the new Italian Government, outlining their priority aims. Scientific Research Minister Vincenzo Balzamo singles out the Italian automobile industry's good prospects, "on condition," he says, "that technological innovations are accelerated as a priority." Foreign Trade Minister Enrico Manca says the priority in his field must be "to take consistent and coherent political options primarily with respect to the developing countries, helping, by means of an Italian initiative, to make European policy in this direction more decisive and comprehensive." Defense Minister Lelio Lagorio says that his appointment as the first Socialist to occupy the post has "a special political significance which is worth emphasizing." He adds that his task will be "to assist the processes of modernization and democratization that are underway" in the ministry.

COMMENTARY ON U.S. PRESSURE ON EUROPE FOR IRAN SANCTIONS

[Joao Soares commentary]

[Text] Washington is engaged in a drive to persuade its European allies and Japan to break diplomatic relations with Iran and apply economic sanctions against Iran if the Tehran hostages are not released soon by a specific date. President Carter believes that such an allied alignment with measures already adopted by the United States will represent a final and indispensable effort to secure the release of the American hostages and, at the same time, will serve as a final warning to the Iranian rulers that Washington is prepared to resort to force if the hostage problem is not quickly solved.

This gradual hardening of the American stance is not unrelated to the evolution of the U.S. primaries which, at the moment, are still going favorably for Carter despite the threatening momentum gained by Ronald Reagan, who looks certain to be his Republican opponent in the elections this fall.

Certain observers are already tipping Reagan as the favorite for the presidency and the recent sudden rise in his ratings is believed to be largely due to the fact that American public opinion is beginning to find the moderation and patience shown by Carter to be unacceptable in the face of the endless delaying tactics on the question of the hostages' release.

The response of the European allies to Carter's appeal for the creation of a veritable anti-Iranian front is not yet completely clear. Curiously, and even somewhat unexpectedly, the West German Government seems to be the most willing to demonstrate its solidarity with the United States. This attitude is in flagrant contrast with Bonn's resistance to the American call for economic sanctions against the USSR as punishment for its intervention in Afghanistan.

Nevertheless, a generalized willingness seems to be developing among the United States' European allies--Portugal included--and even Japan, towards concerted collaboration in political and economic retaliatory action that may finally persuade Iran that it must release the Tehran hostages or else run the risk of American military action, with all the consequences that such a show of force would entail.

COMMUNIST LEADER BEGINS EUROPEAN TOUR, ANNOUNCES PARIS VISIT

[Text] Portuguese Communist Party [PCP] Secretary General Alvaro Cunhal today left Lisbon at the start of a four-nation visit which will take him to Switzerland, Belgium, the Netherlands and Britain and during which he is to meet those countries' communist leaders.

Addressing journalists prior to his departure, the PCP secretary general said: A subversive operation is being carried out by the organs of power, that is to say, by the bare fragile and chance majority in the Assembly of the Republic, by the government which I have repeatedly said is a government outside the law.

If the present government does not fall by then, he said it is hoped that the Democratic Alliance will become a minority in the forthcoming parliamentary elections. He declined to reveal whether the PCP would propose a vote censure against the government, confining himself to declaring: How and when the government may come to fall I cannot say, but its fall will be within institutional and democratic legality.

Cunhal dismissed the distribution of farmland to the landless with which the government proposes to mark the anniversary of the April revolution this year, saying that it is a pittance, scraps of land to cover up the tens of thousands of hectares given to the big estate owners.

On presidential elections, he said the Democratic Alliance, by focusing all the attention on them, is using a diversionist tactic in a bid to make people forget that there are parliamentary elections before the presidential elections. He said that the PCP does not intend to put up its own presidential candidate or define its stand very quickly, as there are still many unknown quantities and many would-be candidates to announce their intentions.

CP ISSUES GREETINGS MESSAGE TO HUNGARIAN PARTY CONGRESS

LD161043 Lisbon AVANTE! in Portuguese 27 Mar 80 p 10

[Unattributed report on Portuguese Communist Party (PCP) Central Committee greetings message to 12th Hungarian Socialist Workers Party (MSZMP) Congress]

[Text] The PCP Central Committee has sent the MSZMP Central Committee a greetings message which reads as follows:

Dear comrades: The PCP Central Committee fraternally greets the 12th MSZMP Congress and, via its delegates, the communists and working people of the People's Republic of Hungary.

Taking advantage of this important occasion, we wish to convey our warm congratulations to the Hungarian communists and people on the 35th anniversary of Hungary's liberation and of the heroic victory against fascism being celebrated this year.

During those 35 years, through hard work, through difficult moments and at the cost of great sacrifices, the Hungarian people have achieved historic gains and their life has changed radically.

In socialist Hungary, a free and independent country, people's power has been gained, society has freed itself from the capitalist system and from the vestiges of feudalism and has abolished man's exploitation by man. [paragraph continues]

Under the leadership of the Hungarian communist party, the socialist transformation of agriculture and the rapid development of production forces have taken place, major successes have been achieved thanks to the planned socialist economy in the work of economic and cultural building, and the entire people's living standards have improved considerably. Socialist democracy has widened and deepened.

The Hungarian People's Republic, the fruit of the joint creative action of the working class and other working sectors has, by helping to strengthen the socialist camp, also helped considerably in extending the struggle for peace, detente and peaceful coexistence, which involves all the progressive forces of our time.

The PCP Central Committee, on behalf of all Portuguese Communists, extends to you its most sincere good wishes that further major achievements be attained in the future implementation of the 12th congress' decisions, thus consolidating and developing the results achieved in socialist building.

Dear comrades, we consider socialist Hungary's successes to be a direct contribution to our own struggle. By demonstrating the vast superiority of socialism over capitalism, the socialist countries' achievements and accomplishments act as a powerful incentive in the revolutionary struggle of the working class and of peoples throughout the world.

The PCP, which in Portugal is steadfastly combating and will continue to combat the slanders and conspiracies against the socialist countries, reasserts its solidarity with the Hungarian communists and people in their creative work and will continue to act to strengthen the relations of friendship and cooperation between the Portuguese and Hungarian peoples and between democratic Portugal and socialist Hungary.

Next the greetings message discusses the situation in Portugal, indicating the guidelines of the PCP and the working masses. It continues as follows:

Dear comrades, in their defense of the April gains the Portuguese working class, workers and people are contributing to the peoples' general struggle for their national and social liberation, against imperialism and for peace, democracy, social progress and socialism.

In our time, whereas the crisis of capitalism is worsening in all its aspects, the socialist camp's positions are becoming increasingly strong, the struggle of the capitalist countries' working class against the power of the monopolies is developing, and the national liberation movement is achieving historic victories in Africa, Asia and Latin America. In this connection, we welcome the very recent victory of the patriotic forces in the Zimbabwe elections, which is a major factor in strengthening the southern African peoples' freedom struggle and a further major blow to imperialism.

The most aggressive reactionary and imperialist circles are unleashing very major measures in the attempt to prevent and stifle the vigorous advance of the revolutionary process and to sabotage the process of detente and peaceful coexistence, by resorting to all kinds of interference and aggression against the peoples and by aggravating international tension.

These measures include the plans to deploy some 600 new medium-range missiles in European NATO countries, threatening peace and security in Europe and throughout the world, the U.S. creation of a "quick strike force" designed for military intervention in the Middle East or in any other part of the world, and the intensification of the anticommunist and anti-Soviet campaign unleashed on the pretext of the situation created in Afghanistan.

In view of this situation the PCP, while stressing the decisive role of the USSR and the other socialist countries, believes it is of decisive importance to thwart imperialism's plans, to defend peace and to guarantee the pursuit of the detente process, joint action by all anti-imperialist forces and the strengthening of unity in the international communist and workers movement.

Dear comrades, once again we wish you the greatest success in the work of the 12th MSZMP Congress and in the further implementation of its resolutions.

In the interests of the common cause of peace, democracy and social progress, the PCP will do its utmost to insure the continuing intensification of the ties of friendship, cooperation and solidarity which exist between the PCP and the MSZMP.

By acting to strengthen the fraternal relations between our parties on the basis of the principles of Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationalism, we are sure we are acting in the interests of developing peaceful and friendly relations between our peoples and countries, in the interests of the world anti-imperialist front and of the unity of the international communist movement.

Long live the 12th MSZMP Congress!

Long live PCP-MSZMP friendship!

Long live proletarian internationalism!

[Signed] the PCP Central Committee.

WOMEN'S MOVEMENT SUPPORTS CUBA ON PERUVIAN EMBASSY INCIDENT

FL141213 Havana Domestic Service in Spanish 1045 GMT 14 Apr 80

[Text] In Lisbon, the Portuguese Women's Democratic Movement Sunday unanimously approved during its first congress a motion of support for our revolution as a result of recent maneuvers of U.S. imperialism. The campaigns conducted by imperialism to foster still more the climate of cold war, the communique states, are aimed at trying to destroy the Cuban socialist revolution and the heroic gains of its people. The Portuguese women's organization condemns all campaigns directed at deviating world attention from the real problems affecting a large part of mankind, which lead to war and hunger under imperialism, fascism, racism, Zionism, colonialism and apartheid.

During the congress, Cuba's solitary voice was heard when the Cuban delegate to the First Congress of the Portuguese Women's Democratic Movement made a speech to denouce the continued aggressions of U.S. imperialism against Cuba. Maria Julia Arredondo, alternate member of the PCC Central Committee and member of the Secretariat of the Federation of Cuban Women, stressed in her speech that the imperialists are conducting a strong campaign against Cuba which was recently intensified by the incident at the Peruvian Embassy in this capital.

In her speech the Cuban delegate, who was interrupted 19 times by the participants' applause, cheers for Cuba and hurrahs, stated that the Portuguese women can also count on the unlimited support of the Cuban women and people, who are certain that the great efforts of the Portuguese people to make a reality of their legitimate aspirations of equality, well-being and social justice will be successful. The First Congress of the Portuguese Women's Democratic Movement held working sessions during the weekend with the participation of some 700 national delegates, representatives from abroad and of the Women's International Democratic Federation.

FRETILIN OFFICIAL URGES ACTION, SUPPORT FOR TIMOR

LD141421 Paris LE MATIN in French 2 Apr 80 p 11

[Jose Alves report: "Timor: Portugal Seeks Contact With Indonesia"]

[Text] Portuguese Prime Minister Francisco Sa Carneiro has stated that East Timor's forcible integration into Indonesia is being increasingly accepted by the international community and that it would have to be accepted. Referring to the 200,000 deaths now attributed to the Indonesian occupation and the famine, he stated a little bitterly: "What do you expect, East Timor is at the other end of the world. Jane Fonda has not yet set foot there and Portugal's voice does not carry far."

Sa Carneiro is clearly trying to prepare Portuguese opinion for the resumption of contacts between Lisbon and Jakarta, which do not currently have diplomatic relations. The Portuguese prime minister's "realism" is not shared by the Revolutionary Front for an Independent East Timor [FRETILIN], the main nationalist movement, one of whose officials, Mari Alkatiri, told us in Lisbon that he has "no intention of laying down arms. Any solution to the conflict depends on FRETILIN, out of necessity" he added, demanding that "Jakarta apply the UN resolutions condemning the military occupation and recognizing my people's right to self-determination."

Mari Alkatiri has just visited several European capitals. "I have established very positive contacts with several socialist and social democratic parties," he said. He is also convinced that time is working against the Indonesians. He stressed the importance of a major diplomatic offensive launched by Portugal "which must not give way to U.S. imperialism and Indonesian expansionism." "The Portuguese," he told us, "must fully assume their historical and political responsibilities. They have historical responsibilities because they remained in East Timor for 400 years, leaving us a specific culture, identity and political responsibilities because the Portuguese administration abandoned us in August 1975 and has never answered the subsequent appeals we made for it to return to East Timor and make appropriate preparations for decolonization. Portugal deliberately sacrificed us by bowing to the United States and Indonesia," Alkatiri said indignantly.

"In December 1975, when the Indonesian Army invaded East Timor, Jakarta and Washington explained that it was to prevent the former Portuguese colony from becoming a kind of 'Pacific Cuba' in the hands of FRETILIN, which had unilaterally proclaimed independence 10 days earlier." "That was ridiculous," Mari Alkatiri protested. "Our movement is simply a nationalist movement. Of course at present we are only recognized by about 10 socialist countries and by Portuguese-speaking African countries. However, is it really our fault if the Western countries prove inconsistent in their relations with national liberation movements?"

COUNCIL OF MINISTERS ACTS TO EASE GAS STRIKE PROBLEMS

LD170750 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 2300 GMT 16 Apr 80

[Text] Among the various strikes which are currently taking place throughout the country, the one being staged by workers of the State Oil Company PETROGAL is the most worrisome to the public, due not only to the shortage of gasoline, gas and other fuel but, above all, to the implications which it might have in the supply of gas by the Portuguese Electricity Board [EDP].

In effect, the EDP has alerted the public to the fact that due to a change in the composition of the gas caused by the strike of PETROGAL workers, consumers are advised not to use any gas supplied through the mains--that is, no gas appliances should be switched on, because this might be dangerous.

In connection with this strike, we have just received a note from the presidency of the Council of Ministers which we shall now read in full:

The situation created by the strike in the state-owned company PETROGAL has seriously affected the supply of gas to the city of Lisbon. This situation entails dangers of poisoning or explosion if consumers fail to take the necessary precautions, as well as incalculable social and economic damage. The consequences of this unexpected situation are extremely grave and take the form of a veritable sabotage. The government has therefore held an emergency meeting of the ministers of defense, internal administration, industry and energy, labor, trade and tourism and the secretary of state for social communication, and measures were immediately taken envisaging the creation of a plan providing for the replacement of the additive to the gas which should have been supplied in the mix of PETROGAL, so as to solve this aspect of the consequences of the strike.

In addition to the warnings to the public which have been given in the past few hours, the said "emergency group" has also considered in tonight's meeting the possibility of activating the emergency operational center of civil protection whose task it is to take the necessary action aimed at preventing, if possible, imminent catastrophes, or at reducing their effects should they occur.

The government is closely following any developments and will, in due course, adopt other measures should they prove necessary.

DEMOCRATIC ALLIANCE LEADERS ADDRESS 15 APR RALLY

ID161308 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 2300 GMT 13 Apr 80

[Excerpts] A demonstration of support for the government was held in Lisbon this evening. The demonstrators marched from Duque de Saldanha Square to the Campo Pequeno Bullring where they held a rally.

The crowd, which packed the Campo Pequeno Bullring to capacity, greeted the leaders of the three parties of the Democratic Alliance--Ribeiro Teles, of the Popular Monarchist Party [PPM], Freitas do Amaral [CDS] and Sa Carneiro [PSD]--with great warmth and enthusiasm. Also present were Lucas Pires, Basilio Horta, Pedro Roseta, Helena Roseta and many others, as well as most government members.

The first speaker was Ferreira do Amaral [PPM] who condemned Soviet totalitarianism and stated that the Democratic Alliance has proved that Portugal is viable. He accused the opposition of being unable to accept the fact that it is made up of minorities, and of upsetting the proper functioning of the institutions and provoking institutional rifts.

PPM Leader Riberiro Teles noted that those present had come at their own expense and of their own free will, and not in chartered coaches and trains paid for from party funds as is the case with others.

Just over 4 months have passed since our election victory, he said, and the leftwing opposition has conducted itself in a blindly destructive manner and has failed to put forward any valid alternatives to the present government. When the government makes difficult decisions it is accused of trying to bring back the past. Ribeiro Teles also accused the rightwing opponents of the government of attempting to infiltrate the Democratic Alliance in a bid to destroy democracy and described them as a dangerous threat.

Freitas do Amaral was the next to speak. He said that the government will undertake all possible demarches to secure self-determination for the people of East Timor. As far as the Portuguese people and the outside world are concerned, he said, the Democratic Alliance government stands for security, honesty and confidence. We have always said that we wanted change in a climate of democracy and freedom, and a solid, serene and self-confident government. Well, we now have such a government, he stated. For many years attempts had been made to form a majority, stable and cohesive government. The Democratic Alliance has provided such a government.

Freitas do Amaral also spoke of the reconstruction of the Portuguese State, now taking place despite being hampered by a negative Constitution that is a factor of disunity among the Portuguese, a Marxist and illogical Constitution that is an affront to historical universalism. We promised legality, order and justice, he said, and have fulfilled our promise. There have been no outrages against public order, not even in Alentejo Province, he said, because those who challenge the law of the land come face to face with our resolve.

The appointment of a civilian to the defense portfolio, the law on national defense and the dialogue maintained with the armed forces on the drafting of the general state budget [presumably meaning the part of the budget concerning military expenditure] have all contributed to the armed forces acceptance of their subordinate role to civilian power. With regard to foreign affairs, Freitas do Amaral spoke of the invasion of Afghanistan by the Soviet Union--this was greeted with loud booing from the crowd--and of the situation in Iran and expressed the Portuguese Government's solidarity with the American people.

He also said that the government has given a new impetus to the negotiations on Portugal's EEC membership and that the hardest part was now over. He said that, as promised, a policy of rapprochement with the Portuguese-speaking, Arab and Latin American countries is being implemented. The opposition is (?creating) difficulties to this rapprochement because it is jealous that such a policy is pursued by a government of theDemocratic Alliance.

Sa Carneiro was the last to speak and he said: Elected on 20 December, we are indebted to the confidence and the expectations of those who voted for us. Four months have passed and the government is fully and serenely in control. Two months ago our opponents started a chorus of "out with the government," so we have come out into the streets to meet with those who quietly respect the hard work carried out by the government. Hence the demonstration, which Sa Carneiro described as a lesson in democracy to the government's opponents. He added that governments are made or defeated in the polls, not in the streets, because only the ballot box ensures the legitimacy of democratic power.

The government has suffered no erosion, he said. It is the opposition, with its wild activity, that shows signs of erosion. This fact, he went on, should teach the opposition that power is not being used against the country, rather it is being exercised by the government of the Portuguese for the Portuguese. Any bid to bring down the government in any way other than through the majority that elected it, he said, would be tantamount to plunging the country into confusion once again.

OREJA LEAVES FOR TREATY TALKS WITH U.S.

[Unnamed Madrid radio correspondent interview with Spanish Foreign Minister Marcelino Oreja at Madrid's Barajas Airport--live]

[Excerpts] [Question] Spanish Foreign Minister Marcelino Oreja is just about to leave for the United States to begin discussions on the renegotiation of the Spanish-American treaty of friendship and cooperation. Minister, do you believe that the conditions and the atmosphere may be difficult, both for domestic and for international reasons, for these talks on the new Spanish-American treaty, which Spanish public opinion considers must be equitable and worthy?

[Answer] Look, I am not going there now to raise the matter of beginning negotiations for the revision of the treaty currently in force between the United States and Spain. What we are going for today is to hold one of the sessions--the annual meeting--which serves to review the work of the committees. I want to make it very clear that at the moment we are not beginning any process of renegotiation or revision of the treaty with the United States. We may perhaps touch on the framework within which such a process of revision might be conducted in the future and we might even look at some dates for this. But the purpose of the present meeting is essentially to review the results of the work of the various mixed committees over the past year.

[Question] Minister, in the military sense how do you see the future of relations between Spain and the United States?

[Answer] I can make no comment at this moment on what form the process of renegotiation might take, because in such negotiations one must play one's cards close to one's chest. But I can say that all we will now be doing is taking a preliminary look at the framework in which the revision of the treaty currently in force might be carried out.

MADRID VIEWS CARTER'S 'DEMANDS' ON EC COUNTRIES

LD151322 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1130 GMT 15 Apr 80

[Text] The dominant tone in European political life at present is undeniably one of pessimism. This is not merely linked with continuing poor economic performances, but rather is tied up with the risk that in the political field a level of tension might be reached which will do nothing for the harmony which is so much needed. President Carter's demands on the EC countries have produced disquiet among the leaders of those countries and have given rise to divergent attitudes within the Community. The time has come to take stock of the various positions, though ambiguity continues to prevail. The Netherlands appears to be decisively in favor of supporting Carter's measures. London is showing itself to be reticent and Germany appears resigned to a complication of its life not only in its relations with the other Community countries and with the United States but also in its stance of opening-up toward the East and in its relations with the Soviet Union. In a more less veiled way Carter has served a kind of ultimatum on his allies to adopt measures of punishment against Iran which have been decided in Washington. A sense of solidarity among the Western allies remains the keynote. The countries of Europe obviously have reason to come into line with the United States, but it is another matter to have a common strategy which has not been discussed in advance imposed on them and for this to be done in a way which is rather less than most suitable. Europe is aware of its limitations and of its responsibility.

It is also aware of its interests and of the risks to be incurred in a radicalization of attitudes over Iran. All this produces a picture in which doubts and hesitations converge. But individual interests are not the end of the matter. Above all of these there is the glimpsed risk of war. Chancellor Schmidt pointed to this when he said that in times past, people who did not desire war found themselves sliding into it. This is a serious moment, even though on the outside nothing appears to have changed.

RAYMOND ARON WARNS AGAINST COMPARING AFGHANISTAN, VIETNAM

LD161455 Barcelona LA VANGUARDIA in Spanish 6 Apr 80 p 8

[Raymond Aron article: "Reign of Might"]

[Text] If mankind forgets its past it is bound to repeat its mistakes. Some people reply to this assertion that the only lesson that history teaches us is that it teaches us nothing. But I would add that the greatest danger is not forgetfulness or memory, but a false interpretation of events.

Following the failure of the U.S. campaign in Vietnam, many politicians and professors in the United States advocated the theory that military strength now plays a limited role in interstate relations. The thousands of nuclear warheads at the United States' disposal did not terrorize the North Vietnamese or make them capitulate. And neither did an expeditionary force of 500,000 men prevent the infiltration of fighters from North to South along the Ho Chi Minh trail, on which thousands of tons of bombs were dropped by B-52's.

On the basis of the Vietnam experience, political commentators announced the inevitable failure of the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan. This was the pseudo-lesson learned from a misunderstood defeat. The Americans were semiparalyzed: They did not blockade the Port of Haiphong through which Soviet war materiel passed; its troops did not carry the war to the North and remained on the defensive, in a belated attempt to strengthen the South Vietnamese Army. The Americans did not want to stay in Vietnam whereas the Soviets have no intention of leaving Afghanistan, unless they leave there a government which identifies with their cause.

The U.S. defeat was caused to a large extent by the reversal in public opinion. The students, professors, liberals and even those who approved and prompted Kennedy's first decisions to send troops to Vietnam created a climate of enthusiasm in which the predident, whether his name was L.B. Johnson or R. Nixon, was obliged to seek not victory but peace.

If you read Henry Kissinger's memoirs, you can see how he devoted more time to the war with his opponents than to the struggle with the enemy, how he did negotiate with North Vietnam but at the same time had to lose his triumphs with the U.S. troops' withdrawal, without receiving just recognition. Well, this is not happening in Afghanistan. The Americans were waging war in full view of the world, whereas the Russians have expelled all journalists. Radio listeners and television viewers will not know whether or not they use napalm or chemical weapons. There will be no protests in the Soviet Union and hardly any elsewhere. The more ruthless the repression, the more effective and quick-acting it is and the easier it escapes moral censure.

Academics, convinced that power regimes are things of the past, will say that the Afghan resistance itself demonstrates the importance of weapons. The Soviet superpower will have to use 100,000 or 150,000 troops, perhaps many more, to quell a small people, totaling under 10 million citizens. Of course conquerors, especially the British in the last century, had to deal with such resistance from the Afghan people that eventually the country was able to maintain its independence. [paragraph continues]

But the Soviets will pay the price, since a state officially allied to the Marxist-Leninist bloc must not return to being a regime which Moscow does not acknowledge as socialist.

Some commentators emphasize the condemnation of the Soviet intervention made by several Islamic states in Islamabad. In the diplomatic field Moscow seems to be lending scope to its adversaries, but we must not forget the geographical advantages which it has insured for itself. Soviet troops are on the borders of Pakistan, and Gromyko announced in Islamabad that only the country's neutrality would be tolerated. The Baluchi tribes, divided among Pakistan, Afghanistan and Iran, are facilitating the destabilization. That is to say, the Soviets can reach the Oman Sea from Afghanistan without organizing any major battles.

In U.S. universities, fashionable theories have gained greater acceptance in the past decade, even though every year the Soviets have been deploying about 150 more missiles and increasing their defense budget by about 5 percent. This constitutes 11-15 percent of the Soviet GNP whereas the U.S. defense budget is equivalent to only 5 percent of its GNP. The Soviets have manufactured missiles, more combat tanks and more guns than the Americans, but as far as nuclear weapons are concerned, at present both nations are on a par, though in conventional weapons (excluding the navy) the Soviets have gained a quantitative superiority.

Why are so many Persian Gulf states afraid of being protected by the United States? Primarily because they are afraid of Soviet military might and have doubts about America's. And what divisions could the United States allocate to the defense of the Persian Gulf?

The decline in U.S. prestige worldwide has various causes but one of them stands out, and it is the change in the balance of forces between the two superpowers. Professors who theorize about the impotence of force are unfortunately closing their eyes to the evidence. The sword--whether made of steel or laser beams--still rules and governs the future of empires as the foundation of states and arbiter of disputes. The Soviet regime--tyrannical and inefficient, dependent on Western technology and on grain from the Midwest--distinguishes itself only in arms. A human and economic failure, the Soviet Union demands respect through fear.

Napoleon, in the autumn of his life, used to like to say that in the end the spirit always defeats the bayonet. Unfortunately one sometimes has to wait a long time for this outcome.

BASQUE COALITION'S REGISTRATION BLOCKED

LD161102 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 0900 GMT 16 Apr 80

[Text] The public prosecutor's office has instituted proceedings against the Herri Batasuna on the grounds that it has found indications of irregularities, according to informed sources. This decision was taken after the Interior Ministry sent the public prosecutor all the documentation submitted by the Herri Batasuna in its request for legalization. This institution of legal proceedings will mean that the registration application made by the Basque coalition will be turned down, according to a EUROPA PRESS report. As is known, the public prosecutor's office received the Herri Batasuna documentation last Saturday, 12 April, after the Interior Ministry had forwarded it in case there were any indications of legal irregularities. The prosecutor's office came to the conclusion that such indications did indeed exist and instituted legal proceedings aimed at declaring the Basque coalition illegal. Under the law on political parties, the public prosecutor's office had 20 working days from 12 April to reply to the Interior Ministry. There were two possible replies it could have made: to return the documentation if no legal irregularities were apparent, or to specify alleged irregularities and institute legal action, which would mean the nonregistration of the Herri Batasuna on the list of political parties.

IRAQI FOREIGN MINISTER HOLDS PRESS CONFERENCE, ENDS VISIT

LD152004 Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 1530 GMT 15 Apr 80

[Text] Iraqi Foreign Minister Sa'dun Hammadi's visit to Finland ends today. During his visit Hammadi has had talks with his Finnish host, Foreign Minister Paavo Vayrynen on Finnish-Iraqi relations and the international situation. At a press conference today Foreign Minister Hammadi said that he is satisfied with the development of Finnish-Iraqi economic, technological and cultural cooperation. The international issues discussed during the visit have pertained to the situation in the Middle East. According to Hammadi, the current tension between Iraq and Iran is due to the desire of the present Iranian leaders to spread the Islamic revolution to neighboring countries. According to Hammadi, in the conflict between the Arab countries and Israel no settlement can be reached until a military balance is created between the sides. This, however, cannot be attained as long as Israel receives unilateral support from the big powers, Hammadi said.

DELIVERY TAKEN ON SOVIET ANTIAIRCRAFT MISSILES

LD101844 Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 1700 GMT 10 Apr 80

[Text] Regional antiaircraft missiles, bought from the Soviet Union, have been received. The missiles have been stationed at the Helsinki antiaircraft regiment in Hyrylae. The staff, who were given operations training in the Soviet Union last year, will now start the training of additional personnel. Implementation of the missiles will require the involvement of more technical staff recruited for the defense forces.

The purchase of the antiaircraft missiles was based on the recommendation of the second parliamentary defense review committee. The missiles now received will be used to achieve training readiness. The missile system will make possible antiaircraft operations up to an altitude of over 15km instead of the present maximum altitude of 3 km.

The missiles are 6 meters long and weigh about 950 kg. Each missile is about 40 cm in diameter and, at full speed, can travel at 2 1/2 times the speed of sound.

OFFICIAL INTERVIEWED ON NUCLEAR WASTE SHIPMENTS TO USSR

ID151526 Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 1040 GMT 15 Apr 80

[Excerpts] Imatran Voima will start negotiations in Moscow next week on details of removing used nuclear materials. Imatran Voima, in connection with the purchase of Soviet-built Loviisa nuclear plant units, has concluded an agreement concerning the return of waste to the Soviet Union after a certain period of cooling. At the end of last year it was agreed that highly active waste will be cooled for 5 years--instead of the previous 3 years--before it is transported back. The first lots of waste, however, have only been cooling down for 3 years according to Heikki Vaeryrynen, office head of the Imatran Voima Nuclear Department who will head the Finnish delegation to the talks in Moscow. [Begin recording] [Vaeyrynen] We have tentatively agreed that the first shipment will take place in the latter half of next year. The shipment concerns fuel elements which were removed during the first fuel change in the Lovissa reactor in 1978.

[Reporter Eeva Saari] Will the waste then be suitable for shipment?

[Vaeyrynen] It is this way even now, but a storage of 3 years is required. This will later be extended to 5 years.

[Saari] How often will these waste shipments take place in the future?

[Vaeyrynen] There will be one shipment a year for each Lovissa plant unit, or two transports a year on the average.

[Saari] Finns, as I have heard, are to be trained in waste transport techniques.

[Vaeyrynen] Yes, in a way, because we in Finland are responsible for the safety of these shipments. Before Finnish authorities and the law we must have sufficient knowledge of the equipment we are using. For this reason part of the personnel will receive training in Leningrad.

[Saari] Where in the Soviet Union will the Finnish nuclear waste be taken?

[Vaeyrynen] We do not know. [end recording]

The first 14-ton lot of highly active nuclear waste will probably leave Lovissa around the middle of next year. After that there will be two waste shipments a year in equal lots. According to Imatran Voima, the transport costs are established in a more extensive agreement on nuclear plants.

NORWAY

RECALL OF IRAN ENVOY SEEN AS 'MILD EXPRESSION OF DISAPPROVAL'

ID160805 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 11 Apr 80 p 8

[Unattributed report: "Norway Recalls Its Tehran Ambassador"]

[Text] On Thursday Norway followed up the U.S. request to its allies for support in the merciless diplomatic tug of war with the regime in Iran by recalling its Tehran Ambassador Tormod Petter Svennevig for consultations. The government, which in the past has expressed its respect and admiration for the patience the U.S. Government has shown in the hostage affair, discussed the question of Norwegian support action on Thursday and will now wait and see before deciding on further possible measures.

According to information received by AFTENPOSTEN, the government has no illusions that sanctions and protest actions will be able to influence the Iranian regime and contribute to the solution of the protracted drama in Tehran. But it felt the need to take some action to mark its despair over the political events taking place in the Iranian capital.

The recall of Ambassador Svennevig must be seen as a relatively mild expression of disapproval of the Iranian regime. Svennevig was also recalled in the days between Christmas and the New Year, together with the other Norwegian diplomat in Iran, Embassy Secretary Thomas Hauff. The intention then was to show strong Norwegian disapproval of Iranian policies by keeping Svennevig at home for a long period, but when it was seen what a low profile other Western nations were keeping, Svennevig was sent back. This time it is only Svennevig who has been recalled--the embassy secretary will remain at his post in the embassy in Tehran. At present it has not been decided how long Svennevig will remain in Norway this time.

Foreign Minister Knut Frydenlund as yet has no comment to make on what tightening of Norwegian reactions to Iran can be expected if a positive trend does not emerge soon. He did, however, express his anxiety that the United States, which he otherwise praises for its handling of this difficult matter, might find it necessary to embark upon military action, and he hopes that it will instead be possible to achieve success with other means. The committee of ministers in the Council of Europe discussed the Iran situation at their meeting in Lisbon Thursday and demanded the immediate release of the American hostages. As a member of the Council of Europe Norway was party to this demand. Yet again, Norway voted at the time for the UN Security Council resolution on the release of the hostages, but the resolution was halted by a Soviet veto.

Norway has not been directly encouraged to take part in an economic boycott of Iran, and such a boycott would hardly have any meaning for Iran since Norwegian-Iranian trade is very modest. Last year Norway's exports to Iran amounted to 95 million kroner, whereas Iranian exports to Norway amounted to 363 million kroner--mostly for oil.

AFTENPOSTEN SCORES SOVIET PLAN OF 'MEDIUM-TERM' AFGHAN PRESENCE

[Editorial: "In Kabul To Stay"]

[Text] Ever since Soviet troops moved into Afghanistan at the end of December last year, the Soviet leaders have assured us that their action only amounts to temporary military assistance. The Soviet soldiers came as friends to defend their brothers in Afghanistan against hostile imperialists. As soon as this danger had passed, the armed Soviet comrades would be withdrawn. This has been emphasized time after time. Even the secretly concluded treaty on the stationing of Soviet troops in Afghanistan stresses that this is only a medium-term measure. But what does Moscow mean by "medium-term"?

The answer is that, what is characterized in Soviet treaties with its "allies" as temporary develops in practice into a permanent situation. Soviet troops have been in Afghanistan for 3 months. The stubborn opposition that has met them shows that their "friends" in Afghanistan consist only of a clique of power-seekers in Kabul. Thousands of Afghans have taken up arms to try to drive out the foreign "liberators". They can hardly be expected to succeed. The Soviet troops have come to stay, and the newly signed treaty between Moscow and Kabul gives the impression that the Soviet Union has also found a basis in international law for continued "occupation."

The text of this treaty is not known. The only thing we have to go on is a little notice put out by TASS which states that Moscow and Kabul have ratified a treaty "on the terms of the medium-term deployment of limited contingents of Soviet troops on the territory of the Afghan Democratic Republic." But the Soviet Union has made similar treaties with its "allies" in the Warsaw Pact organization, and their message is clear enough. Time passes, but the Russian military units remain.

Treaties with the GDR, Czechoslovakia, Poland and Hungary also stress that the presence of Soviet troops in these countries is an act of friendship, limited in time and extent. It is significant that Moscow after the Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia in 1968 made sure of its right to maintain troops there by using the same formulation as has been used recently in Kabul: "the terms of the medium-term deployment of Soviet troops on Czechoslovak territory."

The Soviet Union makes it sound as if its continued military control of Eastern Europe is a necessary defense measure against a warlike NATO. Only when this danger has passed will it be time for a Soviet withdrawal. In practical political terms this means that Soviet soldiers will not leave Eastern Europe in the foreseeable future. The invasion of Afghanistan is justified as a means of defending that country against hostile attack. But it is up to Moscow to decide when this threat no longer exists. That is to say, the Soviet Union intends to stay in Afghanistan indefinitely, in the same way as it has established itself in Eastern Europe. The rulers in Moscow have once again dictated an agreement with their artillery and machine guns.

'SIGNIFICANT CONCESSIONS' EXPECTED IN ICELAND FISHING TALKS

[Morten Fyhn report: "New Norwegian Zone Can Be Accepted"]

[Text] There is every reason to expect stormy negotiations between Norway and Iceland over Jan Mayen Island when Foreign Minister Knut Frydenlund and Fishery Minister Eivind Bolle begin talks in Reykjavik. The conflict concerns Norway's plans for a 200-mile economic zone around the windswept Norwegian island more than 1000 km from the mainland. But there are strong indications that there is now a possibility of finding a solution at least regarding fishing rights, so that a new cold war can be avoided. [paragraph continues]

This means that Iceland can envisage the acceptance of a Norwegian fishing zone against the promise of considerable Norwegian concessions.

Last year saw a public break in the negotiations after Iceland proposed a joint zone around Jan Mayen. For Norway such a novel solution was--and still is--impossible to accept. The stubborn Norwegian opposition to shared sovereignty has led to a situation where Iceland is prepared, albeit reluctantly, to accept a Norwegian fishing zone on certain conditions. Briefly, Iceland has three unshakeable demands which Frydenlund wants to bring out in the open with the information that these demands are not negotiable:

1--Iceland's own 200-mile limit will remain in force in the direction of Jan Mayen. A midline solution will not be contemplated for the 2,500 square km area where the Icelandic zone and the planned Jan Mayen zone overlap.

2--Total quantities of capelin which can be fished within the Icelandic zone and the Jan Mayen zone are to be decided solely by the Icelandic authorities.

3--Iceland shall have at least half of all capelin which can be fished in the Jan Mayen zone. In addition, Iceland also wants to be able to demand the right to half of all fish quotas in the Jan Mayen zone. This means, for example, equal future rights in herring fishing as well as cod and shrimps.

Because it is the capelin fishing which is the most important question at the present time, Iceland may perhaps accept an agreement that only covers capelin, on condition that talks are held later on the other types of fish.

Conversations which AFTENPOSTEN has had with eminent Icelandic politicians and officials give the impression that Iceland will not insist on an agreement now which also embraces seabed resources. Ideally both countries want such a total solution, but the distance between their viewpoints is too great for them to be able to reach such a solution in this round of talks. Iceland demands also at least half of these resources, if they are found, but seems to realize that such a broad solution cannot be reached at present. So the problems relating to the seabed can be shelved until a later date, with the parties in agreement that neither has committed itself to anything.

If Norway accepts the three abovementioned Icelandic conditions for its acceptance of a Norwegian fishing zone around Jan Mayen, the negotiations can have positive results. It is also quite clear that Norway does not have much choice if a peaceable solution is to be found. The Icelandic terms are probably not so "impossible" that Norway will not be able to accept them. The alternative is no agreement, with a great danger of confrontations in the fishing waters between fishing boats and inspection vessels. Unilateral Norwegian establishment of a zone would be met by a sharply worded Icelandic protest note and the two Scandinavian sister nations would be thrown into a bitter conflict whose consequences are difficult to predict today.

A serious problem is that tempers soon become frayed in Iceland. Not all the members of the all-party Icelandic delegation at the negotiations are as prepared to give up even the most far-reaching demands and, in sections of the press, the attitude is implacable and militant.

Iceland therefore expects Norway to make significant concessions. One can ask if this is not justified since Iceland is much more dependent than Norway on fishing as an important part of its economy. As much as 97 percent of Iceland's exports are derived from its fishing industry. Not without reason the Icelanders remind us that Norway is a rich oil nation while they themselves live almost exclusively by their fishing. [paragraph continues]

Iceland's demands for greater rights on the sea bed are also put down to anxiety about a possible large oil spill in the area sometime in the future which could devastate fish stocks and consequently the Icelandic economy.

Iceland likes to use the expression "western Scandinavia," which also includes Greenland and the Faeroes. They see a natural community between these nations of island peoples who live on what the sea can give them and who occupy a special position. In the unusually history-conscious Iceland it is also a serious political argument that they are convinced that an Icelander discovered Jan Mayen in 1194. An official commission points to a constant Icelandic interest in Jan Mayen right up to the present day. It also recalls a reservation from the Icelandic Government in 1927 in which Iceland reserves the right of Icelanders to operate on the same terms as the citizens of other nations on the island.

Behind Iceland's views on Jan Mayen there is therefore a pronounced doubt on whether Norway has full sovereignty over the island and scepticism about whether Norway has the right to a zone at all in the light of developments at the UN Law of the Sea Conference. Here Iceland is going too far and will hardly be able to find support in international law for its view.

For Norway the most important consideration is to regulate fishing. Iceland also wants this, but the Icelanders claim that the capelin shoals are Icelandic. The difference between the two countries' interests is, however, clear: For Norway, fishing around Jan Mayen is of marginal importance, whereas for Iceland it is vital.

OLYMPIC PARTICIPATION SET; TRADE WITH IRAN TO CONTINUE

TA NEA CLAIMS ROLANDHIS, ERKMEN AGREE ON NICOSIA HOT LINE

NC170645 Nicosia TA NEA in Greek 17 Apr 80 pp 1, 3

[Excerpts] It has been agreed that a hot line for direct contact between the foreign ministries of Cyprus and Turkey be established in Nicosia and Ankara.

This decision is "top secret" and was made during last week's meeting in Lisbon between the two foreign ministers, Mr Nikos Rolandhis and Mr Hayrettin Erkmen. This meeting has been described as unofficial and an effort has been made to keep it secret.

A number of West European foreign ministers, particularly FRG Foreign Minister Genscher, have played a decisive role in the realization of the Rolandhis-Erkmen contact.

According to fully established reports from well-informed circles of the Foreign Ministry, during their meeting Rolandhis and Erkmen discussed the substance and the details of the Cyprus problem but it was agreed that it was advisable not to announce anything because of the current delicate phase of the Cyprus problem.

The same Foreign Ministry circles have told TA NEA that it is not known whether the president and the Council of Ministers were aware of the meeting or the questions that Mr Rolandhis discussed with Mr Erkmen or whether all this was the result of a personal initiative and of some suggestion by Mr Rolandhis himself together with his West European counterparts prior to his departure for Lisbon as well as during his stay there.

Along with this, it has been learend that the recent controversy between Democratic Rally leader Glavkos Klirdhis and Foreign Minister Rolandhis has caused concern among the Western quarters which have been exerting efforts to bridge the chasm.

Within this framework, the West German and the American embassies in Nicosia--acting on instructions from their governments--have been developing coordinated efforts in order to resolve the Rolandhis-Kliridhis "misunderstanding."

TRADE MINISTER RETURNS FROM BAGHDAD VISIT, MAKES STATEMENT

AT161359 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1130 GMT 16 Apr 80

Arrival Statement

AT161610 Athens Armed Forces Television Service in Greek 1500 GMT 16 Apr 80

[Begin Panayiotopoulos video recording] I must tell you that I am extremely satisfied with the results of the meeting. We agreed on many issues in both the industrial sector--and you will hear about this from the meeting of the industry ministers on the alumina issue--as well as in the agricultural sector. We agreed on the quantities of tobacco they will purchase this year. An Iraqi delegation is scheduled to visit Greece soon. We also agreed on the tomato pulp issue, which is of great interest to us since we have large quantities available. We have agreed on procedures for the sale of large quantities to them.

Generally, in the trade sector we agreed on the export of agricultural products in quantities far greater than ever before. Also in the agricultural sector and particularly in training, which is of interest to them, we undertook specific obligations for the training of Iraqis in Greece. We have also reached agreements for the training of Iraqis in the tourist and the telecommunications sectors.

We were also fully informed of projects now underway under their 5-year program. I want to explain, or rather clarify, that they have a vast 5-year development program which starts as of next year. This means that great opportunities are offered to Greek enterprises to undertake projects in Iraq. Greek enterprises have a strong presence over there. At this moment projects now underway and projects they will undertake in the immediate future are estimated in the amount of $1 billion.

In conferences with the ministers of public works and of irrigation, we discussed ways in which Greek enterprises can have greater participation in larger projects and, particularly, ways in which they can become more active through consortium arrangements. Greek enterprises have a good reputation but I think the government must also undertake the obligation to closely supervise the implementation and progress of these programs and projects so that the Iraqis can have additional guarantees for a timely and proper completion of these projects.

I believe that in this way we will have increased possibilities for the participation of Greek enterprises in large-scale projects in which the Greek Government must also undertake specific positions because this is a sector which at this moment is perhaps more important than anything else from the foreign exchange aspect. I believe the foreign exchange benefits alone make this one of the most important activities in the Middle East. [end video recording]

Statement on Oil Deal

AT161634 Athens Domestic Television Service in Greek 1600 GMT 16 Apr 80

[Excerpts] Upon his return from Baghdad this morning, Trade Minister Panayiotopoulos made the following statement:

[Begin Panayiotopoulos video recording] As you know this was an interministerial meeting and this was the first time it was held at the ministerial level. [as heard] We met the Iraqis here in Athens 2 years ago. So many questions, however, have arisen--in the good sense of the word--in the interim since our relations are progressing very rapidly, that in fact it is now essential to have continual contacts. I must tell you that I am extremely satisfied with the results of this meeting.

As you know, when Prime Minister Karamanlis visited Iraq, Saddam Husayn promised him that he was prepared to supply the quantities of oil which we require for the next year. Both the vice chairman of the Revolutionary Council and the oil minister emphatically reiterated that this promise to Karamanlis still stands and that during the last 3 months of the year, when the contracts for next year are being prepared, we must not be concerned with receiving the quantities we request in order to meet our needs. In other words, we have no problems with the oil supply from Iraq. We avoided discussing specific quantities because, as you know, this creates many problems. The important thing is that they remain firm on the position they have expressed to the prime minister and therefore we have no problems with the oil supply which we need next year from Iraq. [end video recording]

KARAMANLIS BRIEFS TSATSOS, CHAIRS DEFENSE MEETING

AT161842 Athens Domestic Television Service in Greek 1800 GMT 16 Apr 80

[Text] Prime Minister Konstandinos Karamanlis was today received by President of the Republic Konstandinos Tsatsos whom he briefed on the general situation of the country and particularly on the processes for the election of the new president. At 1200 [0900 GMT] today Karamanlis chaired a meeting at the National Defense Ministry which examined the country's defense situation as well as the strengthening and modernizing of our armed forces.

Upon his arrival at the ministry the prime minister was welcomed by National Defense Minister Averof and Chief of the National Defense General Staff General Gratsios. The meeting was attended by Coordination Minister Mitsotakis and National Defense Minister Averof; Deputy Ministers of National Defense Avraamidhis and Davos; General Gratsios and the chiefs of the army, navy and air force; and the prime minister's advisor on strategic matters, Lieutenant General Lazaridhis.

After a short report by the prime minister on the international situation, the four chiefs of staff referred to the preparedness and fighting potential of the armed forces which they described as completely satisfactory. In light of the international situation and tension and the uncertain future in the broader geographic area around Greece it was resolved to further develop the country's war industries and to promote the modernization of the armed forces.

Particular attention was paid to strengthening the surface fleet and the prime minister asked for an expansion of research in the international market, now in progress for the past 2 years, for the supply and parallel construction in Greece of frigate type warships. In general the prime minister stressed that, due to international conditions and within the country's economic potential, even with sacrifices by everyone, every possible effort must be made toward modernizing all arms and strengthening national defense. After the meeting the prime minister attended a working luncheon.

PAPER REPORTS AVEROF PREPARING NEW CABINET LIST

AT161329 Athens AVRIANI in Greek 16 Apr 80 p 1

[Text] It is believed that Averof will have prepared a new Cabinet list by Sunday which reportedly will include deputies from smaller parties in a New Democracy attempt to face withdrawal from NATO with a mini-universal government. Our political correspondent reports:

Averof has started sounding out deputies friendly to him on the formation of the new government which will take over the administration after the election of Karamanlis as president. The list of new ministers will be ready by Sunday and will then be submitted to Karamanlis for "examination." Karamanlis retains the right to add or delete anyone from the list even though Averof is reportedly preparing his list with "great care" so that he will not have to force Karamanlis to make "corrections."

What is impressive is that Averof, naturally on recommendations from Karamanlis, is sounding out deputies from smaller parties for inclusion in his Cabinet. The goal of this initiative is:

To "influence" these deputies into guaranteeing the election of the new president of the republic since some of them already know that they will get ministerial positions.

To provide the government with some form of "universality" so that it will be easier for it to make contact with the Americans during discussions on the country's return to NATO.

The report on the use of deputies from the smaller parties in ministerial as well as deputy ministerial positions, which was leaked late last night, caused concern among party leaders because they suspect that Averof's inquiries were undertaken in an effort to "undermine" party organizations. The same party personalities who were contacted by AVRIANI late last night stressed that there can be no truth to the report and that the entire issue is nothing but an attempt by "New Democracy" to create confusion within the ranks of the opposition and create a divisive atmosphere only a few days before the presidential election.

AVRIANI: CONFUSION EXISTS WITHIN NEW DEMOCRACY OVER AMNESTY ISSUE

[Text] Yesterday's revelation by AVRIANI of a report on the possible grant of amnesty to junta leaders caused a disturbance among "New Democracy" personalities who, in an effort to diminish the impact of the report, leaked another detail of Karamanlis' "bait," that is, that if amnesty is to be granted it will not cover Papadhopoulos and Ioannidhis. Our political correspondent reports:

The AVRIANI report on the search for ways of granting an amnesty which would also include the junta leaders in Koridhallos Prison caused concern yesterday among certain "New Democracy" personalities because they discern the danger of "revolt" by the progressive element of the party if this issue were to be stirred up.

A "New Democracy" deputy said last night that if, in the end, Karamanlis decides to accompany his rise to the presidential position with a gesture of amnesty, this would create confusion within the party. Other commentators stressed last night that any gain from the "absorption" of junta followers and royalists by "New Democracy" would be far smaller than the loss which would be caused by the "seeping" of progressives from the "New Democracy" party toward the center and possibly toward PASOK.

COLUMNISTS DISCUSS U.S. SANCTIONS AGAINST IRAN

MILLIYET Article

NC151200 Istanbul MILLIYET in Turkish 15 Apr 80 p 2

["Looking at the World" column by Sami Kohen: "Is It a Punishment or a Remedy?"]

[Excerpts] Using his right to veto, Ayatollah Khomeyni rudely rejected President Carter's letter and stated that no change would be made in the occupation of the embassy and the control of the hostages. So all the efforts that have been exerted so far have been wasted, and all the hopes have ended in disillusionment. The initial statement by Bani-Sadr and the latest words of Khomeyni clearly reveal the "administrative chaos" currently reigning in Iran.

Following the definite and uncompromising attitude of Khomeyni, the adoption of the measures which had been announced earlier by President Carter became inevitable. Washington's patience seems to have been exhausted. The American people have not been carried away by their feelings but they want their government to do something about it. They want their government to teach the Iranians a good lesson for holding the U.S. diplomats in captivity for so long, contrary to all forms of law and tradition. It is impossible for Carter to disregard these reactions of the people, particularly during this election year.

The wisdom and effectiveness of the measures being taken by the United States are as arguable as the attitude of the administration in Iran--to put it more precisely, of Khomeyni and the militants around him--who have trampled on international rules, no matter what the reason may be or how justified they may claim to be.

We believe that the United States has resorted to these measures in order to rid itself of the humiliation which has been inflicted upon it by Khomeyni and to penalize those who have stepped on its tail. In fact, the measures announced by President Carter will not resolve the hostage issue. On the contrary, they will imperil the hostages' lives even more. The implementation of the embargo may hurl the already poor Iranian economy into greater difficulties, but it will not upset it drastically.

In the political arena, Washington's decision will strengthen Khomeyni's position and will give him an opportunity to secure national unity "against U.S. imperialism" and to intimidate the opposition. It will also give him an opportunity to create the air of a "holy war" against Washington.

Could President Carter go further in the event that these measures fail to yield the desired result? This means that even if no open military intervention is undertaken, certain military measures such as a naval blockade may be taken. This is in fact being discussed in Washington at this moment. But such a move may create much wider and more serious dangers.

The use of U.S. warships in the Persian Gulf as a "means of pressure" may move into action the same number of warships that the Soviet Union maintains in the area. It should not be forgotten that the military presence of Moscow in Afghanistan puts the Soviet Union into a more advantageous position.

If the United States decides to resort to shows of force after the failure of these measures, which do not appear to be very effective, tension in the region will assume greater and more perilous proportions. Since such a development will upset the balance of power in the Middle East, the clashes that will ensue between the superpowers and other states will become the source of far greater misunderstandings and tensions and Iran will cease to be the focus of a bilateral issue only with the United States.

TERCUMAN Article

NC170715 Istanbul TERCUMAN in Turkish 14 Apr 80 p 4

[Article by Zafer Atay: "An Embargo and Turkey"]

[Excerpts] The patience of the United States has at last run out and it has begun to take harsh measures against Iran. We do not think, however, that these measures will make Khomeyni more reasonable. Even the most optimistic do not believe that the 50-odd Americans, who have been going through severe trials--blindfolded and with their hands tied since 4 November--will be released before the end of summer.

The United States knows that sanctions, adopted singly will yield no positive result. So Carter and others in the U.S. administration have thrown themselves upon their allies. But positive results have yet to be obtained. President Carter is not talking in vain when he says "our allies have disillusioned me." If these words are carefully examined, one can see that they carry a very serious connotation. The President meant that whenever the allies are in trouble they knock at the door of the United States but now they have refrained from supporting the United States in its dispute with Iran.

Naturally, Turkey is among the nations criticized by the President. Ankara announced months ago that it would not participate in any embargo against Iran. Turkey has a common border with Iran stretching over hundreds of kilometers. We have managed to maintain an extremely balanced policy toward Iran both during the shah's rule and now.

Like Iran, Turkey is a Muslim country. It is a member of the Islamic Conference. Therefore, it should not be expected to be in the frontline in supporting the U.S. measures. If the United States is contemplating squeezing Turkey into a tight corner, it will be committing a foreign policy error that will be difficult to repair.

To a certain extent Carter may be justified in using accusing language against affluent, big Western powers. But it would not be at all realistic to expect everybody to take part in the gambles of the "superpowers."

VOTCP REPORTS ON IRANIAN REACTION TO 'U.S. IMPERIALISM'

TA160711 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0630 GMT 16 Apr 80

[Text] Protests against U.S. imperialism's oppression and flagrant attempts at aggression in Iran are continuing in various cities of that country. These protest rallies stress that the Iranian people will not bow to pressures by U.S. imperialism, that they are determined to defend their revolutionary gains and their national independence and that the unity of all anti-imperialist forces is more imperative than ever.

In a letter he sent to the pope, the Iranian people's religious and political leader, Khomeyni, asked him to warn Carter against the dangers of plans for eventual military aggression by U.S. imperialism against Iran and to notify Carter that the Iranian people do not want to live under U.S. hegemony anymore.

Meanwhile, Shah Husayn, the leader of the Iranian Kurds, has said that under the present circumstances the main point is to insure the unity of the people in the country against U.S. imperialism, and that this is no time for arguments and discussions on the subject of Kurdish autonomy. Shah Husayn called on all the Iranian people to unite against U.S. imperialism and U.S. aggressive policies.

COLUMNIST DISCUSSES IRAN'S RELATIONS WITH U.S., IRAQ

NC151210 Istanbul TERCUMAN in Turkish 10 Apr 80 p 9

["The Street Corner" column by Ergun Goze: "U.S.A.-Iran-Iraq"]

[Excerpts] Peanuts producer Carter has at last carried out his threat: He has expelled the Iranian diplomats and students in the United States. He has also imposed an export embargo on Iran and has urged his allies to do likewise. Iran, on the other hand, has put its armed forces on the alert and announced that it will not sell oil to those countries which comply with the U.S. embargo.

What is the cause of this dispute between the United States and Iran? Iran has detained the diplomats at the U.S. Embassy as hostages on the allegation that they were "engaged in espionage." Through this behavior, which is contrary to the rules of international law and to the Islamic principle which maintains that "the ambassador is sacrosanct; he cannot be blamed for his mission." Iran, which claims to be the leader of the Islamic world, has badly damaged the prestige of Islam throughout the world.

It is noteworthy that the United States has not carried out any reprisals. It could also hold the Iranian diplomats in the United States as hostages. Though it would be an illegal act, even a secular state like the United States has refused to act in that way, notwithstanding the fact that it has by now earned the right to do so.

It would be correct to point out here that the young bulls who have placed the U.S. Embassy under siege in Iran may seem outwardly to be fighters under Khomeyni's orders, but they are in fact Marxists receiving their orders from Moscow. A struggle similar to that being waged between Iran and the United States is also being waged between Khomeyni's supporters and Moscow's supporters now occupying the U.S. Embassy in Tehran. This becomes apparent from the fact that though Bani-Sadr attempted to take over the hostages several times, the revolutionary bulls refused to comply. True, Moscow can assist in the elimination of the shah, but it is more than willing to assist in the destruction of Iran in the hope that it will embrace communism.

As far as Turkey is concerned, no matter how incorrect Iran's behavior may be, it is inconceivable that Turkey would take any action against it that would be parallel to that of the United States. This would be a gross error. But Turkey has to emphasize the damage which Iran has inflicted on the honor and sublimity of Islam.

The Iranian-Iraqi dispute may open a door of mercy for Turkey. The dispute over Kirkuk, which is still a Turkish region within the borders of the national pact and which is still soaked with Turkish blood, may be resolved in favor of Turkey.

If God sends us a foreign minister who could achieve this honorable task without violating the peace and equilibrium in the region, the general view may change a lot.

NSP DEPUTY CRITICIZES DEMIREL FOR RECEIVING OECD AID

TA161656 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 16 Apr 80

[Text] National Salvation Party [NSP] Deputy Leader Recai Kutan has stated his views about the aid to be extended to Turkey within the framework of the OECD. In a statement in Ankara, Kutan said: It is one of the darkest days in the history of our nation when the minority Demirel government has to borrow $1 million from the Grand Duchy of Luxembourg which is about as large as one of our provinces, when in order to get this loan it has to sign a bilateral agreement and give accounts every 3 months about how it is going to spend it.

The NSP deputy leader stressed that the mentality of Turkey's present leaders, who support the West, was causing great suffering to the citizens at this time of anarchy and economic crisis. He added that the nation was aware of how this mentality was damaging Turkey's prestige.

LE SOIR VIEWS PARTY DIFFERENCES OVER SOLVING CRISIS

LD171545 Brussels LE SOIR in French 11 Apr 80 p 2

[P.L. article: "The Parties Are Clearly Divided on How To Resolve the Crisis"]

[Text] The automatic question after the fall of the Martens government and while the king is continuing his first round of political consultations is what is going to happen now. One question springs to mind immediately: Are we moving toward new elections? It appears that the great majority in the political world do not want them. It clearly remains to be seen whether they can be avoided in the relatively short term.

It is still hard to see what can be done to overcome the fundamental problem--the community setback which brought down the Martens government as, moreover, it has brought down most governments since 1970. In Mr Martens' words, there was no longer that minimum of mutual trust for examining the terms of a new agreement. There is even a strong danger that the shock to the community may worsen after this latest crisis. Has the Christian People's Party (CVP) not rejected a regionalization reduced to its simplest form? Has it not, moreover, disowned a prime minister who appeared to be the final politician still to enjoy the trust of both communities?

For the rest, and judging from the political parties' first reactions, the approaches to the problem are immediately very different. You can even see two relatively contradictory schools forming which does not augur well for an easy solution.

On the one hand, certain parties stress economic questions and favor looking into a new arrangement between the main parties. The CVP and the Social Christian Party (PSC) are, in any event, minimizing the seriousness of the crisis. Both Dutch- and French-speaking Social Christians are saying that the two-thirds [majority] was almost achieved. Mr Tindemans even believes that Mr Martens would not have had to resign.

Both these parties, as well as the Liberals and Flemish Socialists, challenge the idea of parallelism, that is, the simultaneous tackling of the community problem and socioeconomic questions.

Certainly these parties do not question the existence of the community problem, but they consider that the latter must not hinder the formation of a new government which would deal with the economic sphere as a priority, even if it means seeking a definitive solution to the institutional reform problem, for example, within some commission or other.

No solution to the recommended government formula has been ruled out, but the general leaning is toward a tripartite coalition of the traditional parties. For its part, the PSC prefers a government of "national union" which, in any event, would have a majority in both great communities. (The PSC sees no need for a majority in each region, which means that it does not require the participation of the French-Speaking Front [FDF], the majority party in Brussels.)

Another Analysis

Other parties present a quite different analysis. This is primarily so with the Socialist Party (PS). In Mr Cools' views, "it seems clear that the CVP does not want to reform the structure of the state and is perfectly happy with its dominant position. The French-speaking parties must draw their own conclusions from that," he feels.

Similarly, in the view of FDF President Spaak, "matters are clear. National-level negotiations are no longer possible. We have experimented with this for 3 years, she says, and it has marked a steady decline in the French community. We must thus plan an alternative formula."

Walloon Rally [RW] President Mordant is saying the same when he states that "the fall of the Martens government is a further demonstration of the CVP's intention to resist any attack on its domination of Brussels and Wallonia via the Belgian state."

A different strategy corresponds to this different analysis. The PSU Bureau has empowered Mr Cools to bring about a reunion of the French-speaking parties. He has invited the latter to discussions this Thursday at 1500. It would thus appear that the French-speaking socialists favor a Francophone front strategy. In an article published recently in this paper, Mr Cools asserted, moreover, that were the transitional reform to fail, all the French-speaking parties, or a broad majority, would have to finalize a community platform before negotiating with the Flemish community and that an eventual agreement would have to be accepted by parliament even before the formation of a new government.

Mrs Spaak, who has already announced that she would answer Mr Cools' invitation, also believes that "an alternative solution must be considered and that the French-speakers must be brought together to establish a joint position which would then enable discussions with the Flemish community." Mr Mordant also fears that without this harmony between all the French-speakers the situation will become even worse. However, Mr Cools has not abandoned the weapons represented for the French speakers by this demand for a strict parallelism between socioeconomic measures and state reform. This parallelism is indispensable, he recalled. This contradicts what both Flemish and French-speaking Social Christians have asserted.

French Speakers Divided on Strategy

Moreover, the division within the French-speaking parties exceeds this tactical question. It relates to the fundamental strategy to be adopted since the PSC and, to a lesser extent the PRL [presumably party of Walloon Reform and Liberty], have questioned the advisability of this Francophone front strategy advocated by the PS, FDF and RW, at least in the immediate future.

The coming together between the French-speaking parties is, for the moment, no solution, Mr Vanden Boeynants asserted. Indeed, the PSC has taken the precaution in this respect of announcing its refusal to associate itself with any eventual initiative which is outside the legal framework. A clear allusion to the eventual states general of the French community. For its part, the PRL does not exclude coordination between the French-speaking parties, but it believes that there must first be dealings with the country's most representative political forces.

In brief, the idea put forward by some for the rapid formation of either a tripartite or a "national union" government seems henceforth difficult to achieve so long as the French-speaking socialists cling to the Francophone front strategy. Without the PS or the FDF-RW no government can have a significant majority within the country's French community, as the PSC demands.

You can, of course, expect a progressive harmonization of these various positions, especially if all the French-speaking parties are at Mr Cools' Wednesday meeting. At first sight there remain all the elements of a prolonged deadlock, and on the first day of the crisis it is hard to see which is the way out. Within this context there are few observers who rule out the possibility, in the relatively short term, of having to resort to consulting the electorate.

LAMBSDORFF: U.S. PARTNERS MUST PROVE SOLIDARITY ON IRAN

ID171320 Hamburg DPA in German 1250 GMT 17 Apr 80

[Text] Bonn--In the words of Federal Economics Minister Otto Graf Lambsdorff, the Federal Government proceeds from the premise that "in any event" the majority of the European partners would decide on boycott measures against Iran if, "against expectations," the EC did not adopt a common stand. The minister said in today's Bundestag debate on the economy that the time had now come at which the partners of the United States must prove their solidarity through "actions and deeds."

Lambsdorff said that it was not a "pleasant" task for an economics minister to announce economic sanctions. But from the standpoint of minimizing risks, the Federal Government considered it necessary to reach a decision. It would do what was necessary and required of it. However, one must not go down on one's knees as soon as some wickedness is announced, "as otherwise we will never get off our knees".

TECHNICIANS' FAMILIES TO BE EVACUATED FROM IRAN

ID171240 Hamburg DPA in German 1227 GMT 17 Apr 80

[Text] Tehran/Bonn--The wives and children of German technicians working in Iran are to leave the country within the next few days. This was announced in Tehran today by the press attache of the German Embassy, Herbert Honsowitz.

It is estimated that there are still 1,300 Federal German citizens in Iran. The German Embassy has recommended that they leave unless their presence is urgently necessary. The recommendation follows a meeting in the Bonn Foreign Ministry on 11 April with representatives of the firms concerned.

It was learned from the embassy that there are no plans to evacuate embassy staff. Ambassador Gerhard Ritzel is currently in the Federal Republic for consultations with the government.

SCHMIDT REVIVES IDEA OF 3-YEAR MORATORIUM ON WEAPONS

ID171952 Hamburg DPA in German 1750 GMT 17 Apr 80

[Text] Bonn-Duesseldorf--At his press conference in Duesseldorf today Chancellor Schmidt once again explained his recent proposal to the effect that the next 3 years before the stationing of modern medium-range missiles in West Europe be used for negotiations on arms control. In the chancellor's view, it might thus be possible to prevent the USSR from extending its big lead still further and deploying 150 modern SS-20 missiles by 1983.

A report on the press conference by the Federal Press Office emphasizes that in connection with the discussion of his disarmament proposal the chancellor laid particular stress on Bonn's adherence to the NATO decisions of last December. According to the report of the Federal Press Office, Schmidt said the proposal was "clearly based in every respect on the twofold decision of December 1979 which we ourselves helped to achieve and to which we adhere emphatically."

According to the report, Schmidt stressed that when making his recent proposal he permitted himself to express the idea which he, like Federal Foreign Minister Genscher and others, had raised in public as early as last fall: that the USSR would not deploy any further modern medium-range weapons during the next 3 years as was already the case in the West. "I expressly suggested a period of 3 years for this." During this period the following would apply to both sides: One negotiates but one does not deploy. In his view this would be a fair solution for both sides.

Only what could be effectively verified during the 3 years, that is, the operational deployment of the weapons, the Press Office says, would be left undone. "The aim of reviving our considerations of last fall is to pave the way for negotiations on medium-range missiles between the United States and the USSR," Schmidt said.

SCHMIDT COMMENTS ON PROBABILITY OF INTER-GERMAN SUMMIT

LD171734 Hamburg DPA in German 1645 GMT 17 Apr 80

[Text] Duesseldorf--Chancellor Schmidt may meet SED Chief Erich Honecker even before the 5 October Bundestag election. At a press conference in Duesseldorf today, Schmidt replied to a question on whether this meeting will take place "before long" [demnaechst] by saying that if the term is used flexibly the answer is "yes." Whether the date will precede the Bundestag election is "difficult to predict." Both sides are interested in the meeting, which will certainly take place, Schmidt said a few hours after his talk in Bonn with leading SED politician Guenter Mittag.

A meeting of "the two Germans" (Schmidt and Honecker) is "of great value by itself" but it is for the two world powers, the United States and the USSR, to move the world situation toward dampening the mounting perils. Nor is the chancellor's visit to the USSR, which was arranged 2 years ago, a substitute for this. Schmidt made it clear that it has not yet been decided whether he will go to Moscow this summer. However, the chancellor said, a meeting with Honecker is not a prerequisite. A visit to Moscow should rather be preceded by "very careful coordination" with the Western friends and allies.

Schmidt, who had had a talk lasting well over an hour with North Rhine Westphalian Premier Rau before the press conference, described his talk with Mittag, which lasted nearly 2 hours, as "very useful." Mittag has the "authority of an expert" and was also able to speak competently on Honecker's behalf. Their talk extended considerably beyond the subject of inter-German trade. People in the GDR also have their worries regarding the changed world situation. The chancellor refused to go into details about the GDR's assessment.

CHANCELLOR DEFINES STANCE ON INTERNATIONAL PROBLEMS

DW161100 Bonn Bulletin of the SPD Executive Board in German 15 Apr 80 pp 1-10

[Excerpts from speech by Chancellor Helmut Schmidt at an election campaign meeting in Essen on 12 April]

[Text] World political and peace policy worries dominate my mind very much, and I am aware that many of you have similar anxieties. I would like to talk about this quite calmly and objectively first.

A few days ago I read in one of the world's most renowned journals on political science, the U.S. journal FOREIGN AFFAIRS, the treatise by an American scientist on the analogy of the present world situation to that of 1914. He compared the dangers of the present world situation with the dangers of the summer of 1914 after the assassination at Sarajevo. It seems to me that this comparison is not entirely erroneous even if the process in these months which we are now going through is proceeding differently and much more slowly than it did then. There are other respects in which the situation is not identical either. At the time there were five great European powers--Russia, Austria-Hungary, the German Empire, France, England--whereas today there are two world powers and their respective allies. There is a third world power rising which, however, would like to stay aloof from everything as long as possible, and that is China, and there is a large group of neutral and nonaligned states especially in the Third World, in Africa, in Asia, in Latin America.

At the time, in 1914, neither Austria-Hungary nor the German Empire, neither Russia nor France nor England, none of these states really wanted World War I, but each country naturally advocated its own intersts, including its prestige interests, and none of these countries at the time put itself adequately into the position of the interests of the other and viewed the situation with the eyes of the other party as well. Finally, all the former European powers became entangled in the logic of the military calculation, and thus came World War I with its hecatombs of casualties even though none of the countries had really wanted this war.

Surely many things are different today. Surely the military aspect, the military, do not play a decisive role in the present world powers or in our country either. Yet military thinking plays too great a role nevertheless, especially in the Soviet Union. Today the two world powers are aware and want to avoid war. But it seems to me that both of them lack an adequate war-avoiding strategy. They are not talking frankly enough with each other about their objectives, about their needs.

At present four hotbeds of crisis exist simultaneously in the world: first, in the Middle East with the quarrel over the rights of the Palestinians; secondly, the taking of hostages in Tehran which has lasted for a quarter of a year now; thirdly, there is the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan; and fourthly, there is the danger of another large-scale arms race. I intend to say something about all four hotbeds of danger in sequence and, in doing so, put myself into the position of all parties involved, because only in this way is one capable of thinking up solutions for the conflicts.

I want to say one thing quite plainly in advance: we Germans, especially we Social Democrats, are not neutral spectators in all this. We are aware that we are part of the Western, the democratic, party in the world. We are aware that the core of our security, especially the core of the security of Berlin, lies in our alliance with the United States. We in particular are not neutral arbiters. We are affected by all four conflicts.

Even he who harbors serious doubts about the expediency of this or that word that has been uttered, of this or that move made in a capital allied or friendly with us, even if it were in Washington, all of us know that the alliance with the Americans, the backing by the United States alone maintains the balance in Europe and in the rest of the world. And only on the basis of the equal weight of the military forces of East and West can equal security be maintained for all concerned. Only on this basis can peace be lastingly preserved for all parties involved.

Concerning the Middle East, there it is particularly hard for us Germans to suggest possibilities for solutions, what with our most recent past. Let me cite Auschwitz as a catchword for a terrible chapter of our more recent history. Nevertheless we, like many peoples in the whole world, are urgently interested in seeing the conflict over Palestine solved. I cannot but repeatedly express my respect for the courage of Egyptian President as-Sadat who, after four wars waged between his people and the Israeli people, voluntarily went to Jerusalem, criticized by nearly all his Arab friends, to open the door to enduring peace in the Middle East.

We Germans, who advocate the right to self-determination for all Germans, logically cannot but advocate the right to self-determination for all peoples on the globe. From this it follows that we must likewise advocate the right to self-determination for the Palestinians. We have been saying this for quite some time now. Yet we have also said all the time, to begin with primarily: A comprehensive, durable peace in the Middle East presupposes the right of the State of Israel to live within recognized and secure borders.

We know that a late May deadline has been set for the conclusion of the negotiations between Begin and As-Sadat on autonomy for the Palestinians. It is obvious that the Israeli settlement policy--I am extremely careful in choosing my way of putting it--in that respect constitutes a great impediment. It is obvious that viewed from the angle of Baghdad or Riyadh, from the angle of all other Arab capitals, "Zionism" as they call it seems to be an enemy which is more important to them, an enemy which is more important to Islam and to the Arabs at large than the Soviet Union which has invaded Afghanistan or than the communism supported by the Soviet Union.

I said that for historical reasons, for moral reasons, we Germans can contribute little toward the solution of this conflict. But by the same token we do not have the right to be cowardly toward our Israeli friends. We must tell them that it is in their own peace interest to achieve a durable, comprehensive peace in the Middle East. The whole world is interested in this, because this is one of the hotbeds of crisis which allows the comparison with 1914.

Concerning the taking of hostages in Tehran: The day before yesterday the nine foreign ministers of the European Community--jointly, by the way, with the foreign ministers of all states of the European Council--in Lisbon once again dealt with the hostage-taking crisis. We have decided to have our ambassadors in Tehran make representations once again and to subsequently call them back to our capitals to take counsel on what ought to be done.

In this respect, too, it is necessary to put oneself into the position of all parties involved--first of all into the position of the American nation. Just imagine what grave thoughts bothered us when terrorists in our country criminally killed several people, when in our country terrorists kidnapped one single man, Dr Hanns Martin Schleyer, and held him for 5 weeks just to kill him then after all, when in our country 80 to 90 vacationers from Mallorca were kidnzpped aboard a plane and abducted first to Italy, then to Arab states and finally as far as to East Africa. What bitterness, what frustration, what temptation to toy with bad ideas of violating the law oneself occurred in our own people at the time. We resisted all this. We abided by law and the Constitution. We also had a little luck, when I think of the people aboard the plane in Mogadishu.

It is necessary to recall all this to mind now, and the Americans have had to endure it for more than 150 days. Their hostages in Tehran are shown on television every day. They have spent a long, long time in patience and self-discipline. I can only view with great inner sympathy, with profound commiseration, the American's behavior to date.

We advised them against military actions against Iran. So far we have also advised them against economic sanctions, even though we had declared our readiness since the beginning of 1980 to participate in them, being perfectly aware that it would hit us harder than the United States itself. But we did say this: If it has to be, then please jointly with all Europeans, with the Japanese and with other friendly states.

We advised them thusly because we fail to find the center of rain in the same spot in Iran as the center of decision, in the same brain. Those in Iran who would have to suffer under sanctions are not the ones who can make decisions there. It is quite doubtful to me whether the Ayatollah Khomeyni is really the decisionmaking center, whether there is such a thing as a decisionmaking center at all. It is clear to me, however, that anyone welcoming the severance of diplomatic relations between their state and a world power with a howl of joy, as happened in Tehran the other day, does not seem to me to be particularly marked by responsibility for world peace.

But we must also put ourselves into the position of the Iranians, and various camps exist in that country. Obviously there is a vast majority which in part was persecuted by the shah's regime or in part calls for revenge today out of sympathy with those persecuted. There is a Revolution Council which obviously is not in harmony within itself. Some of the members see the economic chaos coming for Iran and therefore would like to put an end to the political chaos. Then there is the so-called revolutionary leader Khomeyni who is a man, at any rate, who exploits the popular ire which he himself keeps fanning as a lightning rod for the continually profound disorder in his own country. Then there are the so-called students who have the hostages in their power. What they are in reality is a strictly quasi-militarily organized band. And then there is the president, Bani-Sadr, for the first time freely elected after a long period, who is justice-minded and would like to put an end to the injustice of the kidnapping, but who is powerless in his own country.

All this makes it clear that it is in the interest of solving the conflict and in the interest of the lives of the hostages--for several days there have been threats that their lives might be taken--for domestic developments in Iran not to be plunged into further disorder but instead for an internal stabilization of that state to be promoted.

In considering of all this we must also put ourselves into the position of the Soviet Union. Unfortunately it only happened once, at the very beginning, that the Soviet Union advocated the release of the hostages before the United Nations in New York. Unfortunately it was only once--and I say this with an inner moral accusation addressed to the Soviet Union. I realize that the Soviet Union naturally views the Iranian crisis with different eyes than we do, since Iran is located at its own doorstep. The Soviet Armed Forces along the Iranian border are prepared for intervention. The matter would become particularly dangerous if and when the United States were to intervene militarily, because in that case the Soviet leadership would be faced with the question of what to do. In any event, by invading Afghanistan it has essentially improved its military starting position for an intervention in Iran. The Soviet Union is exercising a great deal of restraint in bringing pressure to bear on Iran. It completely refrains from sanctions in the hostage-taking, obviously because it hopes that sanctions against Iran will lead to a point where the latter might come to lean on the Soviet Union politically and economically.

Again the interests of the Europeans are different. We are interested in seeing that the system of justice in the world, international law, human rights is preserved and that people in government not regard the taking of hostages as being legal. It is our interest that world peace not be jeopardized there.

I add with less emphasis but just as clearly that, we Europeans are also interested in the continuation of our oil supply from the Persian Gulf. At this point I shall add in parentheses: if warlike events there should lead to a situation where basic parts of the oil supply for the world in general and Europe in particular are lost, then some people who today are preventing the construction of new coal-fed power stations and new nuclear power plants will be very quiet. Under these circumstances they would depend on more electricity from the wall sockets--for example, for heating their own apartments with electric heaters--than is being consumed today.

Considering all this we Europeans naturally are also interested in the preservation of the solidarity with the American people, because of the security reasons I referred to earlier.

The foreign ministers who made their statement on the hostage crisis in Lisbon the day before yesterday, at the same time made an utterance on Afghanistan--the third hotbed of crisis which I want to discuss--just as 104 states of the whole world did before Christmas in the United Nations.

The Soviet Union says that viewed from its own position, what this involves is the need to satisfy its own security requirements through the invasion of Afghanistan. If this was or is a genuine security requirement of the Soviet Union, then it is exaggerated in any case, and the Soviet Union just cannot do away with the comparisons with the invasion of Hungary in 1956 and the invasion of Czechoslovakia a decade later. It may be that the Soviet leadership believed after the successful military intrusions in Angola, Ethiopia, Cambodia and Southeast Asia that the world would also accept the invitations of Afghanistan and proceed to business as usual. This was a serious miscalculation. The matter is not made any better by the fact that the Soviet Union now, post facto, masquerades or cloaks the occupation with a state treaty with a government which it installed itself. Should it stay in Afghanistan, however, then this will be an important success for its prestige in the eyes of the Third World states, which are bound to wonder whether it would not be better to yield to Soviet threats from the outset, since nobody can help them in the long run anyway.

The immediate neighbors--Pakistan, India, Iran--even the People's Republic of China and all of Asia are obviously urgently interested in a diplomatic solution of the Afghanistan crisis. We Europeans and the United States also have a great interest, a peace interest, in solving this crisis diplomatically. It cannot be accepted.

If one visualizes the map of the world and how it looked in 1960 and how it looks today, 20 years later, if one marks in red where communist troops, Soviet troops or allied troops of the Soviets, were stationed and how many more places they are stationed in today--particularly troops of the small communist state Cuba which have been transported with Soviet planes to all kind of places in Africa--and if one makes a comparison, then one knows that this cannot be accepted and that it must be contained. But even such hotheads, who do exist in the West and who want to contain this or act against it with military power, even they know if they have looked at the map that Afghanistan is harder to reach with military power than the Antarctic and the South Pole.

Therefore, on the one hand, diplomatic and military pressure on the Soviet Union are necessary, while, on the other hand, one must carefully consider what should be done simultaneously to permit the Soviet Union, a world power, to save face and retain its security if it retires. The Soviet Union also wants to be certain that no other troops will invade Afghanistan if it withdraws.

For this reason we have suggested, together with the other eight partners of the European Community and later support by the Southeast Asian group of states, that the sovereignty, territorial inviolability and noninterference vis-a-vis Afghanistan will be guaranteed, and that the nonaligned state of Afghanistan will be recognized by identical guarantee statements from its neighbor states (India, Pakistan, China, Iran) and by the two world powers, the United States and the Soviet Union. Both things belong together: measures to preserve Soviet security and save Soviet face and pressure on the Soviet Union.

The United States suggested with regard to the latter purpose that we all not take part in the summer Olympic games in Moscow. We have taken a very clear stance with regard to this from the very beginning. We have said that it is up to the Soviet Union to establish conditions permitting all to take part in the summer Olympic games in Moscow. Second, we have said that such conditions would not exist as long as military action in a foreign country continues.

I must say today that they still do not exist and we do not have much time left any more to draw the consequences from the continuing situation.

With regard to German interests I would very much like to stress one point: As few treaties as there are under international law among countries on having Olympic games, there are indeed treaties on cooperation in other fields--in particular there is a long-term agreement on economic cooperation between the Soviet Union and us. It is in our German interests that we adhere very closely and most exactly to these treaties.

After all that happened in the middle of this century, Germany must be a realiable treaty partner vis-a-vis all friends, comrades, partners and neighbors even if we do not like some of the things they do. We Germans have a vital interest in the cooperation of the states in Europe.

We know that this will work only if the military balance between the states of Europe is preserved. This is, by the way, also in the interest of the other European states in the West and in the East. The German federal chancellor does not have the right to make statements on behalf of the Hungarians, Poles, Czechs, Slovaks and Germans in the GDR. But I feel very secure in saying that in all the countries and their governments I just have mentioned, as well as in the states of Western Europe, a very strong awareness exists of the necessity to preserve and not endanger the balance and cooperation between East and West.

The leadership of the GDR sees it similarly, and I am happy to say in this connection that recently we prepared the contents of a new agreement. It envisages additional new traffic projects, particularly those which will promote traffic between Berlin and West Germany. This treaty will come into effect in the near future.

I come to the fourth hotbed of danger, the great danger of a new and extensive arms race. This is also very clearly realized by us Europeans on both sides. On the one hand, we must continue to press for the Soviet Union as well as the U.S. Senate to ratify the SALT II treaty, which will establish a balance in the field of long-range nuclear-strategic missiles. I know that at present this is mainly a demand on our American friends. On the other hand, we must expect from the Soviet Union that it will be prepared to negotiate on a bilateral limitation of nuclear medium-range arms.

The Soviet Union upset the balance beginning 2 years ago and it disturbs it everyweek. Every week new missiles with three nuclear warheads are being added, every month 2 1/2 medium-range bombers are being added without anything happening on the Western side except preparations for closing the arms gap. By the time we catch up 2, 3 or 4 years will have passed because of technological reasons; that is a dangerous matter.

The Soviet Union says it is prepared to negotiate, but only if the West will rescind its decision. In the meantime, it wants to continue building a missile every week and 2½ planes a month. That will not do. A first possible step for solving this crisis could be for both states to simultaneously renounce for a certain number of years the production of new additional or more modern medium-range missiles, so that this interim period of years can be used for negotiations on bilateral limitation--limitation to a balance on a lower level.

I know that some rightist critics in our country and elsewhere in the West will object to this suggestion, saying that it disregards the superiority of the Soviet Union in the field of medium-range arms that already exists. That is true. However, what already exists in the way of the Soviet Union's preponderance and what is added to it every week and every month would increase anyway in the next 3 years even more than it has today. So we would not run any additional risk.

It is clear with regard to this question and other questions I have been dealing with that Soviet propaganda is attempting to split Europe and America. Consequently, it is necessary to cope with this danger.

There is another danger of a split in Europe. I have in mind the really depressing financial problem of our English friends who are indeed unable to raise the funds they are obligated to pay to the European Community, because of their relatively poor economic situation. We are prepared to take something additional out of our pocket to help. But we cannot supply as much as the English believe they need. We cannot be the only ones to help either. We alone cannot cope with the financial problems of Europe.

We also need to know that even if all were disposed to help, we would not be able to satisfy all English wishes. Even then the other European Community countries need to be certain that the principles of the Community will not be destroyed. They must also be certain that in the other disputed problems that have been smoldering for a long time--be it joint fishery policy, common energy policy or the mutton quarrel between England and France--solutions will be found simultaneously. Particularly the growing agrarian expenditures of the European Community must be limited at the same time.

There is also the danger of a split within the Western alliance. Recently we were happy to see that a small partial conflict between Greece and Turkey could be ended--I have the airspace issue in mind. But there are also other conflicts. Our alliance partner Turkey is in great economic difficulties and here, too, through our financial sacrifices, we are helping a great deal. Every mark we give, to the European Community, to the Turkish friends, for example, or the Afghanistan refugees in Pakistan, cannot be spent here at the same time, be it for schools, hospitals, environmental protection or other necessities that worry us and that must be satisfied. All these are real sacrifices we make in the interest of preserving peace in the world.

Despite all this there are also positive signs. That the two world powers are speaking to each other again must be assessed positively. I welcome that. I welcome that Secretary of State Vance and Foreign Minister Gromyko will meet next month in Vienna. It is necessary that they speak to each other. We have tried for a long time over and over again to warmly recommend this, to both sides. It is necessary that in the fall of this year the conference take place in Madrid where all 35 states of Europe and North America which took part in the first CSCE conference in Helsinki 5 years ago will be present. Maybe that will result in a European disarmament conference which then could also lead to a limitation of medium-range arms.

I particularly welcome the great success that has been achieved by thinking along the lines of a constitutional right in Rhodesia, in Zimbabwe. That is a great achievement for English diplomacy. Our development aid for Zimbabwe is underway. Our recognition under international law is in the immediate offing. Our foreign minister will make a visit there next week.

All these are contributions to the urgently needed end to racial discrimination in the southern part of Africa.

In summarizing our interests we find the following: Our primary interest is to preserve peace. Our second interest is to preserve cooperation in our nation divided as it is--and not to allow it to be torn apart even more seriously in an increasing world confrontation, more seriously than has been the case so far.

We are interested in preserving the cooperation among the peoples and states of Western and Eastern Europe and in developing it further. We know that we can maintain these German interests only together with the partners of the European Community and together with the partners of the North Atlantic alliance.

We know that a prerequisite for this is the military balance to which we make an important contribution with our Bundeswehr, we also make important contributions to the balance politically and in matters of financial policy. Without our contributions the balance could not be maintained.

But we also know--and now I quote Federal Minister of Defense Hans Apel--that despite all this it is important to fight for reason, for rationality in relations between peoples and states, for commonsense. And we know that it is important--and now I quote Hans Apel a second time--to preserve the predictability of our own policy, the long-term predictability of German foreign, security and peace policies.

Hans Apel has said: "Propaganda guns are fired very quickly, but if the desired effects do not take place, what guns should then help developments go on?"

It is good that in such a situation we Germans have such a contemplative commander of our armed forces who is looking after peace. Matters could look completely different next year and the year thereafter if we do not do our duty. In this situation we Germans cannot afford to make gestures of strength. We do not need any vigorous signs of our unshakable determination. We are fed up with that!

We do not need any actionism or pseudo-actionism. We cannot afford agitation, nor do we want to afford accomodation. If we want to hinder, to the extent we are able--our power is not great, but it is not zero either--we want to hinder, and must hinder a development like that which began in 1914, then we need cool and considered reason. We need our friends and alliance comrades to consider us reliable. We need our neighbors in the East to find us predictable. They should not have to expect unpredictable action on our part. We need a will for peace which towers over everything--not just stated every 4 weeks in the Bundestag, not just stated publicly every 4 weeks. It must be stated every week, every day in a variety of ways and very frequently outside official reports in many small documents, letters, telephone conversations and spheres of influence. Peace must be made anew every day!

BONN CIRCLES SPECULATE ON MOSCOW'S INVITATION TO SCHMIDT

ID171202 Hamburg DPA in German 1118 GMT 17 Apr 80

[Text] Bonn--Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt is clearly prepared for the meeting with Soviet party leader Leonid Brezhnev, proposed by the Soviet leadership for the early summer, only if it results in progress in efforts to find a way out of the international crisis situation, especially Afghanistan.

Circles close to Schmidt mentioned as a prerequisite for a visit by the chancellor to Moscow that the talks with Brezhnev could produce "useful formulae aimed at progress" on some points of international politics. The chancellor's decision as to whether to accept the offer to visit Moscow in June was described as "open". It would take time.

There are no indications in Bonn that Schmidt would await Soviet reaction to the recommendation expected next week by the Federal Government on a boycott of the Olympic games in Moscow before replying to the date recently proposed by the Soviet ambassador in Bonn, Vladimir Semenov. Government circles have in recent days expressed the fear that Bonn's boycott decision could lead to a hard reaction by the Soviets and thus to a worsening of German-Soviet relations.

Within Federal Government circles it is not considered impossible, though unlikely, that Moscow made the invitation to the chancellor with certain reservations, and that after Bonn's vote on an Olympic boycott would rescind its proposal. Observers see Moscow's invitation to Schmidt, which has been on the table since May 1978, yet offered just before Bonn's official decision on an Olympic boycott, as a sign of readiness for serious talks by the Soviet leadership.

Informed circles in Bonn emphasize at the same time the chancellor's continuing interest in a dialogue with the Soviet leadership and recall that Schmidt has repeatedly emphasized the need for talks, especially in times of crisis. If certain prerequisites for the Moscow visit are fulfilled, and if, like the chancellor, one proceeded from the risks and dangers of the current world situation, then the opportunity for talks should be utilized.

Although it is assumed in Bonn that Schmidt discussed Moscow's invitation with President Carter on Tuesday, it was said in government circles that Washington's stand on this matter was not yet known.

COLUMNIST SEES 'PITFALLS' IN SCHMIDT TRIP TO MOSCOW

DW171138 Munich SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG in German 17 Apr 80 p 4

[Commentary signed Dr.: "Invitation to Moscow"]

[Text] Only Helmut Schmidt alone could not have been surprised by Leonid Brezhnev's invitation to the chancellor to visit him before the end of this summer. The chancellor has surrounded his contacts with the Kremlin with extreme discretion, one might even say secretiveness. Meanwhile, the result has probably satisfied him. Hardly anybody would have deemed it possible in this present crisis situation, in which relations between East and West have been nearly frozen, that the German chancellor would receive an invitation to come to Moscow. Schmidt will interpret this as a success for his policy of graduated concert with the United States.

Yet the envisaged journey harbors all sorts of traps and pitfalls. Its critics will suspiciously watch whether Schmidt will allow the Soviets to have their new possession, Afghanistan, sanctioned by this gesture. [paragraph continues]

The chancellor will also have to refute the charge that he and the SPD top echelon want to court the Soviet Union as the strongest world power. Finally, it is obvious that the Soviets have been trying for quite some time, through an offensive to court the Europeans in general and the Federal Republic in particular, to soften the December NATO decision as well as the boycott of the Olympic games.

Consequently arms control talks will be the most ticklish point of the negotiations. As zealously as the government spokesmen interpret the chancellor speeches in Essen and Hamburg, the texts prove that Schmidt has left open the period for the mutual waiver of the deployment of additional medium-range weapons. Something like this does not unintentionally happen twice to a politician who phrases his utterances as precisely as does Schmidt. The Soviets may (and are intended to) understand this as a hint that Schmidt is prepared to discuss the arms gap closure by the West as well, albeit with the objective of a balance on a lower level.

COMMERICAL RELATIONS WITH USSR UNAFFECTED BY U.S. EMBARGO

LD171717 Hamburg DPA in German 1614 GMT 17 Apr 80

[Excerpt] Hanover--Soviet exhibitors at the Hanover Fair do not consider that the U.S. embargo has as yet impaired the commercial climate between the Federal Republic and the USSR. "Everything is proceeding normally," a Soviet spokesman told journalists in Hanover today. The range of orders is as great as last year. Intensive negotiations offer the prospect of substantial deals. According to the spokesman they are likely to amount to several million marks.

SPD'S EHMKE VIEWS NEED FOR SOLIDARITY, WORLD EVENTS

DW171305 Bonn DIE WELT in German 17 Apr 80 p 5

[W. Hertz-Eichenrode and Gottfried Capell undated interview with Horst Ehmke, deputy chairman of the SPD Bundestag Group, in Bonn]

[Text] WELT: Professor Ehmke, is the relationship between the Europeans and the Americans and the relationship between the FRG and its protective power experiencing a crisis of confidence?

Ehmke: No, especially since we assess and condemn the act of terror against the American hostages and the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan just as the Americans do. But we have to watch out lest the political-psychological cohesion of the alliance be harmed. To this end we may have to support a position the Americans take even when we have doubts about its expediency. But this also holds true the other way around. At the moment the discussion is progressing as if the question of solidarity were just a matter concerning the Europeans--which is wrong. We have to tell the American friends that we understand when you tell us that we need to heed to public opinion in the United States. But likewise we must say to them: You, too, must know that we in Europe also have something like a public opinion, and it would be bound to harm the cohesion of the alliance if the impression were to arise in Europe that the U.S. Government is primarily demonstrating its strength in this world political crisis in the way in which it exerts influence on its allies. This may trigger a negative reaction in the European public. In political-moral respects the difference between NATO and the Warsaw Pact is, among other things, the very fact that we are allies and not satellites.

WELT: Do you mean to say that Carter is mostly showing strength toward the allies?

Ehmke: No, but it is necessary to make sure on both sides of the ocean that we do not pretend that speedy solutions are possible in this dual Afghanistan/Iran crisis, whereas it is a very difficult situation where we are at a certain loss for answers. And we must avoid beginning to accuse each other if a speedy solution does not materialize. This would be the worst thing we could do. It is no shame to admit that these problems cannot be solved right away.

WELT: Do you sense at the campaign meetings that feelings in our country are changing?

Ehmke: Yes. At campaign meetings and also in other conversations we sometimes face the task of preventing the criticism of the guests--in part justified criticism--against U.S. measures or neglects from turning into cheap anti-American feelings. By the same token the American friends must be careful to prevent anyone in their country allowing themselves cheap anti-European feelings. It is my impression, besides, that there is great approval among the people of the Federal Republic for the calm and circumspect style of the chancellor.

WELT: Do you interpret this approval as the people's criticism against the Americans' measures?

Ehmke: No, but there is widespread concern among our people and in Europe that things which could ultimately do more harm than good might be done. Surely this is a vague feeling, but it does exist.

WELT: Is there any limit to our solidarity with the United States as far as you are concerned?

Ehmke: I believe that if we talk sensibly with each other we will not do anything in the alliance that will harm us more than the others. Take for example, the economic boycott against Iran, which will be limited already since there is no intention of imposing it on all Arab states. Here we must be careful lest we unleash a serious economic crisis through boycott measures, because our boycott might not be answered by Iran alone but possibly also by other Arab states, as we can see in the sensitive field of crude oil and natural gas.

WELT: Caution helps avoid damage being done?

Ehmke: It is necessary to insure that we will not, by the, at best, limited effects of boycott measures, cause incidental effects which will harm the West more than our measures will do good. This is not a "limit of solidarity." I fail to see that the Americans themselves would do a thing like this. It is the limit of commonsense. This can only be a common line in the alliance.

WELT: Do you assess the boycott threat by the Algerians and Libyans against the United States and, in further consequence, also against Europe as an option than must be taken seriously?

Ehmke: It would be very dangerous not to take this seriously in a situation which is so emotionally charged, which is not only connected with the hostages in Tehran but in this particular case is aimed specifically at the Middle East policy, the unsolved Israeli-Arab conflict. It would be dangerous to belittle it. The chancellor is also concerned that we might slide into something like in 1914--more easily than we could subsequently get out of it again.

WELT: Does the danger of war exist?

Ehmke: No, but we are threatening to slide into an escalation and we do not know where it might end up. What now exists is a situation of amalgamated conflicts. It is dangerous to release further emotions. If this boomerangs directly on Europe we will be the first to suffer--though we will not be the only one. Therefore I believe that we must maintain a particularly cool head. [paragraph continues]

It must be beyond any doubt that our place is at the side of the United States. There must be leadership in the alliance as well. Leadership is not simply the opposite of inactivity. Leading means convincing. In a democratic alliance leadership is based on the power to convince and not on the snappiness of leading the way and demanding obedience. What is most important now is to find a common line of which we can assume that it will be useful and in no case do any harm.

WELT: Could we not concede that it is the experience of the Americans that they can only induce the Europeans to exercise solidarity by simply confronting them with establishing facts?

Ehmke: No, but it is necessary to emphasize time and time again that the Americans are confronted with an extremely difficult situation, and so are we together with them. I ask myself, however, whether it would not be possible to do more in those fields where we could do something directly, for example: What is our position toward the rebels in Afghanistan? There has been no official statement on this issue in the West.

WELT: You mean we should support the mojahedin?

Ehmke: We must look into it, in any event. The second affair which is very difficult--also especially for the Americans is the Israeli-Palestinian relationship. Do we really have as much time as we are now obviously taking to help in this respect? It is obvious that we cannot force anything. The third question is the military presence in the Near and Middle East. When I read, for instance, that Senator Jackson has suggested setting up a defense alliance there in such a way that the Arab state put up the soldiers and the Americans supply the arms, then I can only say that it will not work if the United States extricates itself from the Vietnam and Watergate shocks and again consciously wants to assume its role as a great power. Then it must also create its own means of power for achieving this end. In that case the Americans will have no alternative but to revert to general conscription. They cannot recruit in other countries the soldiers they need for their worldwide presence.

WELT: The Americans have kept open military measures for themselves in the Iranian crisis. Do you think that they have reasonable possibilities in this respect at all?

Ehmke: There can be no military action to liberate the hostages like that of the Israelis at Entebbe or what we did at Mogadishu. If that were tried under the conditions existing in Tehran, one would rather have to fear that none of the hostages would survive. A possibility such as mining the Gulf would remain. We have no great fear that we would be unable to get oil in such an event. That is a factor also; but the action reservations against military actions are different: They can push Iran onto the Soviet Union's side. These reservations have already led to a debate in the British House of Commons. Callaghan has demanded and Prime Minister Thatcher agreed that no military action may take place without a summit conference taking place beforehand.

WELT: Professor Ehmke, when will the federal chancellor go to Moscow?

Ehmke: No date is yet in sight.

WELT: News reports say that the federal chancellor will go to Moscow prior to the Bundestag elections?

Ehmke: That is possible, but that is speculation.

WELT: Do you believe that a recommendation from the federal chancellor to join the Olympic boycott would rule out a visit by the federal chancellor to Moscow?

Ehmke: That could be. I do not know. We have once again discussed the Olympic boycott. We of the SPD have different opinions about that. I am not certain it would be a correct decision, even if we do join it. I ask myself whether it would not be wiser to go there; it would be the first time that about 100,000 visitors from the free world came to the Soviet capital as well as about 1,000 Western journalists. I believe it would have given us a better opportunity to voice our opinion on everything than by not going there.

WELT: You do not weigh the moral criteria of the boycott?

Ehmke: It would be a moral criterion if one went to Moscow to talk and to take part in the competitions without, however, going to the official receptions.

WELT: Soviet Ambassador Semenov has spoken with a certain threatening undertone of the repercussions an Olympic boycott would have on relations between the FRG and the Soviet Union. Do you take that seriously?

Ehmke: Yes. I also take the announcement by the GDR seriously that there could be difficulties in inter-German sports relations. It would be reckless to disregard that.

WELT: Yet the decision to join the boycott of the Americans is firm?

Ehmke: Yes. We cannot leave America alone as the leading power of our alliance and as a protective power for Berlin. But we must not shout hooray and always try to be the best in the class.

WELT: Let us discuss the problem of security here in Europe. More and more often your party calls the NATO decision to close the arms gap a rearmament decision. What is your comment on that?

Ehmke: First I want to mention something completely different. NATO's ability to act in December 1979 was very much based on the SPD's ability to act.

WELT: Was it evidence of cohesion that the federal chancellor had to say at the Berlin party congress approximately the following: Comrades, you are pushing my back to the wall, but you must not go any further because then you would deprive me of the ability to act?

Ehmke: That was in connection with energy policy. Regarding NATO's decision to close the arms gap, I was surprised by the great majority at our Berlin party congress. Our idea at that time was that in about 6 months the SALT II treaty would be ratified. Then the SALT III round would come and negotiations would also deal with limiting medium-range missiles in Europe. But the U.S. Senate has not ratified SALT II, so our actual problem now is: Will there be a beginning of negotiations on medium-range missiles at all? I find what the federal chancellor suggested and what the SPD Presidium supported on Monday in Berlin to be very good. The federal chancellor said roughly that it would be good if at least the stationing of more medium-range missiles could be ended.

WELT: Is that not a violation of the Brussels NATO decision on closing the arms gap?

Ehmke: No. That is a repeated and newly formulated appeal to the Soviet Union to stop now at least the stationing of further SS-20 missiles. The creation of a climate for negotiations is involved. Whether this appeal to the Soviet Union will have an effect is another matter.

WELT: What does the federal chancellor want? A European moratorium on missile armament?

Ehmke: Our side will only get the new medium-range missiles in 1983 anyway. Everything will continue as NATO has decided. Now the question arises as to how the edge can be taken off this aggravating situation so that negotiations will become possible at all. The chancellor sees that this will take some time and therefore he made his suggestion. But we also ought to examine the question of whether we could not gain more time than just the 3 years America needs for producing the new medium-range arms. Otherwise, the Soviet Union will achieve a one-sided advantage during these years by deploying more and more medium-range arms in Europe. Would the appeal suffice that it ought to stop doing this unilaterally, or should we say: Okay, if the Soviets will stop deploying additional missiles, NATO could also think about the timing of the deployment of the arms which are still being developed. The NATO decision of 12 December last year links deployment with the state of arms limitation negotiations anyway.

WELT: May we summarize this point as follows: You believe that the NATO decision does not contain an automatic mechanism with regard to deploying the arms to be produced by the United States, if by 1983 no positive results in arms control measures have been achieved?

EHMKE: There is no automatic mechanism because there is a forestalling condition. It would have to be decided as to whether it had come about or not.

WELT: This version will be strongly contested....

Ehmke: This is the first time I have heard that this could be contested.

WELT: Is your opinion also the opinion of the federal chancellor?

Ehmke: I have no doubt about that.

WELT: How do you explain that Vice Chancellor and Federal Foreign Minister Genscher was not informed about the chancellor's initiative?

Ehmke: I do not know. Helmut Schmidt's suggestion is not a Cabinet draft, but a personal contribution developed in a public speech, which has been joined by the SPD Presidium and the SPD Bundestag faction.

COMMENTATOR SEES SCHMIDT RETURNING TO NATO DECISION

DW171104 Bonn DIE WELT in German 17 Apr 80 p 6

[Article signed Co.: "Late Clarification"]

[Text] Was it all just a tempest in a teapot? Helmut Schmidt, at any rate, depicted it as such when he stated to the Foreign Policy Committee that in making his suggestion to stop the stationing, he was only concerned about the 3 years the West would need before the new medium-range missiles could be stationed. The chancellor stressed that he did not have in mind to call into question the alliance's December 1979 decision. Then the Foreign Ministry was able to state with satisfaction that Schmidt was following the same line as Foreign Minister Genscher.

But why did the chancellor--who can formulate most exactly--express himself last Friday in Hamburg in such a nebulous and thus misleading way? His formulation that the West and the East ought to renounce the stationing of a new or additional medium-range missiles for "a certain number of years" puzzled even his coalition partner Genscher. Must not the suspicion arise that Schmidt wanted to soften NATO's Brussels decision to close the arms gap in order to start arms control talks with Moscow again? Schmidt's hint in Hamburg at the 3-year period the West needed anyway, and his later speech in Essen did not change anything about the fact that the chancellor in his core statement here also used the imprecise formulation "a certain number of years."

All these were certainly not coincidental slips of tongue, but rather signals. They were obviously noticed, as was demonstrated by the Soviet offer for the chancellor to visit Moscow this summer. It was all the more necessary for Schmidt, with his clarification in the Foreign Policy Committee, to again return to the basis of the Brussels decision to close the arms gap.

GDR'S MITTAG 'VERY INTERESTED' IN CONTINUED COOPERATION

LD171730 Hamburg DPA in German 1537 GMT 17 Apr 80

[Text] Essen--During a visit in Essen today to the friend [as received] Krupp Ltd, GDR State Council member Guenter Mittag showed himself "very interested" in continued cooperation. According to a spokesman of the firm the talks between Mittag and the Krupp's management concentrated on capital projects in the GDR. Mittag was accompanied by Ewald Moldt, chief of the GDR's permanent mission in the Federal Republic.

At Mittag's reception at Villa Huegel, the old Krupp residence, Chairman of the Supervisory Board Beitz said that the good economic relations between the GDR and the Federal Republic have become a "supporting element of the entire policy of detente." "Every effort" should be made "to continue the personal talks in order to consolidate what has been achieved."

As examples of the successful cooperation between Krupp and the Foreign Trade Ministry Beitz mentioned the electric steel works at Hennigsdorf and the fittings foundry, producing pipe joints, at Ueckermuende. The two works which cost a total of about DM250 million were completed and handed over in 1978.

Extended Cooperation Desired

LD172212 Hamburg DPA in German 1806 GMT 17 Apr 80

[Excerpt] Hamburg--Following his talk with Chancellor Schmidt, Guenter Mittag, the GDR's highest-ranking politician in charge of economic affairs, in an interview with WESTDEUTSCHE ALLGEMEINE ZEITUNG called for an extension of cooperation between the Federal Republic and the GDR and for the continuation of the policy of detente despite the worsened climate between East and West. The GDR advocates that full use be made of the content and spirit of the basic agreement between the two sides.

The interview which will be published by WESTDEUTSCHE ALLGEMEINE ZEITUNG on Friday, was prereleased to DPA as a news item.

GISCARD, VENEZUELAN PRESIDENT CONTINUE TALKS

LD171447 Paris LE MONDE in French 16 Apr 80 p 3

[Unattributed report: "Only North-South Dialogue Can Prevent Confrontation and Chaos"]

[Text] "Only North-South dialogue can prevent confrontation and chaos," Venezuelan President Luis Herrera Campins said on Monday, 14 April, in the toast he proposed at a dinner given in his honor by Mr Giscard d'Estaing at the Grand Trianon.

"We cannot accept that dialogue on energy questions be separated from North-South problems as a whole," the Venezuelan head of state said. According to him, discussion of the energy problem is important but should not be "separated from other major subjects such as the protection of real purchasing power obtained by the developing countries through exports, thanks to the adjustment and stabilization of the world raw materials market."

In this context he mentioned the need for easier preferential access to the industrialized countries' markets for exports of manufactured goods, the transfer of technology, international monetary reform, recognition of the developing countries' sovereignty over their natural resources and their development policies "which includes control of multinational companies."

"It is vital to act together and take advantage of everything which unites us in order to attain common objectives of justice and fairness," President Herrera Campins said, stressing that "successive French governments have been champions of North-South dialogue."

The Venezuelan president also welcomed the fact that France one day "took the historic decision to reject unconditional Atlanticism and to strongly assert the autonomy of France and Europe." "Since then, this great nation has constantly played a constructive and progressive role in encouraging detente and balance," he added.

Mr Giscard d'Estaing said in turn that France hopes that the Andean Pact will become a "privileged interlocutor" of the EEC. Mentioning the North-South dialogue he stressed that Venezuela and France "were among the first to seek ways of pursuing this dialogue." He expressed the hope that Paris and Caracas will take a "joint initiative" to seek "new concepts with a view to organizing relations in a more rational and just way."

The head of state turned to bilateral relations: "The trusting relations which bind us," he said with regret, "have still not made our two countries the partners they ought to be," although "there is no lack of opportunities."

The situation in Central America and in the Caribbean formed the subject of the first private meeting which Mr Giscard d'Estaing and Mr Herrera Campins had on Monday. A second private meeting to be held this Tuesday, 15 April, will be devoted to relations between the Andean Pact (Venezuela, Bolivia, Colombia, Equador and Peru) and the EC.

The two heads of state also plan to discuss relations between the OPEC members and the industrialized countries. At the same time the Venezuelan ministers for foreign affairs, defense, mines and energy, information and tourism, coordination and planning for the presidency [as published] had talks with their French counterparts on Monday.

Paris Proposes To Double Its Crude Oil Purchases

It seems to have already been decided that Venezuela would regularly supply France with oil should supplies from the Middle East to Western Europe be cut.

France apparently proposes to double its crude oil purchases from Venezuela which is the seventh largest oil-producing and oil-exporting country. According to authoritative French and Venezuelan sources, France wants to help the Caracas government in the oil production sector. It is prepared to give Venezuela technical assistance to develop the Venezuelan economy in, among other things, the building of giant petrochemical complexes and perhaps even nuclear power stations.

In addition, Venezuela wants to buy new weapons from France. France has already sold Venezuela interception and fighter aircraft as well as tanks, helicopters and other military equipment.

PCF'S STREIFF MEETS WITH POLISARIO'S OULD SALEK

LD171529 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 2 Apr 80 p 9

[Unattributed report: "POLISARIO Front"]

[Text] A POLISARIO Front delegation headed by Mohamed Salem Ould Salek, Politburo member and Saharan Democratic Arab Republic information minister, was received at PCF headquarters on Tuesday [1 April] by committee member Gerard Streiff. Ould Salek gave detailed information on the latest developments in the situation and the Front's military and political victories and thanked the PCF for its active solidarity with the Saharan people.

Gerard Streiff reaffirmed the PCF's intention to continue to extend its struggle for the recognition of the Saharan people's national rights and of the POLISARIO Front, their legitimate representative.

PCF'S GREMETZ DEMANDS RECOGNITION FOR KAMPUCHEA

LD180913 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 5 Apr 80 p 5

[Unattributed report: "Recognize the Lawful Phnom Penh Authorities"]

[Text] The French Government persists in its refusal to recognize Kampuchea's lawful authorities, PCF deputy and Politburo member Maxime Gremetz wrote to Mr Raymond Barre 26 March.

Recalling the French representative's role when relaunching the anti-Kampuchea campaign at the recent meeting of the EEC and Association of South East Asian Nations (Thailand, Philippines, Malaysia, Indonesia and Singapore), Maxime Gremetz remarks "this was a serious and hostile act at the very moment when the evidence shows that Kampuchea is being reborn."

"Moreover, your refusal to resume diplomatic relations with Kampuchea is accompanied by an unjustifiable tolerance toward the Khmer people's former torturers," the Communist deputy continues. "Not only are you not opposed to the fact that they 'represent' their victims at the United Nations, but you go so far as to accept members of the former Pol Pot/Ieng Sary government, condemned for their odious crimes in their own country, who are presently staying in France and developing political activities toward UNESCO." You are thereby taking a new step which deeply shocks all those devoted to the worldwide struggle for human rights. Such a policy snubs the interests of the Kampuchean people and of France. It attacks our country's dignity and prestige throughout the world.

"France, however, would stand to gain by establishing good relations with Kampuchea and the other countries of the former Indochina. It would occupy a special place in the necessary work of aid and cooperation with this severely distressed people.

"The affirmation of such an intention necessarily involves the recognition of the Kampuchean Government. Thus, on behalf of all those men and women currently working for the recognition of Kampuchea, I demand:

"That France recognize Kampuchea's lawful government:

"That normal diplomatic relations be established in keeping with your diplomacy's traditional principle, which is to recognize states and not regimes;

"That France increase its aid to Kampuchea, especially in food and medical supplies, and set up genuine cooperation with that country."

PCF POLITBURO STATEMENT ON LE MATIN 'LIES' ABOUT MARCHAIS

LD171059 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 2 Apr 80 p 4

[Text of PCF Politburo statement published in Paris on 1 April: "Gang of Three Conspiracy"]

[Text] Once again LE MATIN is trying to revive the personal attacks on Georges Marchais. This confirms that in this affair we are witnessing a "gang of three" conspiracy and that the Socialist press is playing the leading role. Convicted of lies, in a difficult position with its own readers, LE MATIN is trying to get out of the rut into which it has fallen by publishing an unlikely set of extremely grotesque lies and stories.

However, all it has done in fact is sink further into the mire. It has been carried away by its own enthusiasm and revealed the petty political goal it is pursuing so relentlessly: to weaken the PCF candidate in 1981."

Indeed, this is the objective of this entire campaign: to try to undermine the PCF and the man presumed to be its candidate in the presidential election; to encourage anti-communism by all possible means; to deepen divisions and create the right conditions for the Socialist Party to rally openly to the right and to permanently remove any prospect of change.

In its Wednesday, 2 April, issue, L'HUMANITE will once again publish a series of eye-witness accounts and irrefutable proof that Georges Marchais is telling the truth and LE MATIN indulging in slander.

This new episode in the campaign against our party and its secretary general leads to one conclusion: LE MATIN is lying and is doing so deliberately and shamefully.

It is vital for this conclusion to be accepted by every worker, every democrat and all those for whom the political struggle, however intense it might be, can in no way justify resorting to such dastardly methods. The Communists will try to achieve this by waging the struggle for truth to the end. This is vital for the struggle itself--the struggle to obtain satisfaction for the workers' demands and to achieve union and democratic change, which is inseparable from the fight for truth.

LE MATIN has debased itself. We have no doubt that its anticommunist hysteria will be judged with extreme severity.

L'UNITA'S BOFFA VIEWS FAILINGS IN U.S. INTERNATIONAL POLICY

LD171241 Milan L'UNITA in Italian 11 Apr 80 p 1

[Giuseppe Boffa article: "U.S. Misdeeds in Iran and Elsewhere"]

[Text] Once again the Middle East has entered a phase of very acute and dangerous tension in which we could all become involved. Since last fall, Iranian affairs have returned to the forefront due to pressure from the threat of U.S. armed intervention. This being the case, we could give ourselves the satisfaction of pointing out the intolerable polemics which some weeks ago prompted our warning not to assess too unilaterally (only Afghanistan) [as published] the fundamental causes of the new tragic conflicts emerging in the world. But we would rather look ahead and talk about more important matters.

What we must not lose sight of is the underlying reason for the latest crisis. In fact once again it lies in the inability of the U.S. ruling classes as a whole (and not in the greater or lesser ability of this or that statesman, whether Carter or one of his rivals) to build a real dialogue with the emergent--tumultuously or even chaotically emergent--forces of the current revolutionary process. The Iranian example is certainly the most revealing and, at least now, the most dangerous one, but it is not the only one. Of course there is no question of setting aside our criticisms of the kidnaping of the U.S. diplomatic staff in Tehran. These criticisms, which we confirmed again a few days ago, are not ours alone since they have been loudly proclaimed by major forces and authoritative representatives of the Persian revolution as well. But this is where the real problem begins. Indeed, the government in Washington has been unable to hold a dialogue even with the new Iranian President Bani-Sadr, whom even the U.S. press had portrayed as a "moderate."

Recourse to Force

What Bani-Sadr requested from Carter was essentially an explicit condemnation of past U.S. policy with respect to Iran and a consequent commitment to turn a new leaf and establish really new relations between the countries. The Iranians were unlikely to be satisfied with anything less, following their experience over the past 25 years. But this is precisely what the United States has proved incapable of doing. It is unrealistic and dangerous to believe that the obstable can be circumvented with threats, sanctions or--worse still--the recourse to armed force. Already the reaction in Iran--as was to be expected, for that matter--has been a tendency to regroup around the most radical stances. Far from resolving the problems, the use of force would initiate a spiral of growing violence which could spread so far as to render any dialogue impossible, if not worse.

He said that Iran is not the only case, however. The dilemmas which the Middle East's most protracted conflict poses to the U.S. administration are less pressingly urgent, but no less dramatic than the Iranian problems (and have not been entirely uprooted [avulsi] by the situation in Tehran). They reemerged, behind diplomatic courtesies, during As-Sadat's Washington visit. Having managed to win Egypt over to its side, the United States practically shouldered sole responsibility for reestablishing peace in the Middle East. But time is passing without any real progress in the Camp David agreements. The obstacle lies mainly in the failure to acknowledge the Palestinian's tragic light and their rights and therefore in the inability to involve them in a more solid peace agreement. But that is not all. Precisely because they were clumsy, even the attempts to drag King Husayn of Jordan (certainly no extremist) into the negotiations ended in failure: Husayn eventually canceled a previously scheduled visit to Washington. Nor is it clear how similar attempts in the future will meet with any other fate, as long as even the Arab camp's most modest demands, now accepted even by European governments, are rejected.

Events in Central America are perhaps even more indicative. The U.S. leaders are watching with sullen mistrust the activities of the Sandinist revolutionaries in Nicaragua in their struggle against tragic problems. The Washington Congress has set future guarantees of human rights in the country as a condition for granting a very modest loan of $75 million. Now, human rights are sacrosanct and we fight for their observance everywhere. But such a sudden suspicious attitude toward the Sandinists on the part of the very forces which for decades supported the Somoza dictatorship, in which the only right was arbitrary tyranny and his oligarchy, is certainly not an attitude which can facilitate mutual understanding with the Nicaraguan people.

One cannot cry out in outrage if the ruling revolutionaries are prompted to radicalize their stances and to seek aid elsewhere--first and foremost in Havana and even in Moscow (where they have found it). Central America is a region of small and impoverished peoples, where U.S. influence has always been total and exclusive. One cannot therefore blame mysterious enemy activities to justify the tragic situations there--situations which are now the most bloody in El Salvador, but which threaten to spread to the entire area, as the U.S. press informs us with an abundance of detail. This being the case, it is a very meager consolation to welcome the difficulties being experienced also by the Cuban Government.

The assertion of these simple facts does not imply an entirely positive view of one part of the world and an entirely negative view of the other. This is not our habit. It means being aware of our role and our duties. Refusing to follow the U.S. administration along the path of reprisals and threats against Iran does not signify for the Europeans--as we are in danger of being told--abandoning their commitment for "a few barrels of oil." Iran's oil is certainly very important to our economies, which depend on it even more than the U.S. economy. Therefore let us not underestimate these specific interests: For that matter, the Iranians themselves will take care not to underestimate them. But there is also something much more essential at stake--namely Europe's ability and opportunity to find for itself the paths for dialogue with the emergent forces which is essential to its future. This opportunity does present itself to our countries: They will have only themselves to blame if they let it escape.

BERLINGUER DISCUSSES PRC VISIT, PCI INTERNATIONAL POLICY

LD1611353 Rome L'UNITA in Italian 13 Apr 80 p 1

[PCI Secretary General Enrico Berlinguer statement: "Why We Are Going to China"]

[Text] The PCI delegation is leaving for China today. This visit confirms the full resumption of relations between the Italian and Chinese Communists, which were interrupted for many years and which we, even during the times of harshest polemics, always hoped could be reestablished. [paragraph continues]

In our outlook on world life and on relations among the forces of the international workers movement we have never disregarded the need to constructively tackle the real problems behind political and ideological conflicts, having always been aware of the Chinese revolution's historic role and of the major place which China occupies in the world. We have always believed that such problems should be tackled through a policy of detente and peace aimed at uniting the forces struggling for progress throughout the world. At the same time we therefore consider the talks and meetings of the next few days to be a contribution to the cause of understanding and cooperation among the peoples and among the revolutionary movements and this will objectively help to create a better climate for cooperation among the various forces of the international workers movement.

In the past few days I have had the opportunity to explain the significance and aims of this visit to China. We are going there because we consider it to be both necessary and advantageous for a better acquaintance with the conditions and situations in which the two parties work and with their policies; we are going there with an awareness--on our part and on the Chinese comrades' part--that respect for mutual stances and mutual autonomy constitutes the basis for a dialogue that will be frank, on both points of agreement and disagreement. There are points of disagreements and they must not be concealed; they concern--as is known--stances, analyses and actions on various issues. But we are going there, above all, to seek every possible field for rapprochement [incontro] with regard to relations between the parties, the countries and the peoples and the major topics of peace and international cooperation.

So nobody can believe that the aim of results of this meeting--which, I repeat, is consistent with our line of conduct aimed at attenuating world tensions--are directed against any other communist, workers or progressive parties, we will not abandon our method of speaking frankly with all our interlocutors and of putting our ideas to them, in the belief that only by being clear can one work to surmount conflicts and strengthen cooperation to everyone's advantage.

Never before, at a time when the international framework seems increasingly exposed to tensions, lacerations and dangers, has such a requirement seemed so necessary. We are witnessing such a grave deterioration in international relations that it prompts fear of disaster. This requires and demands the broadest possible mobilization of all the forces which understand the need to tackle the crisis with new ideas, by reopening the prospects of a constructive dialogue and a peaceful exchange of ideas on the issues and objectives on which mankind's salvation depends: New international relations based on justice and equal status; the observance of the peoples' right to liberate themselves from imperialist domination and every other form of foreign interference; disarmament and, therefore, on a different use of resources.

The balance of terror is no longer sufficient to prevent war. We must start to resolve the major tragic problems of the world. The communists cannot do this alone. We must facilitate rapprochement and move in this direction a broad alignment of forces: From the nonaligned countries to the governments in Europe and other parts of the world which are aware of the present responsibilities, from the communist and socialist parties to progressive currents of all leanings, from religious currents to cultural movements which in any way aim at mankind's liberation. The major powers must also be involved in this reapprochement.

We are convinced that the duty of a real revolutionary force such as ours is to strengthen these thrusts, to encourage other forces, to hold a dialogue with them and thus to restore confidence to the vast masses of people who want peace and, with it, development, justice and a new world.

It is with this major outlook in mind that the PCI delegation is approaching its meeting with the Chinese Communists.

ALL TRADE, FINANCIAL RELATIONS WITH IRAN SEVERED

LD172020 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 2000 GMT 17 Apr 80

[Text] The Portuguese Government today banned all imports from Iran and exports of products to Tehran until the American hostages are released. A note issued by the Council of Ministers, which met under the chairmanship of Dr Sa Carneiro, also mentions the government's decision to ban the transport of goods shipped by other nations in Portuguese vessels as well as the unloading of goods from Iranian ships. The Lisbon government also banned all financial transactions and the participation of Portuguese enterprises in Iranian industrial projects.

The government holds the view that the continuing detention of U.S. diplomatic staff by the Iranian authorities is a grave violation of the basic principles which govern relations among peoples and (?is a factor of instability) in the international situation.

With this adoption of stance, Portugal becomes the first U.S. ally and member of NATO to respond to the appeals of Washington for sanctions against Iran.

Official Note Issued

LD172330 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 2230 GMT 17 Apr 80

[Text] The Council of Ministers issued today an official note stating that "deeply concerned at the continuation of the grave situation involving the American hostages in Tehran, it deems it to be its duty of solidarity with the United States and its obligation duty vis-a-vis international law to adopt measures restricting bilateral relations between Portugal and Iran. Accordingly, and until the American hostages are released, the Council of Ministers has decided to ban imports from Iran and export of Portuguese goods to Iran, as well as the transport of products embargoed by other nations in Portuguese vessels, the loading of embargoed goods into Iranian ships, financial transactions and participation of Portuguese enterprises in Iranian industrial projects."

What will these measures specifically entail? They will imply some losses, particularly as regards imports of Iranian crude oil which will now have to be purchased by Portugal elsewhere, probably at higher prices. Portuguese exports to Iran totalled 130,000 contos in 1978, a figure of little relevance in the overall picture of Portuguese exports.

PLO'S DAJJANI HOLDS TALKS WITH GOVERNMENT LEADERS

[Text] Abdallah Dajjani, head of the PLO mission in Madrid, who has been in Lisbon since Thursday, was received yesterday by Foreign Minister Freitas Do Amaral and met with the Social Democratic Party's Foreign Relations Committee, which is headed by Deputy Minister Pinto Balsemao. Speaking to journalists after his meeting with the Social Democrats, Abdallah Dajjani, who has come to our country as PLO Chairman Yasir 'Arafat's representative, announced that the aim of these contacts was to secure Portugal's vote for the proposal to be discussed shortly by the UN Security Council to recognize the Palestinian people's right to self-determination and their own state. The Palestinian leader will be received by the president of the republic today.

COMMITTEE TO STUDY INDONESIAN 'INVASION' OF EAST TIMOR

LD172015 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 1830 GMT 17 Apr 80

[Text] East Timor is without any doubt the one ex-Portuguese colony whose decolonization process has been the source of greatest concern to the state. On 7 December 1975 Indonesia began its invasion of East Timor, and Portugal immediately announced that it was breaking off relations with Indonesia. On 12 December the UN General Assembly and later on the UN Security Council recognized the inalienable right of the Timorese people to self-determination, freedom and independence, and demanded the immediate withdrawal of Indonesia from that territory. These resolutions, however, have not been heeded.

According to the PORTUGUESE NEWS AGENCY, ANOP, the president of the republic has just appointed a special committee to deal with the problems arising from the situation in East Timor. The conditions under which Portuguese prisoners are held by Indonesian forces is one of the major concerns of this committee, in addition to the overall problem of the occupation of East Timor by Indonesia, which Portugal does not accept.

The newly appointed committee is composed of Naval Commander Almeida e Costa, Professor Veiga Simao, and Ambassadors [names indistinct].

COUNCIL OF MINISTERS APPROVES LAW ON PUBLIC, PRIVATE SECTORS

LD160642 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 2230 GMT 15 Apr 80

[Text] The Council of Ministers, after studying the juridical reasons for the Council of the Revolution's ruling as unconstitutional the government bill seeking to amend current legislation on the public and private sectors--so as to throw the banking, insurance and base industries open to private enterprise--today approved a new decree-law amending the same legislation and sent it for promulgation by the president of the republic.

The cabinet took this recourse on the grounds that the government is vested with legislative powers for this purpose. Meanwhile, the Assembly of the Republic today approved two government bills presented for discussion as a matter of urgency: one revising the voter's registration law--carried with the majority vote in favor from the Democratic Alliance parties and negative votes from the Portuguese Communist Party [PCP], the Socialist Party [PS], the Portuguese Democratic Movement [MDP] and the Popular Democratic Union [UDP]--and another requesting parliament's authority for the government to enter into an agreement with the United States of America concerning the sale of agricultural products--also carried with the abstention of the PCP, PS and MDP and a negative vote by the UDP.

OREJA ADDRESSES SENATE ON LATIN AMERICA POLICY

LD180923 Barcelona LA VANGUARDIA in Spanish 9 Apr 80 p 9

[EFE report: "Oreja Presents Spanish Foreign Policy on Latin America to Senate"]

[Excerpts] Madrid, 8 April--Foreign Minister Marcelino Oreja yesterday presented to the Senate plenum the main guidelines of Spanish foreign policy on Latin America. The Spanish diplomatic chief said that these guidelines are governed by solidarity and cooperation and that the final aim is the creation of a community of nations without any predominant roles. Oreja reviewed economic and trade relations and, from the political viewpoint, indicated Spain's privileged position as an observer member of the Andean Pact. The plenum approved, with some modifications, the bill to reform the penal code on crimes connected with the freedoms of expression, assembly and association.

"An Ingredient for Our European Integration"

Having stated that the policy with respect to the Latin American countries will always constitute "a factor which will balance and harmonize with our integration into Europe" and that at present this policy "is seeking to secure specific results and mutual benefits through the introduction of living and effective realities," the Spanish diplomatic chief referred to the need to intensify the network of relations, both bilateral and multilateral.

The principles of noninterference in internal affairs and of promoting human rights, the minister said, "we do not regard as conflicting, but as complementary," adding that "the special nature of our links with the South American peoples obliges us to adopt a state policy which far transcends partiality and transient government policies. This state policy is enshrined essentially in the king."

Principles of Spanish Policy

"The principles behind our policy in Latin America," the foreign minister said, "are interdependence, credibility, continuity and community. All of Spain's activity in Latin America," he explained, "must be within the framework of solidarity and must be guided by the idea of a Latin American community of nations which must be the ultimate objective and must be pursued without anyone adopting a predominant role, with joint efforts by everyone and further cooperative relations in all fields."

Apart from the principles and the importance of the final aims of Spanish-Latin American relations, Marcelino Oreja listed in his speech the main points on which Spain's day-to-day activities hinge: the course of relations among the various Latin American peoples and the link between them as a whole and the European Community, the pursuit of the processes of regional integration in the Latin American context, and the coordination of efforts in international forums for the sake of the Latin American peoples' interests.

Next the minister discussed the means which the state uses in implementing this policy.

Effective and Efficient Approach

"We have managed," Marcelino Oreja said, "to impart a more dynamic, effective and efficient approach to our relations with the Latin American peoples, always thinking more of the future than the past, more of the pursuit of specific objectives than of the mere enunciation of broad principles."

"The results of this approach," he added, "are beginning to emerge and embrace all areas of cooperation--from political to scientific, including trade, culture, finance and technology."

With reference to strictly political cooperation, the minister mentioned bilateral relations which have been strengthened by contacts at many levels, emphasizing among them the visits by the king and queen and the four visits by the prime minister, and multilateral relations.

Economic and Trade Cooperation

In the industrial field the minister emphasized Spain's attainment of full membership in the Economic Commission for Latin America [ECLA], a decision which was reached unanimously last year. He mentioned the various cooperation programs introduced by the Latin American Cooperation Institute which will be included in an agreement between ECLA and Spain, and the contacts being held to reach an agreement on economic cooperation on a regional scale which will encourage the presence of Spanish products and technology on the continent--an agreement already drafted in Madrid last September.

After explaining further points regarding economic cooperation with Latin America, Marcelino Oreja said that trade has recently undergone spectacular growth, as reflected in the 141 billion peseta difference between 1976 and 1979 and the reduction of our chronic deficit when we achieved a 90.8 percent balance in 1979. In relative terms, Spanish exports to Latin America last year increased 41.8 percent over 1978.

Finally, the minister said that Spanish investments in Latin America last year totaled 10 billion pesetas and that he considers the conditions structurally very positive--due to linguistic similarity and the average level of our development--for very important and positive results in the near future in economic, scientific and technological cooperation.

FOREIGN MINISTER HOSTS LUNCHEON FOR ROK COUNTERPART

LD171559 Madrid EL PAIS in Spanish 8 Apr 80 p 14

[Unattributed report: "South Korean Foreign Minister in Madrid"]

The Republic of Korea's foreign minister, Pak Tong-chin, arrived at Barajas Airport from Geneva on Sunday for a 4-day visit during which he will meet with his country's ambassadors in Europe.

Mr Pak Tong-chin said at the airport that he would be meeting with Spanish Minister Mr Oreja Aguirre "to exchange opinions on international issues and to examine the excellent relations between our countries."

He then said that the meeting of the heads of Korean diplomatic missions in Europe will primarily discuss bilateral relations with each of the countries and generally examine the present political and economic situation on the old continent.

PSOE'S GONZALEZ LEAVES FOR TALKS WITH CEAUSESCU

LD171436 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1200 GMT 17 Apr 80

[Text] Felipe Gonzalez, PSOE secretary general, has left for Romania to meet the head of state Nicolae Ceausescu. While at Barajas Airport, we asked Gonzalez about the main purpose of his talks. [Begin Gonzalez recording] I should like this analysis to encompass the three seats of international tension which currently exist--Central Europe, the Middle East and Central America. It should be straightforward, dealing with things in that way. Naturally I shall be making an effort to promote to the maximum the relations of friendship between our countries, as well as stressing our wish that the Madrid Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe should be a success for detente. We support the policy of detente and find the international position taken by the Romanian Government a rather interesting one. [end recording]

Gonzalez was also asked about the upsurge of violence in the Basque Country, with the killing of two civil guards in Irun in the last few hours. [Begin Gonzalez recording] Regrettably I have to say the same thing I said some time ago to the interior minister. What is fundamental if we are to combat terrorism effectively is a prior diagnosis of its root cause and development and of its possible foreign links, if they exist. My feeling is that such a diagnosis has not yet been made, and a disease cannot be properly treated if a diagnosis has not been made. I am not saying that some efforts are not being made in that direction--General Santamaria made quite eloquent remarks to the parliamentary committee in question yesterday--but this matter must be tackled with determination to get to the root of it and this has not yet been achieved. [end recording]

GARAICOECHEA STRESSES ECONOMY, VIOLENCE AT INAUGURATION

LD180857 Barcelona LA VANGUARDIA in Spanish 10 Apr 80 pp 3, 15

[Resume of agency reports: "Garaicoechea Says 'Economic Crisis and Violence Key Problems'"]

[Excerpts] Guernica, 9 April--It took two votes for Carlos Garaicoechea to be elected premier of the Basque Government. In the first vote the new lendakari [president] only received 23 votes, since two Basque Nationalist Party [PNV] votes were nul. In the second vote the entire opposition voted against Garaicoechea, who was elected by his party's 25 votes. In his program speech the premier said that the economic crisis and violence are the two main problems facing the Basque Country. The program was challenged critically by the various other parties consistently with the ideology advocated by each.

In his inaugural speech of the parliamentary session Garaicoechea said that "we must implement feasible self-government in accordance with the statute [of Basque autonomy], at a time when two specific difficulties could thwart any political plan unless we act imaginatively and steadfastly: I am referring to the economic crisis and its most distressing consequence, unemployment, and to the terrible problem of violence as a political method."

Next, the PNV chairman said that "we will shoulder this enormous commitment with the utmost determination and enthusiasm, because we proceed from ideas and principles which have made us persevere in our objectives at times as difficult as and more difficult than the present."

After announcing in his speech that the PNV had released him from all party discipline on putting him forward as premier of the Basque Government, Garaicoechea said that "ever since Sabino Arana outlined his conception of the Basque nation, thus awakening this people's collective awareness, there has been a long and difficult struggle to achieve the minimum points of self-government consistent with this awareness, essential for defending and developing its identity and specific interests as a people, in harmony and solidarity with all the other peoples.

"For a country suffering an unprecedented identity crisis (especially in some of its essential characteristics, such as the linguistic aspect), a crisis in the economy and coexistence on a scale unparalleled in our recent history, and suffering a traumatic situation stemming from so many political frustrations, the self-government embodied in the statute can undoubtedly prove to be a historic solution."

Next the PNV chairman mentioned the case of Navarre: "I have referred," he said, "to the regret I feel that not all the Basque territories are represented in this Parliament. And referring specifically to Navarre, I would like to repeat here and now my belief that democratic and rational methods will eventually fill this gap. Speaking as a Navarrese who by means of a process of rational reflection has adopted a stance as a Basque nationalist, I can confirm with conviction my hope that this fundamental part of the country will adhere to our political blueprint and that it will do so on the basis of the democratic decision of all Navarese, free from any kind of coercion or manipulation, whether external or internal."

Garaicoechea added that Navarre's inclusion is essential from the nationalist viewpoint' and siad that "there can be no more effective weapon for facilitating Navarre's free adherence than our own example. In view of the reluctance obviously prompted by our country's most pressing problems, such as violence or the terrible economic crisis afflicting us, nothing could be more effective in encouraging the Navarrese people's free adherence to the joint institutions than a normalized coexistence and a prosperous and exemplary society in all respects."

The new Basque premier next discussed the nationalist concept: "Being a nationalist," he said, "means believing in the existence of the Basque nation, believing in its due right to govern its own future in solidarity, from a position of freedom, with all the peoples of Spain and the entire world."

"We Will Not Accept Structures Which Destroy the Basque Nation"

"We will never accept," he said in this connection, "any supranational political structure which implies the destruction of our natural Basque national identity. We will accept and cooperate faithfully with every state or suprastate political plan which observes this identity and the minimum elements of self-government consistent with it.

"As envisaged in the statute, we will maintain attitudes of solidarity with respect to the rest of the state, in whose tasks, I repeat, we will cooperate faithfully and constructively, with the loyalty which we expect from the top echelons of central government in the implementation of the statute."

Garaicoechea gave assurances regarding the democratic awareness "which will always help us to remember that in our society there are other conceptions different from our own," adding that these "cannot make us abandon our responsibilities as representatives of the largest sector of the electorate."

"We Must Draw Up an Entire Government Apparatus"

With regard to priority problems and objectives, he discussed the implementation of the statute and the "massive task of drawing up from nothing an entire government apparatus capable of performing the tasks stemming from the statute through to their final conclusions. "But," he said, "it is quite another matter to have a clear conception of the limits to the various powers envisaged in the statute for the autonomous community and of the rate at which the transfer of such powers should be conducted."

Carlos Garaicoechea said that the draft organ laws now being presented to the national Cortes are in some cases inconsistent with the content of the statute. He referred to the need for a firm position on securing the broadest possible interpretation of the statute and on rejecting any law or political practice aimed at directly or indirectly minimizing its contents, and announced that "our attitude in the future Basque Government will be determined in accordance with the response which we receive from central government in its interpretation of the statute and with the response we receive in discussions on the timetable for transference."

Broadest Interpretation of Statute

With regard to the implementation of the statute, he stressed the need to structure and organize the functioning of the autonomous institutions, the presentation to Parliament of various important matters and the creation of norms and legislation to govern matters under the jurisdiction of the autonomous community.

Another part of his speech was devoted to the economic problem. He said that in the specific case of the Basque Country the effects of the economic crisis are undoubtedly more acute than elsewhere, "which is not surprising," he said, "in view of our production structure, the existence of certain particularly prominent destabilizing factors in the country and the complete absence of any power to try to resolve the problems that we have here on the spot."

"Emergency Situation in the Economy"

Having said that the economy in the Basque Country is in an emergency situation, he said that the Basque economic crisis and the state situation as a whole has been aggravated by certain specific factors such as the delay and hesitation in adopting adequate measures, a production system structurally burdened with respect to the future and incapable of coping with the crisis and a sectoral distribution of industry, the atmosphere of violence and, in particular, the violence unleashed against employers by means of the revolutionary tax [terrorist extortion racket] and the absence of economic institutions or the unsatisfactory functioning of those which do exist.

At another juncture Garaicoechea said that any plan of action or reform must consider the adoption of specific initiatives and measures stemming from the statute and included among the government's aims; the creation of institutions which will comprehensively protect and invigorate the process of restructuring and modifying the Basque economic structure; and the introduction and vigorous implementation of an economic policy agreed among the parties involved in the production process with the aim of defining the variables for conduct and rules for future action in the private sector and its corresponding market area.

PSOE LEADER RULES OUT COLLABORATION WITH SUAREZ GOVERNMENT

LD171225 Barcelona LA VANGUARDIA in Spanish 4-5 Apr 80 p 4

[Mariano Guindal report: "There Is No Possibility of Coalition Government"]

[Excerpts] Madrid, 3 April--The 32d Congress of the General Workers Union [UGT] was opened this morning with an important speech by Spanish Socialist Workers Party [PSOE] Secretary General Felipe Gonzalez. The start of the congress was delayed 2 hours in an atmosphere of some tension between the two currents of moderates and radicals. The first lists for the new Executive Committee indicate a synthesis with possible predominance for the moderate sector and the departure of Manuel Garnacho, leader of the so-called radicals.

But the main item at the opening of the UGT Congress was Felipe Gonzalez' speech. He began by tackling the confrontation within the UGT, and stated that "the Socialist Party is following with interest and concern the UGT's strategic development, its reorganization and its updating of the trade union structures.... I can state that this is the first time since the dictator's death that the UGT has had a clear strategy, the first step forward which was taken in 1979, whereby the leading role was secured in negotiation, although we are still lacking in action. It is in this latter aspect--in the daily struggle--that the UGT must enhance its strategy in order to secure the leading role which belongs to it because of its tradition and the size of its membership."

"Deep Internal Crisis in PSOE"

The PSOE secretary general later said that "at this time, when our party is experiencing a deep internal crisis, when there are comrades who assert that the UGT's strategy is mapped out by the Socialist Party and is manifested, according to them, in the workers statute and in the signing of the framework agreement, these comrades have very poor memories not to remember that the party memberships and the trade union's were identical a few years ago and that it is precisely now, when the two organizations have found their own identities, that this criticism is being leveled against us. And it is untrue: The UGT is not a mere driving belt of the party, as is the case with other political and trade union organizations, which make a 180-degree trade union turnabout because of an almost military order from their political leadership. The Socialist Party has studied the UGT's trade union strategy in depth, and on the basis of this study has drawn up its economic plan. With the aim of realizing our closest organization's trade union strategy in the political field, it would be possible to level some criticism against Socialist Party members enlisted in the UGT's ranks with respect to their lack of effectiveness, since they confine themselves to chanting the trade union's slogans at congresses and meetings, and this is not sufficient."

Felipe Gonzalez later said that the strategy formulated by the present UGT Congress should be aimed at the grave economic crisis which the country is experiencing, which is not as serious as that in the Third World but far more serious than that undergone by other European countries, "since not only do we have twice as many unemployed as the 5 percent in the Common Market but also the official 10-percent rate of unemployment is ficticious, because whereas the working population in Sweden is 55 percent of the total population, the working population in Spain is only 35 percent. But the most dramatic aspect is that the present government is the main opponent of the great effort which workers and employers are making to equip themselves with a new framework for relations and to seek agreements to extricate themselves from the crisis."

Felipe Gonzalez criticized the government very harshly when he said that "the most dramatic aspect of our situation is also the constant failure of the government's economic policy."

He added that it had set itself reducing inflation as its principal aim for 1979, sacrificing employment policy to achieve the meager result of reducing that inflation by less than 1 percent, but increasing the number of unemployed by another 200,000. He referred to the need for 4 million homes, while the homes which are for sale are so expensive that workers are compelled to work overtime or to "moonlight." According to Felipe Gonzalez, investments in the construction of public schools have been reduced by 30 percent, while there are many unemployed teachers and children without schools; the agreements which the UGT reaches with the Spanish Confederation of Employers' Organizations are being boycotted, provoking a series of strikes in the public sector; the government is refusing to reorganize the sectors in a state of crisis and is not honoring the commitments undertaken by it in the Moncloa pacts, which invalidates it for reaching further agreements with the trade unions. "In short," he said, "this government is leading us toward bankruptcy."

Next, Mr Gonzalez drew attention to the policy to be conducted over the next few months, which in his opinion "will be another pincer operation against the PSOE, because the government will seek to return to the policy of consensus in order to thwart the alternative solution to the present situation which the PSOE could offer. Well, I am deeply convinced that there is no possibility of the PSOE's sharing responsibility with the present government team. There is no possibility of a pact, or consensus or a coalition government. It is impossible to reach any agreement with a government which is ruining democracy."

Felipe Gonzalez asserted that there is currently no danger of democratic regression occurring as a result of a coup, but there is a grave danger of regression as a result of a situation which is festering. "The government," he said, "is refusing to go further with the democratic project which was started in this country, is refusing to create a modern state of the autonomies and is refusing or is unable to effect the great historic change which the country needs and has been demanding since the 19th century... There has never been a democracy in Spain," he added, "and there is still none. We have been confronted with a dictatorial, centralist and bureaucratic state, which we have inherited and which we have been unable to transform." "And what is more grave," Gonzalez emphasized, "is that the present government is maintaining the same caciquist style of conduct in running the state. As a result of this situation, a regression is occurring because of the gulf which exists between political power and the mass of citizens, with a disintegration of Spain taking place when it views the autonomies as a struggle between the periphery and the central government, instead of reorganizing the state in accordance with the Constitution." "Faced with this danger of a festering of the process," Felipe Gonzalez said, "we are also confronted with leftwing organizations which are incapable of breaking down this wall which the government has erected."

ULLSTEN SAYS BOYCOTT OF OLYMPICS 'MAY BE FORCED'

LD151732 Stockholm Domestic Service in Swedish 1600 GMT 15 Apr 80

[Excerpt] Swedish Foreign Minister Ola Ullsten is in Tokyo with a delegation led by the royal couple currently visiting Japan. Ullsten gave a press conference in Tokyo today where he told a large group of international journalists, among other things, that Sweden may be forced to boycott the Olympic games in Moscow for reasons of its neutrality policy, as he put it. Ulf Gudmundsson attended the press conference and described what has been said about developments in Iran and the Olympic games.

[Begin recording] The Swedish foreign minister surprised many of the journalists by saying that Sweden may end up in a situation in which it will be necessary, for reasons of its neutrality policy, to participate in the boycott initiated by American President Jimmy Carter in protest against the Soviet military invasion of Afghanistan. High-ranking Swedish Government sources also stress that they must (?give) the Swedish Olympic Committee an opportunity to reconsider its participation in Moscow if the competitions there in the summer are likely to be more of an internal communist sports festival than a real international Olympic event.

It remains to be seen how many of the West European countries really will follow the American example and stay home from Moscow, but it is obvious that the entire policy in the world regarding the Olympics has now entered a new stage in which it is quite clear that no American sportsmen will take part in the games in the Soviet Union.

The Swedish Government has now also tightened its general attitude toward the situation in Iran where about 50 American Embassy employees have been held hostage by radical Muslim students for more than 5 months. Ola Ullsten today described the drama in Iran as a cynical play with human beings, a play which is contrary to all international laws and contrary to the rules applying to decent contacts between countries. IRAQI EMBASSY ALLEGEDLY INVOLVED IN ANTI-SEMITIC ACTION

[Unattributed report: "Ahlmark Received Anti-Semitic Letter: Embassy Agitates Against Minority"]

[Text] Iraq's embassy in Stockholm has sent anti-Semitic material to Per Ahlmark, who has been active for many years on Jewish questions. The envelope with the embassy's official crest contained around 100 pages of typewritten text, pamphlets and leaflets containing anti-Jewish propaganda.

Per Ahlmark says that the embassy is contravening Swedish law on agitation against a minority group. If this is proved, the Swedish Government must protest. "For many years I have been receiving anonymous letters with propaganda against the Jews, but never in an envelope from the embassy of a foreign country," Ahlmark said.

The material from Iraq'a Embassy asserts that only Jewish propaganda believes that Hitler gassed 6 million Jews. It also asserts that the present West German Government is controlled by Jews and that Swedish radio is run by a horde of criminals and Jews. Ahlmark received the material a month ago. It was recently revealed that the Iraqi Embassy in Helsinki requested information from Finnish companies on Jews in their management or among their shareholders. So Ahlmark decided to publish the material hd had received and sent it to EXPRESSEN. "It is clear that the letter to me was not an isolated case," Ahlmark said.

AMBASSADOR TO IRAN RETURNS TO TEHRAN

LD171125 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 17 Apr 80 p 4

[John Bulloch report: "Our Man in Tehran Goes Back"]

[Text] Sir John Graham, Britain's ambassador to Iran, returned to Tehran last night after only two days in London.

With Japan and all European Community countries, Britain had ordered the ambassador home "for consultations" as a diplomatic means of showing solidarity with America and expressing Western displeasure at the detention of the American hostages. Sir John was one of the first to leave Tehran, arriving in London last Monday. He immediately briefed Lord Carrington, foreign secretary.

The impression in Whitehall was that Sir John would stay in London at least until Monday's meeting of European foreign ministers, in Luxembourg. Some officials felt he was unlikely to go back until the hostages were released.

But it emerged last night that he was ordered back without consultations between London and other European capitals. America, said to be "constantly in touch" over Iran, was not told of the decision until it had been made.

The explanation from Whitehall last night was that Sir John was an exceptionally able ambassador, and because of the swift developments in Iran and neighbouring countries, it was felt best to have him back at his post. The implication was that the reported build-up of Soviet forces along the Iranian border may have caused the change.

DECISIONS ON IRAN SANCTIONS POSTPONED UNTIL EC TALKS

LD161147 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 16 Apr 80 p 34

[David Adamson report: "Britain Puts Off Iran Decision Till EEC Talks"]

[Text] Britain will not take any action on diplomatic or economic sanctions against Iran until after the EEC foreign ministers have met in Luxembourg on Monday.

So far there is only contingency planning. It is hoped concerted action will be agreed at Luxembourg, but French insistence on a policy independent of the transatlantic alliance complicates this.

Last week's foreign ministers' meeting in Lisbon left open the possibility that if there is no agreement, individual EEC members would be able to support America as they saw fit.

Neither Britain nor West Germany is keen on sanctions, but they are unwilling to see the alliance with the United States further strained.

Questioned in the Commons yesterday about one solid item of trade with Iran, the support ship Kharg, 20,000 tons, Mrs Thatcher implied without saying directly that the ship would not be handed over, although it is said to be ready for commissioning.

The ship would need to be commissioned, or the builders Swan Hunter, given an export licence, before it could be handed over to the Iranian Navy, she said.

No decision has been taken yet on when Britain's ambassador to Iran, Sir John Graham, will return to Tehran. Like other EEC ambassadors he was recalled for consultations.

Problems of trade sanctions are under consideration at the Foreign Office and other ministries.

Lord Carrington has told his European colleagues British sanctions would require enabling legislation.

Some action could be taken through existing legislation, but this would not cover trade conducted through third parties.

REASONS FOR LACK OF ALLIED COMMUNICATION VIEWED

LD161149 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 16 Apr 80 p 18

[Editorial: "Babel in the West"]

[Text] Many are the voices speaking about Iran and Afghanistan. A daily Babel assails the ears of the public. What is generally known as "the West"-i.e. Western Europe and the United States-is not, at the moment, presenting an admirable or respectable picture of itself. Things may get clearer as time goes on. For the present, there is much confusion and doubt. Wires get crossed. The exchanges give the impression of not working properly. Why?

There is a combination of reasons. The main ones can be listed. (1) The West no longer has assured, convincing superiority of armed force over Russia. (2) The geographical location of Afghanistan and Iran is an area where it would be particularly difficult for the West to deploy effectively-by sea and air-such forces as it could find for the purpose. Russia, on the other hand, is ideally placed to deploy very large forces over very short land lines of communication in that same area. (3) Seizure of the American hostages in Iran, as an issue, has been complicated and middled by the much bigger issue of the Russian occupation of Afghanistan. (4) The present leaders of West Germany and France face elections this year and next, respectively. Both are very anxious to be re-elected. (5) The same applies fortissimo, to America. A presidential election is a mighty distraction for the White House.

The net result of these factors, particularly the last, is that there has been very little rational, considered, consultation between Washington and Europe. Thus it has been that Washington has been able to charge America's allies with not pulling their weight. To some extent the charge may be justified. But it must also be said that, to the extent that it is, has been partly due to the erratic signals coming almost daily out of the White House and the State Department.

What can be done to improve things? Mrs Thatcher struck the right note in her state answer to Mr Callaghan's private notice question in the Commons on Monday. Europe must demonstrate its readiness to give full backing to Mr Carter over the hostages. The EEC foreign ministers will try to concert measures next Monday and the EEC summit will follow it up a week later. What it is considered usefully can be done will be done. West Germany is ready to join all that. The much bigger question, essentially, is Russia's aggression in Afghanistan. To that there is only one sensible answer. The West must urgently seek to regain armed superiority. It will take time. The sooner it is begun, the less danger there will be of disastrous war, brought about by the Russia assuming easy victory.

TA NEA CONTINUES DISCUSSION OF ROLANDHIS-ERKMEN CONTACTS

[Text] Within the framework of the "top secret" agreement that they had concluded at their meeting in Lisbon during the Council of Europe foreign ministers conference, the foreign ministers of Cyprus and Turkey, Mr Rolandhis and Mr Erkmen, are to maintain regular contact through Strasbourg.

The basic aim of the Rolandhis-Erkmen contacts will be, among other things, the exchange of views for implementing--at the beginning at least--certain assessments of the Cyprus problem which were made during the two men's talks in Lisbon as well as plans for dealing directly with problems that may arise in the framework of efforts towards the intercommunal dialogue. This, as reported by our permanent TA NEA correspondent in New York and confirmed by Western diplomatic circles in Nicosia, is in parallel with certain moves that are being made by Western European and American interests to promote some solution to the Cyprus problem.

In this connection, the TA NEA permanent correspondent in New York reports that the contacts and consultations for the "new", as it is described, Western plan for the Cyprus issue are at an advanced stage. The outcome will depend on, to a large extent, both the next step that UN Secretary General Mr Waldheim will make on the Cyprus issue as well as the timing for and the composition of the international committee, as provided at the latest General Assembly's resolution since there was no progress in Cyprus before 31 March as envisaged in the UN resolution.

In light of the above developments, the West attaches importance to the "top secret" Rolandhis-Erkmen agreement for the installation of a hot line, as it was described, for immediate contacts between them.

At any rate, Mr Rolandhis and Mr Erkmen decided to maintain regular contacts not only for urgent matters but also in order to cope with current problems.

The method that will be used will be as follows:

Foreign Minister Rolandhis will convey his positions, thoughts or views on any subject to Mr Papadhimas, the permanent Cyprus representative to the Council of Europe in Strasbourg. Mr Papadhimas in turn will contact his Turkish counterpart in Strasbourg who, in turn, will brief Turkish Foreign Minister Hayrettin Erkmen on Mr Rolandhis' views and suggestions. It was agreed and arrangements were made so that the dialogue and the exchange of messages and views between Mr Erkmen and Mr Rolandhis through the hot line should be carried out very quickly and effectively.

The above method of contact--the hot line method as described yesterday by TA NEA--"broke" the Erkmen-Rolandhis secret agreement and has apparently disturbed the minister. This is why an official source hastened yesterday to state in a strange way that "Mr Rolandhis and Mr Erkmen did not decide to install a direct telephone link between them."

This statement has raised many questions among political editors for the strange and incomprehensible stand of Mr Rolandhis, because TA NEA in its disclosures yesterday spoke about the hot line for contact and not about telephone installations.

Meanwhile, the same official source has refrained from answering whether there is an issue of direct contact between Rolandhis and Erkmen, while in reply to another question it confined itself to stating that: "There is nothing more to add to what has already been said or announced regarding the Rolandhis-Erkmen meetings."

I SIMERINI CRITICIZES FOREIGN MINISTER; GOVERNMENT RESPONDS

NC171542 Nicosia I SIMERINI in Greek 15 Apr 80 p 1

[Editorial: "Disastrous Failures"]

[Excerpts] Statesmen usually become inebriated by their successes. Mr Rolandhis has become inebriated by his disastrous political failures. He gives the impression of a statesman who, in a state of political drunkeness, jumps over fences and emits an incomprehensible political clamor.

Mr Rolandhis--we reveal this to the people today--was given carte blanche to handle the matter of the Afghan invasion. He decided that Cyprus had no right to condemn the invasion because Western quarters have not condemned the invasion of Cyprus. However, Rolandhis' political naivete is already renowned. An invasion is an invasion wherever it comes from. Cyprus cannot scream that the Cyprus issue is a question of principles, a question of invasion and freedom while at the same time it does not condemn invasions. Neither the Americans nor the Russians have condemned the invasion of Cyprus. However, if the Americans invade Iran, for instance, should we say that we do not condemn the invasion because Washington ignored the Turkish invasion in Cyprus? Mr Rolandhis' political immaturity has already made Cyprus' foreign policy ridiculous.

As a minister, instead of realizing his fatal mistake and correcting it he repeated it the other day in front of all of Europe. And in addition, with incomparable impudence he attempted to tell us that he even received the congratulations of the Europeans! AKEL had intimidated Mr Rolandhis. It told him that if the Afghan invasion was condemned by Cyprus, then Eastern quarters would not support the next recourse to the United Nations; and the government unmasked itself in the face of AKEL's threat.

The foreign minister has stated, however, that these columns praise him! That is, we level inadmissible criticism against him and this is tantamount to honoring him! Then, the hymn of the day! Mr Rolandhis is aware that for many years it has been the concern of all the country's political leaders that the talks be maintained at a bicommunal level; and this has been accomplished. The basic reason was the role offered to the government to be one step above the talks as the official authority in Cyprus. All this has been destroyed by Mr Rolandhis through his political foolishness.

Because the function of this column is to carry out discussion, it puts forward a simple challenge. Mr Rolandhis is called upon to tell us: Is it or is it not true that certain of our ambassadors abroad are sending in reports on the Afghan issue with anxiety and anguish? Is it or is it not true that these ambassadors have been ridiculed at their posts--even at posts in nonaligned countries--by Mr Rolandhis' stand on the question of the Russian invasion? Can Mr Rolandhis tell the people what answers he gives to these ambassadors? However, we will come back to all this and many other important things.

Official Statement

NC161220 Nicosia ELEVTHERI KIPROS in Greek 16 Apr 80 pp 1, 8

[Government of Cyprus 15 April "official statement" on 15 April I SIMERINI article on Foreign Minister Rolandhis]

[Text] I SIMERINI persists in slandering its party's political rivals and today it again attacked the foreign minister. Whoever does not agree with I SIMERINI's line must be prepared to become the target of rudeness.

The line taken by I SIMERINI is nationally dangerous. What it criticizes and condemns constitutes the firm line of the government and the Greek Cypriot side on the national issue. I SIMERINI knows that the prevailing rigid Turkish stand does not leave any room for movement. It knows that Turkey's gigantic arms superiority and its military support of the political aims of the Turkish Cypriots are the real reasons for the difficulties. I SIMERINI knows that its political leaders, when they were handling the Cyprus issue themselves had noted the same difficulties and could not solve the Cyprus issue.

The following can be said in response to I SIMERINI's report:

It appears that I SIMERINI shows very little interest in Cyprus but a lot more interest in Afghanistan. When speaking about Cyprus it is satisfied with the Western plan, the equal treatment of 82 percent and 18 percent of the people, the legislative subordination of the Greek Cypriots to undemocratic legislative institutions, the denial of human rights and partition. However, in the case of Afghanistan we are speaking about something holy. In that case the Cyprus foreign minister, along with members of the Council of Europe, must condemn the Afghanistan invasion even though Afghanistan does not belong to the Council and the Council of Europe members refuse to condemn the invasion of Cyprus, which does belong to the Council. Namely, we must make Afghanistan the symbol of freedom but Cyprus the symbol of sellout.

None of our ambassadors expressed concern or anguish over the Afghanistan issue, nor has anyone been the laughing stock. Our ambassadors do not give one-sided and short-sighted criticisms. This does not mean that we can absolutely satisfy all countries with all our decisions; this is natural because the views of the countries on international issues differ. Our relations with the EC, our UN policy, or the way we see the dialogue cannot satisfy everyone because each country uses its own criteria.

As to the issue of the talks--contrary to what I SIMERINI believes--the government's participation together with the interlocutor in the consultations before the dialogue, naturally strengthens the government. Definitely, the talks are conducted by the interlocutor, but this does not mean that the government must not participate or that it must hide itself during the preparatory consultations. It is precisely the concealment of the government's character that would politically destroy the government's existence and presence.

Finally, I SIMERINI alleged that the foreign minister was given carte blanche to handle the Afghanistan matter, when it was the Council of Ministers which decided this matter. In addition the handling of the national issue is collective.

KARAMANLIS PROPOSES ELECTION OF NEW PRESIDENT ON 23 APR

AT171219 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1130 GMT 17 Apr 80

[Text] The ministerial council met at 1200 [0900 GMT] today under Prime Minister Karamanlis who raised the issue of the imminent election of the president of the republic and made the following statement:

"The term of office of the president of the republic ends next June. Consequently the issue of the election of a new president has been raised. The Constitution establishes the process and time limits within which this election must be carried out. There was an opinion that this election should have been held much earlier as a result of the unjustified nervousness cultivated around this issue. However, for the sake of the regime, we must move within the time limits set by the Constitution itself. On this opportunity I must state that the nervousness which I mentioned is not only unjustified but it could also become harmful because the issue of the election of the head of state is extremely serious and it must be handled with calm, uninfluenced thinking. The way in which we handle this issue will, most certainly, become the criterion for the future of our regime. I hope that an effort will be made by all sides to create a climate which will allow us to reach solutions which are best for the country."

The prime minister then proposed that the Chamber of Deputies should convene for the election of the president of the republic next Wednesday, 23 April 1980. Upon the acceptance of the prime minister's proposal the decision was passed on to the president of the Chamber of Deputies who will set the correct process in motion within the day. Prime Minister Karamanlis also told the ministers that tomorrow or the next day he will make his personal position known on the issue of the presidential election and that the "New Democracy" Parliamentary Group will meet Tuesday to establish the party's position on the issue.

I AVYI CALLS FOR LAST MINUTE RALLYING OF OPPOSITION FORCES

AT171545 Athens I AVYI in Greek 17 Apr 80 p 6

[Editorial: "Joint Action Even Now"]

[Text] The ministerial council meets today to determine--as announced--the "process and date for the election of the new president of the republic." Today we enter the "home stretch" of developments in this problem which, under the current specific conditions, acquires vital importance for the subsequent evolution of our political affairs.

Karamanlis has already made his decisions on the governing party's plans for the presidential election. The "pieces" have been counted and the pros and cons of every single option have been discussed, always with the goal of guaranteeing "New Democracy's" stay in authority. There is no meaning now to forecasts of what might happen in the third vote and so forth. We shall soon know the result.

The basic thing is that, unfortunately, until today the parties of the democratic opposition have virtually waited for Karamanlis' initiative. This is because they have not managed to agree on a joint policy on the presidential election issue. [paragraph continues]

They have been unable to take the initiative away from "New Democracy" by jointly seeking a candidate acceptable to all of them and, in this way, forcing the governing party either to seriously negotiate or to reveal to the masses its intention to impose its will, despite its numerous declarations about national unity of spirit and so forth.

This is a true state of affairs which deprives the democratic forces of important possibilities for reacting to the subsequent moves and maneuvers of the governing party. This is because whether Karamanlis submits his candidacy and is subsequently elected or whether there is a deadlock and new elections are proclaimed, "New Democracy's most "firm argument" will always remain that it is allegedly the best guarantee for the smooth function of democratic institutions, in contrast to a multitude of political parties which even fail to reach a basic agreement among themselves.

PASOK's chairman recently underlined the danger of early elections in the form of a plebiscite on whether Karamanlis should or should not proceed to the position of president of the republic. Until today, however, his only answer for coping with this danger--which he himself underlined--was that PASOK must emerge from the election with full strength in the Chamber of Deputies so that it can form a government all by itself in order to implement its program in toto. This would exclude any post-election cooperation with any other party. This is an answer which fails to inspire the masses in the face of a problem which requires both political realism as well as the broad unification of the democratic forces.

On its part the party of Florakis [KKE (Exterior)] once again excelled in verbal intransigence by blocking, at the outset, any progress toward agreement with other parties. It is characteristic that the leader of this party found it much more expedient to distort the proposals of both the KKE (Interior) as well as of the other parties for seeking a joint candidate to the presidency of the republic and to counter them with his own "unsullied intransigence," instead of dealing with them in a sober and responsible manner. Instead of first being prepared to discuss things he preferred to resort to "denunciations." Who is served by all this?

This KKE (Interior), will in time, propose negotiations among all the opposition parties for establishing a joint policy on the question of the presidency and specifically on the joint search, with "New Democracy," for a president of the republic who would embody the necessary guarantees of his position above all parties and of his firm support of democratic institutions and national independence. This proposal set the limits for negotiations during which each party would be able to develop its own views in search for a common denominator. The fact that this proposal was rejected, not with specific arguments but with distortions under the argument--like the one used by Florakis--that allegedly the KKE (Interior) seeks cooperation with the governing party on the issue of a joint candidate in "exchange" for the adoption of the simple proportional system of election, is nothing but a stark example of the dire collapse of political morals.

This demonstrates who is responsible for the state of affairs under which the parties of the democratic opposition "simply" wait, without an established joint policy, for the initiatives of Karamanlis. But even at this very "last moment," however, it is still very possible to regain a large proportion of lost ground. It is possible to sweep aside petty party considerations and to reach an understanding which has been so unfortunately rejected thus far: an understanding on establishing a joint policy by the entire democratic opposition on the search for a president of the republic who enjoys joint support, and on ending the cunning moves of the democratic forces to have a president of the republic who does not represent a narrow party front but who represents the unity of the people and the will of the greatest majority of the people for the protection of democratic institutions and for the defense of national interests and independence.

Erkmen said that the fact that there was a second attempted murder before the discovery of any clues regarding the assassination of Turkey's former envoy to the Vatican, Taha Carim, further increases the grief and reaction of the Turkish nation toward these incidents. According to a statement by the Foreign Ministry information director general, Ambassador Savet Aksu, Erkmen noted that the Turkish nation wants the culprits to be apprehended and punished as soon as possible and that it expects the papacy to condemn these incidents.

Denunciation by Opposition Leaders

TA171614 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1605 GMT 17 Apr 80

[Text] Ankara, 17 Apr (AA)--Turkish political leaders denounced today, in separate statements, this morning's assassination attempt against the Turkish Ambassador to Vatican Vecdi Turel which left him wounded in the shoulder.

Republican People's Party (main opposition) leader Bulent Ecevit expressed his grief and his conviction that humanity as a whole would react to such attempts as does the Turkish nation.

National Salvation Party (opposition) leader Necmettin Erbakan stressed that was the second attack in Vatican on a Turkish diplomat. "In various European countries numerous attacks have been staged against Turkish diplomatic personnel and their families. The anarchist attackers cannot be captured since the countries involved have failed to treat the issue in a serious way," he said.

Nationalist Action Party (opposition) leader Alpaslan Turkes said in the face of the attacks on Turkish diplomats, national unity should be reinforced.

FOREIGN MINISTRY STATEMENT ON ROLANDHIS REQUEST FOR MEETING

TA172124 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 2000 GMT 17 Apr 80

[Text] It has been announced that Greek Cypriot administration Foreign Minister Rolandhis' request to meet with Foreign Minister Hayrettin Erkmen was rejected on the grounds that the respondent to the Greek Cypriot administration is the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus. Foreign Ministry Information Director General Savet Aktug issued a statement following certain reports in the Greek Cypriot press regarding Rolandhis' moves to meet with Erkmen during the Council of Europe ministerial committee meetings in Lisbon. In his statement, Aktug said that Rolandhis' request to meet with Erkmen was delivered to Turkey via a third country, however, this request was rejected with the reminder that the Greek Cypriot administration's respondent is the Federated State.

Pointing out that a new request to this effect was submitted before the Lisbon meeting by the Strasbourg representative of the Greek Cypriot administration to the Turkey's permanent representative at the Council of Europe, Aktug said that, as the request was submitted it was guaranteed that the meeting would not be political and that it would not signify that Turkey is recognizing the Greek Cypriot administration. Aktug noted that the Greek Cypriot's request was rejected on the same grounds. Aktug also said that Erkmen reminded Rolandhis, whom he met at a dinner given by the Portuguese prime minister in Lisbon, that his respondent is the Turkish Cypriot community.

UNDER SECRETARY DISCUSSES AID UPON RETURN FROM OECD MEETING

TA171517 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1400 GMT 17 Apr 80

[Text] The prime minister's under secretary and the deputy under secretary of the State Planning Organization, Turgut Ozal, who participated in the Paris meeting in which Western countries extended aid totalling $1.161 billion [figure as heard] within the framework of the OECD, has returned to Ankara. At Esenboga Airport Ozal replied to questions by Selma Berksoy from the TRT news center:

[Begin recording] [Berksoy] Aid worth $1.161 billion was extended to Turkey during the last Paris meeting. Part of this aid, $250 million, has already arrived as a bridging loan. I believe that now the important issue is when this loan can be used. What do you think about the issue?

[Ozal] First I would like to state that there were certain misunderstandings regarding the delay at the 26 March meeting. I stated at the time that it was purely a technical delay. The reason for the delay was to increase the amount of the aid and improve the conditions of the loan. Unfortunately, there were many incorrect reports on this issue. The results show that the amount of the aid is above our estimates and the conditions have also improved. In general, a significant part of this year's aid is extended in the form of program loans. It will be in the form of goods to be integrated into the Turkish economy.

I would like to immediately state the second significant point. We will be able to use these loans rapidly. During our Paris talks with the OECD countries we stressed one point: that bilateral agreements be signed as soon as possible. I believe that they will be signed within 1 month. A few colleagues will leave for Bonn on Tuesday to deal with the issue. We will follow this program very closely.

[Question] You say within 1 month?

[Answer] Most of it will be settled within a month.

[Question] Are there any countries with which we did not sign bilateral agreements last year?

[Answer] I can say there are none. I mean that in the last 2 months either existing agreements were renewed or, if there were no existing agreements, then negotiations have reached their last stage. There are a few formalities which remain to be concluded with a few countries. However, there are no problems. [end recording]

GRAND NATIONAL ASSEMBLY AGAIN FAILS TO ELECT PRESIDENT

TA171635 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 17 Apr 80

[Text] The three rounds of voting to elect a president held at the joint session of the Senate and the National Assembly today yielded no results. RPP Senator from the Presidential Quota Group Muhsin Batur and Justice Party Deputy from Istanbul Sadettin Bilgic were the candidates at the 41st, 42nd and 43d rounds of voting which began at 1500. Of the 568 members who participated in the 41st round, 290 voted for Batur and 204 for Bilgic. Sixteen votes were cast for members who were not candidates, 44 ballots were blank and 14 votes were declared void. Of the 540 members who participated in the 42nd round, 254 voted in favor of Batur, 224 voted for Bilgic, 12 votes were distributed among members who were not candidates, 39 ballots were blank and 11 votes were declared void. Thus, Batur and Bilgic failed to obtain the 318 votes necessary to be elected president. No results were obtained in the 43d round of voting either. Meanwhile, a decision has been made not to hold a joint Senate and National Assembly session on Saturdays, Sundays and on Wednesday, 23 April.

NATIONAL SECURITY COUNCIL RECOMMENDS MARTIAL LAW EXTENSION

TA171450 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1400 GMT 17 Apr 80

[Text] During its meeting today held under the chairmanship of Acting President Ihsan Sabri Caglayangil, the National Security Council decided to recommend that the government lift the martial law--currently being enforced in 20 provinces--in Erzincan and to extend it by another 2 months in the other provinces. The National Security Council meeting, which was held at the Cankaya Mansion, began at 0930 and lasted 5 hours. Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel, Chief of the General Staff Gen Kenan Evren, ministers who are members of the council, the armed forces commanders and the National Security Council general secretary attended the meeting.

The National Security Council General Secretariat issued the following statement at the end of the meeting on the conclusions of the Council's assessments: The effective struggle currently waged in a bid to prevent incidents of anarchy, terror, secessionism and robberies directed against the integrity and indivisibility of the state, the unity and solidarity of the nation, the tranquillity and the security of the country and lives and property of the citizens will be continued. It has been noted that anarchists belonging to various organizations are being captured in large groups and handed over to the judiciary as a result of the massive operations and ruthless struggle being undertaken by the state security forces--with the help and support of the citizens as well--against all kinds of illegal actions and organizations.

The National Security Council considers it essential that the necessary measures be taken to ensure the speedy manifestation of Turkish justice concerning these people and that the bill on the establishment of state security courts be enacted as rapidly as possible. The recent actions and assaults directed against the members of the armed forces and the security forces will be confronted in the most severe and ruthless manner. The National Security Council has decided to recommend to the government that the martial law which is currently being enforced in 20 provinces be extended by another 2 months, except in Erzincan, and also be declared in Agri in order to fully insure tranquillity and security throughout the country by continuing all the measures taken so far in the struggle aginst these illegal actions and taking all the necessary measures in the future. In addition, the National Security Council has reviewed the external developments and relations between countries which tend to gain new dimensions in our region and which are being closely followed. The council has concluded that it would be beneficial for the maintenance of peace and stability in the region and in the world to study ways to peacefully solve discords.

Adoption by Council of Ministers

[Text] The Council of Ministers has adopted the National Security Council recommendations to extend the martial law, which is currently being enforced in 20 provinces, for another 2 months; lift the martial law in Erzincan; and include Agri in the martial law enforcement areas. The Council of Ministers decision to extend the martial law in 20 provinces for another 2 months will be discussed at the joint session of the Senate and National Assembly tomorrow. The Council of Ministers meeting, which began at 1930 under the chairmanship of Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel, lasted 1 and 1/2 hours. In a written statement issued at the end of the meeting, the Council of Ministers condemned the treacherous assault on the Turkish Ambassador to the Vatican Vecdi Turel in Rome. It was decided during the meeting that the Council of Ministers' best wishes would be extended to the ambassador and the necessary action would be taken to ensure that the assailants are captured. The Council of Ministers statement noted that a decision was made to adopt the National Security Council recommendation.

The statement noted that the measures taken in Cukurova and other disaster areas were reviewed and it was decided that the relevant ministries would take all the necessary measures to eliminate the damage caused by the disasters.

Speaking to reports on the struggle against anarchy and terror on his way to the Council of Ministers session, Demirel said: We do have a problem and it is a difficult one. However, the problem is being dealt with. The power of our state will teach those who are disturbing the nation's tranquillity the necessary lesson. Demirel replied to journalists' questions in his office at the Grand National Assembly before the Council of Ministers meeting. According to the ANATOLIA [NEWS] AGENCY, AKAJANS [MEDITERRANEAN NEWS AGENCY] and ANKA [ANKARA NEWS AGENCY], in reply to a question on the lengthy duration of the rounds of the presidential elections, Demirel said that one should not be amazed for such things are not easily concluded in a country which is seeking stability.

In reply to another question, Demirel said that his views regarding amending the Constitution have been clear for 10 years and that he will make a constitutional amendment as soon as he has the necessary power. Demirel continued: Is the Turkey of 1980 the same as the Turkey of 1971? The Turkey of 1980 is not any better than the 1971 one. If you consider the last 20 years, you will see that half of that period was spent under martial law. The years when martial law was not enforced coincide with the terms of the Justice Party government. No one can say that this is good. As far as the issue of the election is concerned, our views on this subject are also clear. Our party said: Either let us govern or let us hold elections.

PLO SHOWS INTEREST IN TRADE WITH ENTERPRISES

[Alexander Fieber report: "Money for the PLO; Palestinians Want Trade With Austria"]

[Summary] Since Chancellor Bruno Kreisky has made the PLO "acceptable"--at least in Austria--through the Austrian recognition, a new Middle East market is offering itself to domestic business, a market which Ghazi Husayn, PLO representative in Vienna, has promoted without success to date. The PLO's "Samed" company, founded in 1970 in Beirut, is operating about 30 factories, enterprises and farms in the Palestinian settlement areas, employing more than 3,000 workers.

Husayn sees good chances for cooperation between "Samed" and Austrian enterprises in the building, lumber and textile industry sectors. While Austrian building companies seem interested in talks with the Palestinians, the other branches tend to be rather skeptical.

Friedrich Gleissner, head of the Austrian Chamber of Commerce Foreign Trade Department, takes a rather cautious view: "First of all, the foreign political aspect must be clarified, then we might tackle the question of exports to "Samed." A textile industry representative, while stressing a readiness for talking with the Palestinians, sees little chance of any exports, while the Tyrolean lumber exporter Luis Basetti argues that the decision about the risk involved should be left to the individual firms.

Helmut Haschek, chief of the Austrian Kontrollbank, regards the matter as something completely new and as a rather ticklish problem--"but, theoretically, the Kontrollbank could assume liability for the export deals with the PLO's economic organization," he says and adds that first of all the credit standing of that enterprise would have to be examined. "However, all things considered, 'only the treasury could assume liability for such a political and commercial risk,' he states."

PRC INTEREST IN MACHINE TOOLS--A delegation of highly qualified PRC experts recently visited the Ernst Krause special machine tool factory in Vienna and expressed interest in special machinery for tractor and truck production. It was agreed that the Vienna company would make a detailed bid on the basis of data that will be supplied by the Chinese side. The Chinese experts pointed out that the Austrian company will have to compete with at least seven foreign companies that were also visited by the delegation. APEL: NAVAL UNIT WILL NOT JOIN WESTERN MANEUVERS IN INDIAN OCEAN

[Text] Cologne--Federal Defense Minister Hans Apel said the two Federal Navy missile-carrying destroyers together with two supply ships, which are to make a training voyage to the Indian Ocean at the end of this month, will not take part in maneuvers with Western ships. Apel told the SPD Security Congress in Cologne (?today) that the ships would also not sail into the immediate crisis area.

The GDR and Iran have strongly criticized the trip by the Federal Navy ships. Bonn has emphasized that the Federal Republic is not contemplating a naval demonstration off the shores of oil-producing countries bordering the Indian Ocean.

EMBASSY IN TEHRAN DENIES EXODUS OF GERMAN NATIONALS

LD181130 Hamburg DPA in German 1019 GMT 18 Apr 80

[Text] Tehran/Bonn--According to the German Embassy in Tehran there is no confirmation that Germans are leaving Iran, as is currently rumored. Press Attache Honsowitz said today the embassy expected individual members of families to leave the country temporarily. On the other hand, members of the boards of management of several German firms had announced forthcoming visits to Tehran to discuss bilateral economic relations with the Iranian authorities.

Yesterday the German Embassy passed on a recommendation by the Bonn Foreign Ministry that families of Germans working in Iran should leave the country unless their presence was urgently required. About 1,300 Germans, members of German firms and their families, are living in Iran.

Boelling told a press conference in Bonn today that even the new sanctions did not necessitate a change in the "European timetable."

SCHMIDT VISIT TO USSR DEPENDS ON 'PREREQUISITES'

LD181120 Hamburg DPA in German 1017 GMT 18 Apr 80

[Text] Bonn--According to Government Spokesman Boelling, Chancellor Schmidt makes the acceptance of the June date proposed by the Soviet leadership for a visit to Moscow dependent on "certain prerequisites."

Boelling told a press conference in Bonn today that such a visit must contribute to definite clarifications. Both sides are interested in achieving a "positive movement" on various questions, going beyond the mere stating of positions. Boelling did not go into details about such a "positive movement." It goes without saying, the government spokesman added, that Foreign Minister Genscher would accompany the chancellor on a visit to the USSR.

Boelling emphasized that neither the chancellor nor other members of the government raised any conditions concerning the visit. However, certain prerequisites were needed for any journey. The chancellor's fundamental attitude was, Boelling said, that what mattered decisively in the first place was the dialogue between the two world powers--the United States and the USSR--and that, secondly, talks between those in positions of responsibility were needed to restore a balance, especially in a critical world situation. Furthermore, the chancellor believed that any exchange of views between leading, responsibile politicians was of value in itself.

Boelling again described Schmidt's decision whether or not to accept the date proposed by Moscow as "open". The opinion-forming process within the government and consultations with the allies had started.

STRAUSS OBJECTS TO 'WEHNER-INCITED' SCHMIDT VISIT TO USSR

TW181108 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU in German 18 Apr 80 p 1

[Report by Aachen correspondent Reinhard Voss: "Strauss: Wehner Initiated the Invitation"]

[Text] Aachen, 17 April--Franz Josef Strauss, Bavarian minister president and candidate for chancellor, objected in a talk with FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU to the planned visit by Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt to Moscow. After an election meeting in Aachen's Tivoli, where Strauss had "warned" the chancellor on Wednesday night against "overdoing it," the candidate for chancellor justified his criticism of the chancellor's intention to travel with the "macabre history" of this invitation and the improper timing, as he said.

Strauss charged Schmidt has become an "excutive organ" of Herbert Wehner's Ostpolitik. It was Wehner who initiated the invitation by the Kremlin through a "special envoy" sent to Moscow, said the CDU/CSU union politician. Strauss suspected that the chancellor followed a Moscow suggestion in making his remark that the East and the West "for a certain number of years should renounce the deployment of new or additional medium-range missiles." Strauss said verbatim: "I will eat a broom with the charwoman if this thing was not incited by Wehner."

Strauss suspects that the federal chancellor wants to torpedo NATO's intention to deploy new medium-range missiles in Europe. The "dammed issue" of the medium-range missiles has become a bone of contention between NATO and the Warsaw Pact because the Soviets have begun to deploy the SS-20 missiles. Strauss: "Now we are lagging behind and we are under pressure to make a move."

In contrast to his derogatory remarks about Helmut Schmidt, whom he termed a "panic chancellor" and "not even a pocket-size Bismarck," Strauss used only friendly words for Soviet party chief Leonid Brezhnev for a small circle of the local CDU notables after the Aachen meeting. He said that Brezhnev is a statesman of great format whom he, Strauss, "highly respects," even if the Soviet leaders pursues a ruthless power policy. Strauss termed it "tragic" that Brezhnev has no real "counterpart" in the West. The great strategic lines in the West, because of the numerous elections, are too often "betrayed or changed." The candidate for chancellor stated his conviction that the Russians must now be "tied down" with regard to Afghanistan. Otherwise, Moscow would soon attack another country. Strauss: "The Russians have a different moral makeup; they tick differently." In the Krefeld ice-skating stadium, in front of 6,000 listeners, Strauss called Helmut Schmidt a "war-threatening chancellor," as DPA has also reported. Schmidt was said to be "incapable of a peace policy."

LAMBSDORFF: FRG WILL HONOR CONTRACTUAL OBLIGATIONS TO USSR

LD191318 Hamburg DPA in German 1144 GMT 19 Apr 80

[Text] Bonn--Economics Minister Otto Graf Lambsdorff said the Federal Government does not intend to violate any contractual obligations to Moscow while participating in the economic sanctions demanded by the United States against the Soviet Union. Lambsdorff said today in an interview with SENDER FREIES BERLIN that international agreements and trade agreements "must be fulfilled and not be broken." In this, Bonn agreed with the United States. In its 25-year agreement with the Soviet Union the Federal Republic committed itself to promoting trade. "No one expects us to break these agreements and abandon them."

On the effects of economic sanctions against Iran, Lambsdorff expressed the view of the Federal Government that such steps could not lead directly to the release of the American hostages in Tehran. The minister declared solidarity with the United States and pointed out that military measures would also be discussed. It is much more justifiable, and in the end much cheaper for us all, to resort first to economic sanctions than to political [as received] means. The sanctions decision to be taken by Bonn is correct and in accordance with the interests of the Federal Republic.

Lambsdorff said that for the foreseeable future no bans on Sunday driving or similar economic measures are to be expected as a result of a possible Iranian oil boycott against the Federal Republic. In the event of an oil boycott from Iran, the oil market's international network would surely take care of certain things. The minister said that Tehran, too, needed foreign exchange revenue from the sale of its oil and oil pumps could not be shut down overnight.

INTERIOR MINISTER COMMENTS ON OLYMPICS BOYCOTT ISSUE

LD192020 Hamburg DPA in German 1503 GMT 19 Apr 80

[Text] Bonn--Federal Interior Minister Gerhard Baum, in view of the Federal Cabinet's expected recommendation next Wednesday against West German participation in the Moscow Olympics, has stressed that German sport can make its own decision on the question of a boycott, free from state pressure. Baum said on Sunday, in a Deutschlandfunk interview, that he considers it very important that no threat of sanctions of any kind are linked with the recommendation. The Federal Government has decided that, in the event the National Olympic Committee favors participation in the Olympics, no state measures will be taken against this.

Baum said he thinks sport is in a very difficult position: It will also have to deal with the matter of how the consequences of the Olympic question can be limited in the political sphere and at the level of world sport and sporting competitions. Politicians must help sport cope with these difficulties. Baum did not rule out an Olympics boycott also affecting sports contacts between the two German states.

SCHMIDT ADDRESSES SPD SECURITY CONGRESS

LD201054 Hamburg DPA in German 1010 GMT 20 Apr 80

[Text] Cologne--Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt has expressed regret that there is no "war avoidance strategy" in the current world situation. At the end of the SPD Security Congress Schmidt said in Cologne on Sunday that he was worried about this. He emphasized that the world powers were not sufficiently open in discussing their interests with each other.

Schmidt demanded practical steps to come to grips with the conflict. The will to reach a settlement and the ability to find compromise are indispensable for all concerned in order to safeguard peace.

The chancellor underlined that there is no fear spreading in the Federal Republic. The government is acting coolly and level-headedly.

Schmidt also spoke about the dangers of a new arms race. He seemed certain that negotiations on a limitation of the medium-range missile potential would begin with Moscow provided the atmosphere does not deteriorate further. The chancellor recalled his proposal that, to start with, both sides should refrain from deploying further medium-range missiles. He regretted that so far his proposal had been rejected in Moscow by "propagandists."

The speech of the indisposed DGB [German Trade Union Federation] Chairman Heinz Oskar Vetter was read by Willi Zimmermann. Vetter emphasized that through its action in Afghanistan the Soviet Union had increased the danger of a world war.

BRANDT SAYS U.S., USSR NOT LIVING UP TO RESPONSIBILITIES

LD181800 Hamburg DPA in German 1700 GMT 18 Apr 80

[Text] SPD Chairman Willy Brandt has accused the United States and the Soviet Union of not living up to their international responsibility. With reference to the developments in Iran and Afghanistan, Brandt said at a South Hesse regional SPD congress at Mainthal near Frankfurt today that peace is being endangered. He regretted that Western Europe is not yet in a position to play a major part in world affairs. In order to overcome mistrust all possible contacts should be used, Brandt demanded.

GENSCHER RETURNS FROM ZIMBABWE INDEPENDENCE CELEBRATION

LD190906 Hamburg DPA in German 0748 GMT 19 Apr 80

[Text] Bonn--Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher returned to Bonn this morning after attending the Zimbabwe independence celebration. On arrival at Cologne/Bonn Airport Genscher said that independent Zimbabwe needed and deserved the lasting support of all peace-loving peoples. The minister said that Prime Minister Robert Mugabe's appeal for national reconciliation was statesmanlike and farsighted. The will to jointly shape the future after years of armed conflict was a hopeful sign on peace, the importance of which extended far beyond southern Africa.

Genscher also expressed the hope that the solution of the Namibian question would now be tackled constructively by all concerned. The minister said: "The peaceful solution of Zimbabwe should be an encouragement for constructive steps in Namibia and in the Republic of South Africa itself."

Repeats Call for Missiles Talks

LD191200 Hamburg DPA in German 1054 GMT 19 Apr 80

[Text] Bonn--Hans-Dietrich Genscher, FDP chairman and federal foreign minister, has called on the Soviet Union to consider NATO's offer of December last year to negotiate on medium-range weapons, Genscher said today at an FDP meeting in his Wuppertal constituency that this offer of negotiations with which Moscow had been repeatedly acquainted, underlined the West's serious intention to prevent a new arms race.

On Tuesday, following his irritation over remarks by Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, Genscher confirmed to the FDP Bundestag Group that NATO's double decision on counter-armament and an offer of negotiations was still unchanged. Moscow must take this decision seriously and consider it.

In Wuppertal Genscher reaffirmed that the ban on medium-range missiles by the Soviet Union, which he had demanded again and again since October 1979, could improve negotiation prospects. Every new Soviet medium-range missile, on the other hand, impeded the negotiations. A sign of good will by the Soviet Union is, therefore, now necessary. The FDP politician said: "The 3 years up to the first stationing of Western missiles should be used for negotiations, but not for increasing Soviet superiority."

Genscher also dealt with the Afghanistan crisis and said that here, too, the Soviet Union is called upon to react positively and constructively to the EC proposal for a nonaligned and politically independent Afghanistan by withdrawing its troops. The foreign minister stressed that he will not cease making repeated appeals to Moscow to consider the Western negotiation proposals. Because he is convinced that the Soviet Union also does not want to risk peace, he expects constructive replies from Moscow.

CONTINUING REPORTAGE ON GUENTER MITTAG VISIT

Comments on Inter-German Relations

DW181138 Mainz ZDF Television Network in German 1900 GMT 17 Apr 80 DW

[Excerpts from Udi Philipp interview with Guenter Mittag, GDR Council of State member, secretary and Politburo member of the SED Central Committee, in Bonn; date not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] Did you, in your talks with the chancellor today, gain the impression that inter-German relations can be further improved despite the present international situation?

[Answer] I think I have made it clear several times over the past few days that we, on the part of the German Democratic Republic, will live up to our duty to do everything to prevent war from ever again emanating from German soil so that trade and economy can develop strictly under peaceful conditions. This great central task will be decisive for the eighties. It is under this aspect alone that trade between the two German states can develop as well.

[Question] What about politics? When will Helmut Schmidt meet with Mr Honecker?

[Answer] In this connection I would like to refer to a release which says that both sides will come to terms on a date suitable to both sides. It will be up to both Chancellor Schmidt and General Secretary Honecker to decide whether this will be in the summer or later.

[Question] Are you confident that the objectives you mentioned are shared here in Bonn?

[Answer] I hope that this position is shared on these fundamental issues because it is in the interest of peace and also in the interest of the people.

[Question] Does this mean that inter-German economic relations can be expanded despite the international crisis?

[Answer] Not despite, but rather in the direction I have just stated.

[Question] Irrespective also of the potential Olympic boycott and similar boycotts?

[Answer] Let us not discuss this too much tonight.

Talks With SPD's Wehner

DW181215 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE in German 18 Apr 80 p 2

[Transcript of the conversation in Bonn on 17 April between SPD Bundestag floorleader Herbert Wehner and Guenter Mittag, GDR Council of State member, secretary and Politburo member of the SED Central Committee]

[Text] Bonn, 17 April--SED Politburo member Mittag, during his visit to Bonn Thursday, talked with the chairman of the SPD Bundestag Group, Wehner. We herewith publish the text of the dialogue:

Wehner: Esteemed Colleague Mittag, thank you for having taken the time, despite all you have to do here, to give me an opportunity to convey to you my good wishes with respect to the rather favorable result of the discussions for which you have come here. Perhaps this sounds banal to a man of your stature who is working hard and bears responsibility, but it is meant well. I personally wish we could have had better timing--meaning the time of day and otherwise--for our meeting instead of during the plenary session [of the Budestag] which otherwise I never leave. I attend these plenary sessions from beginning to end--some say that this is attributable to my senility--yet I consider this the duty of an elected member of parliament. But in this particular case, I might say from the outset, I shall break with habit. Therefore, the unusual timing during the plenary meeting. It may be that this sounds old-fashioned, though hopefully it does not sound senile. So, all good wishes to you and, to the extent that anybody like myself can contribute toward the matter at issue in the talks here--intensification of economic relations to the advantage of the people on both sides--our full support. What I mean is ours, that of the parliamentary side.

Mittag: I thank you cordially, Mr Wehner, for your remarks. And I would like to say that we have gladly come to conduct these talks, timed unfortunately during the parliamentary debate. Being a member of parliament I know how seriously parliament needs to be taken, that is clear. And we consider it extremely important that the opportunity exists today to discuss a few issues.

Yesterday, during our visit to the Hanover Fair, we stated the responsibility with which we must view questions on the safeguarding of peace and the further development of relations between our two states. We are also convinced that today's dialogue can be conducted in this basic interconnection. This is why I thank you once again, especially for this opportunity.

Wehner: You, esteemed colleague, have mentioned that you conducted talks yesterday. I was fortunate enough while attending the plenum to hear the federal minister of economics, who gave his annual report today, and the report by experts and to have heard exactly--and that was not prearranged- what he said about the purpose and the prospects of yesterday's talks which you just mentioned. For that he received considerable applause, at least from our side. And I am happy that a great deal of conformity of views has been achieved in a spirit of mutual understanding--I do not want to say a spirit of optimism--of the options and also the necessities that must be considered in the concerted action of the two parties for the benefit of the people--on this side, on the other side.

Notwithstanding all the unhappiness about the general situation, which I do not deny, this causes me to hope that on this point we will do what is humanly possible, what is within our power, and what is conceivable. I am grateful to you that it is this impression which I have brought along from the report of the federal minister of economics to our brief conversation.

Mittag: I might say that the talks were objective, constructive and marked by realities. They made it evident that each side is living up to its full responsibility for implementing relations in keeping with the basic treaty on relations between the German Democratic Republic and the Federal Republic and for systematically improving these relations, without harboring great illusions or placing special emphasis on specific matters, but as a normal trade relationship in accordance with agreements concluded. A lot remains to be done in this particular field. I believe that it is necessary to proceed from both the content and the spirit of these agreements.

Wehner: I assume this especially in your case. In any event notwithstanding all the unhappiness of which I spoke, this causes me to have hope even if much of what we have achieved over the past few years--through hard work, much like a teamster--might end up in a dangerous position. I am glad that we are capable and prepared to meet each other halfway in this respect.

Stresses Importance of Economic Ties

LD181556 Hamburg DPA in German 1321 GMT 18 Apr 80

[Excerpt] Frankfurt/Bonn--At the end of his visit to the Federal Republic the highest ranking GDR politician in charge of economic affairs, Guenter Mittag, once again stressed the importance of economic relations between the Federal Republic and the GDR.

After a visit to the Hoechst chemical plant in Frankfurt, Mittag said that, in the relations between the two German states, trade played a principal part. "The development of economic relations is the best foundation for being able to work in peace."

The GDR politician, who yesterday had talks with Chancellor Schmidt and SPD and FDP Bundestag Group heads Herbert Wehner and Wolfgang Mischnick, stressed that the Federal Republic and the GDR bore a particularly great responsibility for the consolidation of peace. Efforts in this respect were being made on both sides.

FRANCOIS-PONCET DOES NOT RULE OUT EEC SANCTIONS ON IRAN

NC182053 Paris AFP in English 2047 GMT 18 Apr 80

[Text] Paris, April 18 (AFP)--French Foreign Minister Jean Francois-Poncet said today that European Economic Community sanctions against Iran as a means of achieving the liberation of American hostages held in Tehran could not be ruled out. "The decisions we make must be useful," Mr Francois-Poncet said in a television interview, "that is to say, must contribute effectively to the hostages' liberation. If sanctions are necessary, now or later, I believe that the NINE [EEC nations] will impose them. We are going to see what pressures should be applied to liberate the hostages." Mr Francois-Poncet is to take part in the EEC foreign ministers' conference to begin Tuesday.

GOVERNMENT DENIES EEC PRESSURE FOR JOINT STANCE ON IRAN

AU191638 Rome ANSA in English 1600 GMT 19 Apr 80

[Text] Paris, April 19, (ANSA)--The French Foreign Ministry today categorically denied that the nation has been subjected to pressure applied by the other eight member nations of the European Economic Community to drag the Paris government into line on a joint EEC stance on the United States-Iranian crisis situation. A Quai d'Orsay spokesman today recalled a televised statement made on Friday by Foreign Minister Jean Francois-Poncet who declared, "If sanctions are to be applied now or later (against Iran) I think that the Community Nine will apply them, but these provisions must be useful".

On Tuesday, the EEC council of foreign ministers is scheduled to meet in Luxembourg. Today's French Foreign Ministry denial came to counter rumors making the rounds in Brussels that West Germany and Great Britain intend to bring pressure to bear on the Paris government for applying sanctions against Iran, as requested by American President Jimmy Carter, in the drive to gain the freedom of the American hostages held in the U.S. Embassy in Tehran since November 4.

LE MONDE VIEWS IRAN CRISIS OPTIONS OPEN TO CARTER

LD181535 Paris LE MONDE in French 17 Apr 80 pp 1,3

[Andre Fontaine commentary: "How To Speak Loudly While Carrying a Little Stick?"]

[Text] "Finally, Fire in His Eye." This is the headline which TIME, citing one of Mr Carter's aides, gives to the article it devotes this week to the latest developments in the Tehran hostages affair. The French television viewers did not have quite the same impression. On Sunday evening the U.S. President looked more like a beaten dog. It was not anger or even energy which emanated from him but confused innocence and quiet pain, quite unusual in those once bitten by the demon ambition. People who, like Khomeyni, have shown so much relentlessenes and, like the Soviets, have demonstrated their cold realism must be very unfeeling to bombard this man, visibly overwhelmed by events, with accusations of blackmail, cynicism or cruelty. It is understandable that he finds it hurtful and has difficulty in accepting that Europe seems to unwilling to support him in face of the adversary.

Some well-meaning people would like to explain everything by the current election campaign on the other side of the Atlantic. It is true that this campaign does count and that, after temporarily benefiting from the crises in the East, Carter is now being harassed by those who, like his opponent Reagan, accuse him of inaction and excessive patience. [paragraph continues]

However, ultimately what is at stake far outweighs the identity and political colors of the man who will occupy the White House next year. The trial of strength now going on will largely determine the future of relations between East and West and between what is usually called North and South.

We must not ignore the fact that the United States and its allies are approaching this trial of strength from a weak position. The colorless White House Hamlet with his vacillations, inconsistencies and retractions reflects the state of an empire which has still not recovered from Vietnam and Watergate, which has had to resign itself to a recession in an election year--which is unusual--and which, in the sphere of conventional weapons and troop numbers, is clearly inferior to the USSR.

It is impossible to give way to Tehran. Whatever the shah's crimes, the United States would lose face once and for all and would render international law meaningless if it were to give in to the seizure of hostages. However, it is almost as impossible to make Tehran give in.

What use are economic sanctions against one of the world's main oil producers? Iran only had to reduce its exports by 2 million barrels per day a year ago to double the world crude oil price. It could do this again, taking advantage of the chaos which the freezing of Libyan and Algerian exports, notably to the United States, has already caused. It is true that Iran's economy cannot function without oil sales but there is no lack of interested clients, notably in East Europe. Moreover, even if by some miracle Mr Carter were to obtain from his European allies the solidarity he has demanded so imperiously, there will still be people who can find a way round the sanctions: South Africa has so far succeeded in living with the economic sanctions sparked off by its apartheid policy and the Argentine Republic has hurriedly supplied the USSR with some of the grain which the United States has stopped supplying because of Afghanistan.

As for the military sanctions which Mr Carter threatened several times during his television interview, they would have to be handled with the utmost care. First, it is highly likely that the hostages would be killed as soon as a Marine fired the first shot, and this would mean that the operation had failed. It is also important to take into account the exasperation which exists in most of the Islamic world regarding what "U.S. imperialism" represents, especially since it sponsored the Israeli-Egyptian peace treaty. The Islamic world has felt exploited by the West for a very long time. It is too acutely aware of the support which the West gave the shah's detested regime not to react strongly to any action which might seem intended to force the hand of one of its members. It also knows that the developed world's Achilles heel is in the Persian Gulf region and nothing could be more difficult than to defend oil supplies against determined saboteurs.

Last but not least, there is the USSR which, far from urging Iran to take a conciliatory attitude, is accusing Jimmy Carter, through TASS, of resorting to "crude lies" and the United States of reducing universally recognized international rules to a heap of scrap paper by exerting political, military and economic pressure on Iran, and even of launching an "attack on the oil-producing countries."

According to State Department spokesman Hodding Carter, Soviet troops are now concentrated near the Iranian border. The 1921 treaty, which has not really been revoked, gives them the right to intervene should the USSR think its interests are threatened, and the possibility of Tehran asking the USSR for help cannot be ruled out: Either Khomeyni and his supporters, faced with armed U.S. action--or Iraqi action--could choose an alliance with the "bear" against the "wolf," to quote Hodding Carter, who refuses to believe this is possible, or the extreme chaos which now reigns in the former Pahlavi empire could eventually bring to power the only organized political party which has any trace of rationality: the Tudeh Party, one of the most completely pro-Soviet communist parties in the world.

Understandable Hesitation

In these circumstances it is understandable that President Carter should think twice before giving the go-ahead to his squadrons and commandos and that reliable interpreters of the President's thinking should state with some embarrassment that, if there are to be military operations, it will not be before mid-May. This is certainly not the first time the President has given the impression of retreating before having launched into a battle; the credibility of the thunderbolts he threatens to drop is particularly affected by this since they were a little damp to begin with. The United States is now paying for the mistake of making massive investments in extremely sophisticated weapons while saving as much as possible on manpower. The elimination of the draft, which Mr Carter is now talking of reintroducing leaves the United States extremely vulnerable in face of the some 20 million reservists, one-fourth of whom have been trained in the past few years, which the USSR could at any time place at the disposal of a particularly effective military machine--one of the few things which really works in the world today.

At the beginning of this century, Theodore Roosevelt summarized his methods with this striking phrase: "Speak softly and carry a big stick." Jimmy Carter's compatriots are forcing him to do the opposite: They want him to speak loudly although he only has a little stick. Will he be able to resist their pressure, which is being expressed through the opinion polls? Nothing could be worse than another Suez--the use of force with disastrous consequences and an ensuing disorderly withdrawal. The Vietnam war is still fresh enough in Americans' minds to remind them of the dangers of escalation and the illusions which produce it. The histories of waning empires are full of this kind of episode.

Like many of the tragedies which have led human beings to kill each other, the Tehran hostages affair is due mainly to misunderstanding. The two antagonists both live with the absolute conviction that they are right. Armaments, economic power and technological sophistication have never been much help in overcoming clashes of this type. The only people to have succeeded are statesmen possessing all the qualities implied by the word: lofty ideas, nobility, courage, the gift of communicating and convincing.

Unfortunately they are a rare species in the world today.... For want of such a man it is essential to fall back on diplomacy, which means patience, dialogue, constant effort and the use of all available cards. There is still at least one card which Jimmy Carter ought to be able to play: the personality of his probable rival for President--a character from a western beside whom Nixon looks like a leftwinger and who can be expected to follow a particularly heavyhanded policy--a typical product of wounded national pride. Failing Imam Khomeyni, who will not be easy to win over, it should be possible to make the Soviets understand that it is not in their interest to see Ronald Reagan in the White House. However, this is highly likely to happen if they do not do something to allay the feeling of exasperation now spreading among the American people.

OIL COOPERATION AGREEMENT WITH VENEZUELA SIGNED

[Unattributed report: "Cooperation Agreement Signed Between France and Venezuela"]

[Text] Mr Giscard d'Estaing and Venezuelan President Luis Herrera Campins examined ways of establishing preferential trade relations between the EEC and Andean Pact countries on Tuesday, 15 April.

While the two presidents were having their second meeting, their foreign ministers, Jean Francois-Poncet and Jose Zambrano Velasco, signed an agreement of cooperation in the cultural, scientific and technical spheres. Meanwhile Venezuelan Mines and Energy Minister Humberto Calderon Berti and French Industry Minister Giraud discussed a plan for long-term cooperation in the extraction and marketing of heavy crude oil.

According to some French and Venezuelan officials, France plans to double its oil imports from Venezuela of 45,000 barrels per day. This would bring annual French imports of light Venezuelan oil to 2.25 million tons or 2.4 percent of France's annual consumption. The two French companies will be asked to carry out the commercial negotiations necessary for implementing this agreement in principle with Venezuelan Petroleum, Inc., PETROVEN.

"I hope that the EEC and the Andean Pact countries will quickly reach a specific cooperation agreement," President Herrera Campins said when he left the Elysee.

Mr Barre drew the Venezuelan president's attention to France's technical capabilities in the sphere of extraction and refining equipment suitable for heavy crude oil.

Mr Herrera Campins started the second day of his official visit to Paris by laying wreaths at the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier and at the foot of Simon Bolivar's statue. The leader was also entertained at lunch at the City Hall by Mr Jacques Chirac. He dined with Mr Giscard d'Estaing on Tuesday.

With regard to the "delicate" political, economic and financial situation in Latin America and the Caribbean, Mr Herrera Campins said he had been favorably impressed by his French host's views. The two leaders discussed economic development in the Andean Pact countries and what Mr Campins called the problem of "our region's stability."

"I hope that France will continue to support our efforts for more cooperation between the Andean Pact countries and the EEC countries," Mr Campins said.

NEW GOVERNMENT RECEIVES CONFIDENCE VOTE AFTER COSSIGA SPEECH

AU210915 Rome ANSA in English 0900 GMT 21 Apr 80

[Text] Rome, April 21 (ANSA)--The new Italian Government headed by Christian Democrat Premier Francesco Cossiga came through its second vote of confidence Sunday by a ballot of 335 for and 241 against cast in the lower house.

The required majority came from the premier's Christian Democrats and his Socialist and Republican Party coalition partners plus the vote cast by the M.P.'s representing the ethnic minorities of the Alto Adige and Val d'Aosta. Voting in the opposition were the Communists, the Social Democrats, Liberals, the neofascist MSI [Italian Social Movement], Radicals, leftwing independents and the Proletarian Unity M.P.'s.

Before the ballot, Cossiga delivered a forty-minute speech divided into a reply to the points raised by the opposition and to criticism of domestic policy, as outlined in his earlier platform statements to Parliament, and foreign policy, in which he reaffirmed Italy's desire to work with its European Community partners "to leave no avenue unexplored in the search for proposals and initiatives aimed at lessening international tensions".

Addressing himself to his government's relations with the opposition parties, the premier affirmed his availability for "constructive" dealings with all the nation's democratic forces and added that "debate thus far has confirmed that a desire for these dealings is not lacking". In connection with the "timely development" of these contacts, Cossiga referred to the Communist Party, the nation's second largest, and its "great representative force, its vast ties with the country, the declared sense of national responsibility as testified to at other times in our civil life in conjunction with the other constitutional forces, its participation in the policy of national solidarity".

The premier then referred to the Social Democrats and the Liberals, coalition partners in his minority cabinet which ruled from August last year until mid-March, and spoke of "their traditions of democratic solidarity and their great ideals of liberty, progress and work in the national interests".

After dealing with the issues of economic policy, law enforcement and other specific points raised during last week's confidence debate in Parliament, Cossiga said that he had undertaken the reply "with the intention of contributing to the clarification of the thinking and aims of the government".

Moving on to foreign policy, the premier, who is the current duty chairman of the European Economic Community, said that the role of Europe should be one capable of "contributing to the settlement of conflicts and safeguarding the detente process" and added that this European role is gaining "growing recognition throughout the world". In this connection, he cited the decisions of the Japanese and Canadian governments to seek out a joint stance along with the Community Nine nations. The premier said that Europe will always be ready to back "realistic and constructive initiatives.... aimed at an overall settlement and based on the principles contained in the United Nations Security Council resolution".

Speaking of Italy's position in international affairs, Cossiga affirmed that "through real Western solidarity, our country will continue to take part in all initiatives shaped to settling crisis situations now underway".

Addressing himself to development surrounding the Soviet troop occupation of Afghanistan, the premier said that "the consequences of this Soviet initiative of regional destabilization can be eliminated only through the realization of the United Nations resolution on the withdrawal of foreign troops from that country".

L'UNITA NOTES CORDIALITY OF PRC RECEPTION OF PCI DELEGATION

[Renzo Foa dispatch: "Berlinguer Arrives in Beijing"]

[Excerpt] Beijing--The handshake between CCP Secretary General Hu Yaobang and PCI Secretary General Enrico Berlinguer was particularly warm, under the flashlights of the photographers, the floodlights of the television crews and the gaze of a host of journalists from many countries. This was an important handshake: It formalized the full resumption of relations between the parties after a very long interruption, which coincided with a historical phase of turmoil, but also of development and growth among the workers and progressive forces of the entire world. It was a very significant handshake. Hu Yaobang summed up its main significance probably in the following comment: "We are meeting again," he said, addressing Gian Carlo Pajetta, "as old friends." And yesterday morning the CCP paper RENMIN RIBAO pointed out how "the Chinese and Italian parties have given each other aid and solidarity in the long struggle of the past." What is the significance now of the resumption of relations?

The first hours which the PCI delegation--composed of comrades Antonio Rubbi, Angelo Oliva and Silvana Dameri--spent in Beijing and the first informal conversations helped at once to show, with a welcome which was certainly not merely ritual, that the atmosphere is very cordial. The aircraft landed in Beijing yesterday shortly after 1830 local time, after an almost 18-hour journey with stopovers in Athens and Bombay. The first ceremony was held at Beijing's new, modern and functional airport building. Hu Yaobang welcomed the guests together with Vice Prime Minister Ji Pengfei, who is also chief of the CCP Central Committee International Liaison Department, and several other leaders, including the following: Feng Xuan, Central Committee member and deputy chief of the same section; Wu Xuenqian, another deputy chief of the section, and Li Zuzheng, unit chief in the section.

The welcome was given at the end of a long moving walkway leading from the aircraft parking area to the center of the building. It was a quick one. Next, amid the throng of photographers and reporters, the group walked to a room where Hu and Berlinguer had their first conversation. [paragraph continues]

They have known each other for some time, since the time of the World Federation of Democatic Youth, and the same applies to Pajetta. And so the dialogue began, with smiles which were certainly not for the sake of photoreporters who pestered the interlocutors for some time. The dialogue subsequently continued with Ji Pengfi in the residence placed at the disposal of the PCI delegation, the house for "honored state guests." Here, too, the meeting was characterized by lively cordiality. Of course, these are just the preliminary meetings. Today, with the exchange of toasts by Hua Guofeng and Berlinguer at the banquet which the Chinese chairman will give for the Italian guests, it will be possible to assess the bases for dialogue and what messages this visit could transmit.

PCI DENIES SPONSORSHIP OF ETHIOPIAN-ERITREAN TALKS

AU192003 Rome ANSA in English 1940 GMT 19 Apr 80

[Text] (ANSA)-Rome, April 19--The Italian Communist Party (PCI) today said that while secret meetings may well have been held between Ethiopians and Eritreans, the contacts did not take place under the auspices of the PCI.

The statement was a denial of remarks made yesterday in Cairo by a representative of the Eritrean Liberation Front, Taha Mohammed Nur. Nur said that secret meetings were recently held in Rome, Berlin and Moscow under the auspices of the PCI with a view to bringing about a rapprochement between the two warring sides.

The PCI in its statement today said that, in any case, the Italian Communists were in favor of such a rapprochement.

VATICAN RADIO CITES CRITICISM OF CIA USE OF MISSIONARIES

AU210924 Rome ANSA in English 0845 GMT 21 Apr 80

[Text] Vatican City, April 21 (ANSA)--The American "Catholic Missionary Council" has criticized legislation drafted by Washington law-makers on the activities of the Central Intelligence Agency because it fails to "forbid using American missionaries as sources of information," Vatican Radio reported here Sunday.

The radio quoted the secretary of the American organization as telling a congressional commission that American missionaries around the world must enjoy "the full confidence" of the communities in which they work and that they "cannot represent American poicy any place."

The head of the missionary council, Father Anthony Bellagamba, then told the congressmen that "the least idea of any possible ties between the CIA and U.S. missionaries throws a shadow of doubt over the motivations of these missionaries who have travelled to foreign lands. This suspicion is persistent and has eroded confidence in our work," he continued. Father Bellagamba then warned that, "if the legislation does not remove this shadow, the erosion will continue and undermine our work as missionaries, making it impossible to conduct our work of evangelization."

Vatican radio recalled that a similar request was filed with the CIA by the secretary of the American Episcopal Conference, some time ago.

ATTORNEY FOR RED BRIGADES COMMITS SUICIDE

AU191625 Rome ANSA in English 1525 GMT 19 Apr 80

[Text] Genoa, April 19 (ANSA)--A Genoa attorney who had defended a number of alleged members of Italy's "Red Brigades" urban terrorists committed suicide this morning when carabinieri police appeared at his home with a warrant for his arrest on charges of subversive association and formation of an armed group. The 53 year-old trial lawyer, Edoardo Arnaldi, received permission from the arresting officers to go to the bathroom to change his clothes,and, once alone, pulled a pistol and shot himself in the head.

The evidence backing the arrest warrant, signed by magistrates in Turin, was not disclosed but it is thought to be connected to the lengthy confession made by the alleged "Brigades" chief in Turin, Patrizio Peci, taken into custody on February 19.

In Milan, another attorney who has defended alleged terrorists, was arrested this morning on the same charges contained in Arnaldi's warrant. The order for the arrest of 44-year-old Sergio Spazzali was signed by the Turin investigating magistrate.

According to unconfirmed reports gathered in Milan, a number of people have been taken into custody in the northern Italian industrial capital on similar charges over the past 24 hours.

LIBYAN BUSINESSMAN SLAIN IN ROME'S VIA VENETO

AU210930 Rome ANSA in English 0840 GMT 21 Apr 80

[Text] Rome, April 21 (ANSA)--The wealthy Libyan businessman shot to death Saturday night on Rome's famous Via Veneto was possibly a victim of a member of a gang of Libyan killers tracking down abroad their fellow nations who have exported their riches and fled the country, according to the confession of the 23-year-old alleged gunman and other police findings.

Speaking of 51-year-old Abdel Gelil Aref, cut down while seated at the well-known watering place, "Caffe' du Paris," Jussef Sallata, charged with the crime, told police that he was "an enemy of the people and of Libyan leader Mu'ammar al-Qadhdhafi, which is the same thing."

He also said that he had acted "on the personal conviction that the businessman was plotting in Italy against my country, something which could absolutely not be tolerated."

One of the two other young Libyan nationals picked up here in connection with the slaying, Elbai Khalifa, is reportedly a friend of the alleged killer and a member of a Libyan organization which moves against the enemies of the nation abroad.

The other young man arrested was identified as 29-year-old Ahmed Hamad Hamed.

All three Libyans entered Italy three months ago and the two friends of the confessed killer were students at the university for foreigners in Perugia.

After the trio were rounded up, police began efforts to determine if there are any connections between the Saturday killing, the murder of another Libyan national in Rome in March and the slaying of a Libyan journalist in London last week.

PRESS VIEWS INTERNATIONAL TENSIONS, DOMESTIC TERRORISM

AU191634 Rome ANSA in English 1535 GMT 19 Apr 80

[Excerpt] Rome, April 19 (ANSA)--The tense state of affairs on the international scene and the ongoing battle against terrorism on the home front were the top two issues taken up in editorial comment in the Italian press today.

The Rome journal LA REPUBBLICA, in a lengthy analysis of East-West tensions, traced current conditions back to "the decision imposed by the White House on European NATO allies to accept, whatever the cost, the production and installation of new medium-range missiles in Europe". According to the editorial, Europe's reply to the "appeal saved NATO solidarity but international tensions rose. Unfortunately", the daily continued, "there is now the risk of repeating the mistake with economic and diplomatic sanctions against Iran and the question of participation in the Moscow Olympic games.

"America's European allies have an extremely important role. If they are really good allies", REPUBBLICA reasoned, "they must not go along with and back America in this mistake. If they give ground to (American President Jimmy) Carter's election year nerves, they are not good allies but satellites with no role of their own".

On the same issue of a European stance in the U.S.-Iranian crisis situation, the Milan paper IL GIORNO pointed out that a form of counterbalance to the Iran represented by religious leader Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeyni exists in the "lay Iran". The daily then affirmed that, "perhaps no one like Italy and France, Europe in general, would be more capable of understanding and supporting this 'lay Iran' in its difficult growth to keep it, through balanced acts, from becoming enclosed in Khomeyni's dark embrace".

The Communist Party organ, L'UNITA, gave wide play to the appeal lodged with West German Chancellor Helmut Schmidt by a group of writers, including Guenter Grass who urged Schmidt "not to follow the U.S. on the path to adventure" and declared, "After Vietnam, the American Government lost the right to air moral appeals".

Milan's big CORRIERE DELLA SERA turned its editorial over to "the fear of war" and noted that "three or four crises at the same time--U.S.-Iran, U.S.S.R.-Afghanistan, Iran-Iraq U.S.S.R.-China--are perhaps too many for diplomacy to handle". Commenting on the American President's latest press conference the paper said, "without modifying the basic terms of the situation, the president's speech appeared as a further step along the road toward adopting military measures".

On the other big topic of the day, the allegedly talkative and repentant "Red Brigades" terrorist leader, Patrizio Peci, captured in Turin on February 19, the Rome paper PAESE SERA said that the most recent arrests made thanks to Peci's confession mark "an historic development in the battle against terrorism". The editorial then warned that "despite the direct hit at the nerve center, (terrorism) has not been eliminated" and brought up the names, aside from the "Brigades", in the headlines as those groups allegedly responsible for other bloody terrorist crimes. PAESE concluded with the statement that "repression will not be enough to defeat terrorism. Something more is required, a change of atmosphere in the nation's institutions."

INDUSTRY MINISTER SAYS NATION INDEPENDENT OF IRANIAN OIL

LD200900 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 0800 GMT 20 Apr 80

[Text] Iran has banned all sales of oil to Portugal following the Portuguese Government's decision to break off trade relations with that country. The news of the Iranian oil embargo against Portugal was announced by Tehran radio and was followed by a warning to all prospective purchasers of Iranian oil that if they sell a single barrel of oil to Portugal they will be placed on the blacklist of the Iranian Foreign [as heard] Ministry.

Meanwhile, Portuguese Minister of Industry and Technology Alvaro Barreto reacted to the Iranian authorities' decision to cut off oil supplies to Portugal by saying: This measure will not affect international oil supplies to our country. We had not planned any oil purchases from Iran in 1980. Alvaro Barreto said that our oil requirements for the current year have already been secured and that steps are already being taken to make Iranian supplies unnecessary in 1981.

COMMUNIQUE ON SPANISH-U.S. COUNCIL MEETING NOTED

LD182258 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 1830 GMT 18 Apr 80

[Text] Spain and the United States today agreed to arrange a program of preparatory meetings spread over the next few months to examine the future of the treaty of friendship and cooperation between the two countries which will expire in September 1981. This was announced in Washington in a joint communique released this afternoon at the close of the regular session of the Spanish-U.S. Council, chaired by U.S. Secretary of State Cyrus Vance and our Foreign Minister Marcelino Oreja.

According to the communique, the Spanish minister and the U.S. secretary of state made an appraisal of the whole of Spanish-U.S. relations and they agreed that it would be suitable to arrange for this aforementioned program of preparatory meetings to examine the future of the treaty of friendship and cooperation.

At the end of the Council session Cyrus Vance hosted a working luncheon in honor of Marcelino Oreja and the other members of the Spanish delegation. Diplomatic sources point out that the Spanish minister expressed to the U.S. secretary of state Spain's solidarity with the United States in regard to the crisis resulting from the detention of the hostages in the Tehran embassy. The same sources pointed out that the solidarity voiced by Spain's representative is in response to the call made by the U.S. authorities some days ago and addressed to a number of its allies in which Washington stressed that these allies should support the actions arranged by the United States to secure the freeing of the hostages. But, and still according to these same diplomatic sources, Marcelino Oreja made it clear that Spain will wait before taking any concrete measures so as to see what is decided by the EC countries. In this way it was made clear that Spain wishes to align itself with the policy of concerted action by the Community, a Community which Spain will join once formal negotiations are completed.

CARTER'S LATEST SANCTIONS AGAINST IRAN, 'RISKS' ASSESSED

LD181654 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 1130 GMT 18 Apr 80

[Station commentary]

[Text] A new package of measures involving economic sanctions against the Tehran government was announced yesterday by the President of the United States. American pressure to obtain the release of its hostages is thus proceeding in a slow but sure way. The measures imposed involve, among other things, a ban on all Iranian imports.

It is difficult to assess the effectiveness of these sanctions, especially if they are linked to other similar attitudes and behavior by countries which are allies of the United States. In short, things are now building up to something like an ultimatum, not purely economic in nature but carrying with it risks which are clearly more serious.

As things stand the only winner in this game can be the Soviet Union, which has already concentrated 100,000 men on the Iranian frontiers. At the same time it is offering the Tehran government alternative trade routes across Soviet territory on the assumption that the Americans will impose a naval blockade. But the serious part of this game is that nobody knows what its limits are or at what point it may involve actions which become military in nature. Carter has said quite openly that there are limits to patience and that if punishment in the political field is not effective it may be necessary to employ military measures.

He also referred to the effectiveness of a blockade, which could not be adequately compensated by using trade routes through the Soviet Union, since land communications between Russia and Iran are limited and could not by any stretch of the imagination offset the effects of a blockade if Western countries joined in.

CABINET ECONOMIC POSTS REPORTEDLY TO BE RESHUFFLED

LD182322 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 2200 GMT 18 Apr 80

[Excerpt] The forthcoming Cabinet reshuffle which is being prepared by Prime Minister Adolfo Suarez may well turn out to be more extensive than has hitherto been talked about. This was said today by the EUROPA PRESS AGENCY in a detailed report. What will be at the root of the ministerial changes is the question of the autonomies.

In political circles consulted by the press agency, Suarez reportedly has been thinking that Abril Martorell will leave the post of second deputy prime minister in charge of economic affairs to become a deputy prime minister with political responsibilities. There will be a subsequent movement of personalities in the other economic ministries, primarily affecting the minister of economy, Jose Juis Leal. For the post of deputy prime minister in charge of economic affairs, mention is made of the name of Rafael Calvo Ortega, currently minister of labor, who is apparently resisting attempts to get him to become secretary general of the UCD [Democratic Center Union], a post which has been offered to him on more than one occasion.

Spokesman Denies Reshuffle Discussed

LD191546 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 1130 GMT 19 Apr 80

[Text] Government Spokesman Jose Melia denied that yesterday's Council of Ministers discussed the question of possible Cabinet changes, a decision which is exclusively within the competence of the prime minister. Nevertheless, it is being said in political circles that a ministerial reshuffle is very near. It is thought this would be aimed at stiffening up government policy in matters concerned with autonomy arrangements, the economic situation and public order. These three areas will undoubtedly figure in the address which Prime Minister Adolfo Suarez is due to make to parliament, though the date of this has still not been fixed.

Melia went on to say that the Council of Ministers had not discussed the matter of Suarez's address. Nevertheless, the government spokesman went in depth into the importance of three draft laws from the Ministry of Defense which the government has decided to send to the Cortes for approval. The purpose of these is to rejuvenate the armed forces. Melia expressed the opinion that the three drafts will allow greater mobility and military men will more easily be able to move into high-level posts without having to work their way up a fixed scale of promotion, provided they meet the established requirements. All of this will allow greater efficiency in the armed forces and better professional achievements for all who follow a military career.

AFTENPOSTEN NOTES CONFLICTING INTERESTS OVER JAN MAYEN TALKS

[Morten Fyhn report: "Jan Mayen Zone on 1 June?"]

[Text] Reykjavik, 14 April--Regardless of the outcome of the negotiations with Iceland on Jan Mayen, it is highly probable that Norway will set up a 200-mile zone around the island at the same time Denmark does the same around Greenland. Denmark has hinted to Norway that such an expansion of the zone is likely by 1 June at the latest, key members of Norway's delegation at the talks in Reykjavik told AFTENPOSTEN.

Norwegian officials are more and more preoccupied with the problems which will arise when eastern Greenland north of the 67th parallel extends its territorial limit to 200 miles, so that waters lying in the direction of Jan Mayen will become accessible to fishing vessels from the EEC. Since Denmark is laying claim to a full zone round Greenland, and everything suggests that it will put this claim into effect, this will mean that the planned Norwegian Jan Mayen zone will be greatly reduced in size. According to information that AFTENPOSTEN has received, both Foreign Minister Knut Frydenlund and Fisheries Minister Eivind Bolle are fully aware that Norway cannot neglect to set up a zone around Jan Mayen when Denmark sets up a zone round Greenland. This is due both to domestic political reasons and to fears that the question of a demarcation line between the two zones would be further complicated if Norway were to be faced with a fait accompli.

During the tough and complicated negotiations with Iceland, the Greenland question has been discussed. The Icelanders have asserted that, even if their own 200-mile limit is not to be encroached upon by a Jan Mayen zone, this will not necessarily be the case with a Greenland zone. However, it is a great problem for Iceland that the EEC will be able to fish in Greenland's zone and Iceland will have no influence on the size of quotas. Capelin is also fished in the area, and it is well known that Iceland claims that capelin stocks belong to Iceland.

It was decided on Monday to appoint a group of officials to discuss the fishing problems in greater detail before the negotiations continue on Tuesday.

A group to look into the question of a demarcation line and the problems surrounding the continental shelf was also appointed.

During the negotiations Iceland has made it clear that it requires guarantees from Norway on significant Icelandic privileges on the shelf round Jan Mayen. For its part, Norway is not prepared to give these guarantees at present. One reason is that the question has not yet been discussed with the Storting's Foreign Affairs Committee. Norway can only agree to a proviso in the agreement with Iceland where it is stated that the establishment of a Norwegian fishing zone does not "prejudice" the parties' views on the continental shelf.

Norway also believes that the question of a full Icelandic 200-mile limit in the direction of Jan Mayen must be the object of later negotiations so that Norway now wishes to reserve judgement in the matter. In practice, this means however that the disputed area will for the moment remain Icelandic and that Norway will request Norwegian fishermen not to enter the area. Experts in international law in the Norwegian delegation have reacted strongly to what they call Iceland's taking the law into its own hands.

PRIME MINISTER FAVORS EC SANCTIONS AGAINST IRAN

NC181548 Paris AFP in English 1536 GMT 18 Apr 80

[Text] Copenhagen, April 18 (AFP)--Danish Prime Minister Anker Joergensen today came out in favour of European Community sanctions against Iran but warned that this might worsen the hostage crisis. Mr Joergensen said: "We find it would be just to establish economic sanctions against Iran at the EEC level, but we must realise that there is a risk of a violent reaction which could escalate the crisis to the disadvantage of the American hostages".

Mr Joergensen, who heads a minority Social Democratic government, said: "The current situation is totally unacceptable and we have throughout counted on backing the U.S. in trade restrictions."

The Community's policy is to be discussed at the meeting of foreign ministers on Monday and Tuesday. Mr Joergensen said it was important to reach agreement at Community level, and then the issue could be discussed at national level. He declared, "We are ready to do everything to support the efforts of the U.S.," adding, "particularly because the fundamental situation is destroying international cooperation".

ATHLETIC ASSOCIATION VOTES NOT TO SEND TEAM TO OLYMPICS

LD201617 Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 1530 GMT 19 Apr 80

[Text] Norway will not send a team to the Moscow Olympics unless the government of the country decides differently, the Norwegian Athletic Association decided after voting 73 to 57 to boycott the Olympic games as a protest against the presence of Soviet troops in Afghanistan. Today's decision annuls the decision made by the Norwegian Olympic Committee less than a month ago to participate in the games, since the Olympic Committee left the matter to be decided by the Athletic Association. For its part, the Norwegian Government shifted the decision to the sports organizations. Participation in the summer games must be announced by 24 May.

AFTENPOSTEN NOTES U.S. LOSS OF PATIENCE WITH ALLIES, IRAN

[Editorial: "Western Solidarity on Trial"]

[Text] In the deadlocked hostage conflict with Iran, President Jimmy Carter has not only met force with force in his dealings with the unpredictable fanatics in Tehran. It has become clear, especially in the last few days, that the United States wants to put Western solidarity to the test. Carter expects the European allies of the United States to give as strong support as possible to the U.S. sanctions--in the form of an economic boycott or at least a noticeable reduction in diplomatic relations.

The President has made it clear that U.S. patience--with its hesitant and vacillating allies, too--has definite limits. In a television interview with four European correspondents last weekend, Carter confirmed indirectly that he had set a time limit on the NATO countries' reactions, and it is not a matter of weeks or months. If the allies do not decide on some resolute action, the United States will expand the scope of sanctions unilaterally. Military measures must not, therefore, be excluded, and a naval blockade of Iran would in that case--it is implied--bring about by force the trade boycott which the Europeans are reluctant to implement on their own initiative.

There are many objections which can be made to Carter's course of action, and these objections have indeed come from several West European capitals. It has been pointed out that the United States has not consulted its allies sufficiently, that Carter does not take account of the fact that the Europeans can use their embassies in Iran to work for a peaceful solution to the hostage crisis, and that he--so runs less official criticism--is following the popular mood in the United States to ensure his reelection.

But the core of the problem lies elsewhere: Individual European nations such as France give public expression to the view that boycott action not only threatens their oil supplies but also limits their freedom of action toward the Third World in general. West Germany and Great Britain are in principle agreed that sanctions ought to be applied. But both countries doubt the effectiveness of a trade boycott; West Germany is, in addition, Iran's biggest trading partner in the West and imports over 10 percent of its oil from Khomeyni's republic. Here EEC solidarity also enters the picture and the French viewpoint carries much weight. One of the arguments used against a compact Western boycott is that it will drive Iran into the arms of the Soviet Union.

Many of the European reservations can be individually justified. But there is one decisive weakness in the attitude that the U.S. allies adopt in the hostage crisis: They have not put forward any effective alternative to the American measures. The problem is simply that something must be done to try to force those in power in Tehran to their senses in this detestable affair, which affects not only the United States. Carter can be criticized for much, but he cannot be accused of lack of patience with the authorities, which for 5 months now have acquiesced in the imprisonment of foreign diplomats. Now both the possibilities of negotiation and U.S. patience are exhausted.

One must also agree with Carter when he reminds his allies today that, in January this year, when anger over the taking of the hostages was as yet unaffected by the ravages of time, they voted in favor of UN sanctions against Iran which Moscow succeeded in vetoing in the Security Council. If the situation has changed in the meantime, it is clear that it has not changed for the better. While West Europe hesitates and debates, Khomeyni's self-confidence grows and confidence in Western cooperation declines.

HURD COMMENTS ON EC MEETING ON IRAN SANCTIONS

LD201732 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1603 GMT 20 Apr 80

[Text] The Western alliance has been plunged into a crisis by President Carter's demand for sanctions against Iran, Douglas Hurd, Foreign Office minister, said today. He expressed his fear that there would be moves to pull American troops out of Europe if the Common Market countries failed to support the United States on the hostage issue. In an interview with Brian Walden on the London weekend television programme "Weekend World", he said: "It is a crisis within the alliance, almost, one would say, a spiritual crisis."

"It's not that enormous interests of the alliance are at stake in Tehran. What is at stake are 53 diplomats from the leading member state of the alliance, and therefore it's really a spiritual--indeed emotional--challenge to the alliance--the most important challenge of all. And so it is of immense importance to the future life and success of the alliance on which our security in Britain, this weekend and every weekend, does actually depend."

Asked if American disenchantment with Europe could lead to the break-up of NATO, Mr Hurd said he thought moves in that direction would begin quite quickly. He said: "Structure now, or giving the Americans cause to pick away at it, then I think the consequences for the alliance could be very grave. There would be a danger--not immediately, not overnight, not this year necessarily, but in the longer term--a danger that the basic feeling in the United States that they belong to an alliance that is important, workable, and worth the effort involved, would be undermined."

Mr Hurd also said that Britain was determined to secure the EEC foreign minister's support for an agreed package of sanctions against Iran at their meeting tomorrow. He made it cle that if Lord Carrington could not get agreement to a common EEC position, Britain would go it alone, and implement sanctions anyway, along with other like-minded members of the EEC. "If there were a collapse, a total failure to reach any agreement at Luxembourg, then I think that those who were willing to support the Americans have said so--the Germans and ourselves are obvious examples--would certainly need to get in touch with one another and see what we could pick out of the unsatisfactory situation and what we could do."

What came out of the Luxembourg meeting would not be the last word--"I think it will be the first stage of the first chapter--I think there will be more to come, if the Iranians continue to hold the hostages," he added. Asked if diplomatic relations would be broken off with Iran, he said: "Nobody in principle favours that. On the other hand, you have got to show the Iranians that taking diplomats as hostages is a breach of the whole basis of international law and not just a quarrel with the Americans."

CLARIFICATIONS ON ROLANDHIS-ERKMEN MEETING CONTINUE

Spokesman Refrains From Comment

NC190737 Nicosia I MAKHI in Greek 19 Apr 80 p 1

[Text] The government spokesman yesterday refrained from any comment on yesterday's press report that the foreign ministers of Cyprus and Turkey, Mr Rolandhis and Mr Erkmen, will be maintaining regular contact through Strasbourg within the framework of the "top secret" agreement they reached at the meeting they had in Lisbon.

When called upon to comment on this latest report, the spokesman confined himself to saying that he has nothing to declare.

Besides this, an official announcement concerning yesterday's report in the newspaper HALKIN SESI--which, after referring to a meeting between its correspondent and Mr Rolandhis, includes, among other things, the earlier report that "Mr Erkmen turned down a request from Mr Rolandhis for a meeting"--clarifies once more that there was never a question of a request for or a rejection of such a meeting.

The circumstances under which Mr Rolandhis met with Mr Erkmen, concludes the announcement, are described in the official statement on the subject issued on 16 April 1980.

Foreign Ministry Denial

NC191103 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1030 GMT 19 Apr 80

[Text] The Foreign Ministry has denied Turkish allegations that Foreign Minister Rolandhis had asked to meet with Turkish Minister Erkmen and that the request had been turned down.

A statement issued by the ministry says that no meeting with the Turkish foreign minister had been requested either directly or through a third country. It adds that we do not know, however, whether a third country had on its own initiative sounded out the possibility of such a meeting.

The statement then says that although such bilateral contacts would have been useful, Turkey's position on such meetings is well known and consequently no move was made. The statement repeats that Mr Rolandhis and Mr Erkmen had only talked ceremonially.

Commenting on a report published in the Turkish Cypriot newspaper HALKIN SESI, the statement makes it clear that the meeting which Mr Rolandhis held with the president of the Turkish Cypriot Journalists Union, Mr Cemal, was not for the purpose of the minister granting an interview. It is also made clear that Mr Rolandhis had in the presence of the president of the Cyprus Editors Union, Mr Kannaduros, said that Mr Erkmen had impressed him as a serious and distinguished politician, and that he had neither met nor asked to meet with Mr Erkmen.

A statement issued after the meeting said that they had discussed matters of common interest, particularly cooperation between the two organizations and between the Greek and Turkish Cypriot journalists in general. The statement adds that both sides stressed the importance of such contacts for creating an atmosphere of friendship, goodwill, trust and rapprochement between the two communities for the finding of a just and peaceful solution to the political problem.

Mr Cemal also met with members of the ESK Executive Committee and other journalists. He was also received by the foreign minister and met with the AKEL secretary general and the director of the Public Information Office.

BRITISH DEPUTY FOREIGN SECRETARY MAKES STATEMENT UPON ARRIVAL

NC191622 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1600 GMT 19 Apr 80

[Text] British Deputy Foreign Secretary and Lord Privy Seal Sir Ian Gilmour arrived in Cyprus this afternoon for a 5-day visit during which he will have contacts with officials of the republic. In a statement at Larraca Airport he said that during his stay he will try to see as many people and places as possible and will be briefed on the many problems of Cyprus.

Asked whether his visit is connected with a new British Government initiative on the Cyprus issue, Sir Ian Gilmour said that he has come to see and learn about the UN initiatives. He said he hopes that they will bear fruit. He said: We will not interfere in this matter.

Asked whether he had met with the UN secretary general before coming to Cyprus, Sir Ian Gilmour said that he saw Mr Waldheim while he was passing through London on his way to Salisbury, where he attended the Zimbabwe independence celebrations, but their talks were not related to this current visit to Cyprus. Naturally, he said, we reviewed the situation in the Middle East and various other issues.

FINANCE MINISTER AVXENDIOU RETURNS FROM PRAGUE VISIT

NC181951 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1630 GMT 18 Apr 80

[Text] Finance Minister Avxendiou returned from Prague this afternoon where he had signed an agreement on avoiding double taxation between Cyprus and Czechoslovakia as well as amendments to the agreement for economic cooperation between the two countries.

Mr Avxendiou stated he is satisfied with the results of his visit. He also said that the amendments to the 1976 agreement for economic cooperation extend the validity of the agreement until the end of 1983 so that it may be possible for Cyprus to use the $5 million in credit that had been granted by Czechoslovakia with very favorable terms. These credits were given to finance machinery imports to be used in development projects. On the basis of the same agreement, Czechoslovakia has also given an additional $5 million in credit with the same favorable terms.

Mr Avxendiou has stated that, in his talks with Czechoslovak ministers, he established warm feelings of friendship between the two countries. He added: The Czechoslovak Government stands by the struggle which Cyprus is waging for political survival and gives its support in the economic field.

MAGAZINE CITES INCREASED TURKISH MILITARY ACTIVITIES

NC201002 Nicosia IKONES in Greek 18-24 Apr 80 pp 14-16

["Exclusive" report headlined: "The Turks Are Bringing More Troops"]

[Excerpts] With unusual haste that raises many questions the Turkish military forces in Cyprus have lately been strengthened both in manpower and material.

Reinforcements are being sent by Turkish Air Force transport planes that make repeated flights to Tymbou Airport and by Turkish Navy ships that berth in Famagusta Harbor. In a nonstop airlift that has been particularly heightened over the last few months, heavy four-engined C-130 Hercules aircraft, together with twin engined C-47 Dakotas and C-160 Transalls, have landed continuously at Tymbou Airport bringing material and supplies for the forces in Cyprus.

The transport planes of the Turkish Air Force use Tymbou Airport mainly for the transportations of delicate equipment, such as telecommunications sets and missiles, while at the same time they also carry high-ranking officers.

The main point for the embarkation of reinforcements is Famagusta Harbor, part of which is always closed off for security reasons. The reinforcements that are arriving in Cyprus belong to the 2d Army Corps.

The 2d Corps has under its command 23 infantry battalions and 3 armored squadrons with 180 M-47 and M-48 tanks and 150 M-113 armored personnel carriers. This command is supplemented by 3 reconnaissance squadrons with armored vehicles and a mechanized battalion stationed at Kato Dhikomo. In addition, an infantry company is stationed in the headquarters area and another company uses the Kyrenia Bishopric.

The strength of the Turkish forces in Cyprus has recently increased considerably from 35,000 and has already reached 42,000 men. In addition, the Turkish forces are being strengthened not only in manpower but also in materiel. The obvious attempt to upgrade the equipment must be regarded as a very serious development. Certain units that have arrived in Cyprus are already using the ultramodern Milan antitank missiles, which are guided to their target by infrared light. They are regarded as extremely accurate and their range is from 25 to 2,000 meters, the latter distance being covered in 12.5 seconds. In Turkey and Cyprus together the Turks have a total of 6,250 missiles and 483 launchers. Of particular significance is the strengthening of the antiaircraft defense system on our island. The Turks now have in Cyprus an antiaircraft battery equipped with Hawk ground-to-air missiles headquartered in the area of Ayios Khrysostomos.

The Turks have also considerably improved and strengthened their antiaircraft guns by bringing more M-51s and M-55s into Cyprus.

Turkish Navy landing craft have brought to Cyprus heavy self-propelled M-107 guns and tractor-drawn 8-inch M-115s and 155 millimeter M-114s. The Turkish forces in Cyprus already have 6-7 artillery units with a total strength of about 100 guns.

In parallel with other weapons, the Turks have made terrifying improvements in the telecommunications equipment and electronic monitoring sets in Cyprus. The Cyprus Telecommunications Authority installations at the Kantara station have been converted into a huge telecommunications signals center for the needs of the Turkish Army. Kantara is under the absolute control of the signals commander and it is strictly prohibited for anyone to approach it. With the new electronic sets they can interfere with our frequencies as well as with the telephone network. A characteristic example is that during one of our recent civil defense exercises the Turks interfered in the conversations, thus not only showing that they know quite a lot but also causing chaos at will. A parallel signals center lies east of Aghirda. This is a substation manned by a company that is encamped together with another company from the army's air force's near the airstrip at Krini.

The strengthening of Turkish units with electronic monitoring sets recently became particularly important with the introduction of ROT-9X sentinel sets. These are extremely lightweight radar sets for battlefield surveillance that can be carried by one man.

Turkey's obvious attempts to reinforce its forces in Cyprus and the efforts of its General Staff to bring the most modern weapons into the island raise quite a few curious questions. Why so much haste to strengthen the forces and why so many flights by Turkish Air Force transport planes? At least seven landings have been noted in only 1 day.

These reinforcements must definitely not be unnoticed by the Americans, the British and the other NATO intelligence services. If the information in the hands of a certain military attache, that the new U.S.-Turkish agreement also contains a special secret appendix referring to Cyprus, is true, then this explains a lot of things. And it appears that this is the way things stand. [paragraph continues]

Tangible proof is the official announcement that the United States has accepted the demand for the joint use of the large airbase at Incirlik. This base is absolutely necessary to intercept the Greek Air Force in the event of a military clash in the area of Cyprus.

The arrival in Cyprus of new reinforcements from Turkey leaves no doubt that because of the new strategic situation being created in the region the Turks have been given the green light for further military moves in Cyprus "when the time is ripe." This time they not only took but they also gave, and they have moreover offered bases and facilities that do not lie in Turkey but in Cyprus.

Reports that must be regarded as quite true since they come from the same source say that Turkey has agreed that in the event of a conflagration in the Persian Gulf, the U.S. Air Transport Command may use the Kayseri Air Base in Turkey to deploy reinforcements and, as a second phase and in the event of broader requirements, also the airport at Tymbou which has a very good runway and can accept all the types of aircraft used by the U.S. Air Transport Command today.

Basically, Cyprus is destined to be a bridgehead and a base for receiving the transport planes that will come from the Rhein-Main base in West Germany.

The landing bases are absolutely necessary because, at any given moment, Akrotiri will be used as an operation support base whenever the circumstances require.

TC FOREIGN MINISTRY REPLIES TO GREEK COMPLAINT ON FLIGHTS

TA181620 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1530 GMT 18 Apr 80

[Text] The Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Defense and Tourism has replied to the Greek Cypriot press reports to the effect that the Greek Cypriot administration has protested to the United Nations the violation of the Cyprus airspace by two Turkish military jet planes. The ministry's statement on the issue stresses that the Turkish Federated State is fully sovereign in northern Cyprus. The statement says that UNFICYP authorities were informed in advance that two jet planes would fly within the Ercan Air Control Region in northern Cyprus between 1000 and 1200 on 17 April, within the framework of a military exercise to be carried out with the knowledge of the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus authorities.

The statement adds: The efforts exerted by the Greek Cypriot administration to portray itself as the sovereign of the whole of Cyprus are in vain. The Turkish Federated State is the sovereign authority in northern Cyprus. The laws of the Turkish Federated State are in force, and we do not consider anyone, especially the Greek Cypriot administration, our respondent concerning exercises or any other activity to be carried out in our region. We hope that the UN authorities have reminded the Greek Cypriots about these realities.

TURKISH PAPER NOTES DISTRIBUTION OF TFSC CITIZENSHIP PAPERS

NC210720 Istanbul AYDINLIK in Turkish 18 Apr 80 p 5

[Erdogan Ozbalikci report from Nicosia]

[Excerpts] Intensive preparations are being made in northern Cyprus for the local elections to be held in June. All political parties are extensively engaged in these preparations because they all view these elections as advance preparations for the parliamentary elections due in 1981.

The emigration office of the Ministry of the Interior has recently begun to speedily and illegally distribute "TFSC citizenship certificates" to the citizens of the Turkish Republic who came to Cyprus from Turkey [after 1974]. This is being done to secure certain advantages for Denktas' National Unity Party in the parliamentary elections.

We have established that, while the number of the Turkish citizens who were granted TFSC citizenship certificates was 17,141 on 21 March 1980, this number rose to 31,290 on 26 March 1980. This means that in 5 days, 14,149 citizens of the Turkish Republic have been granted Turkish Cypriot citizenship. This process of converting Turkish citizens into Turkish Cypriot citizens is still rapidly continuing. This is causing displeasure among the Turkish Cypriot citizens.

KARAMANLIS ISSUES STATEMENT ON PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDACY

AT191527 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1500 GMT 19 Apr 80

[Statement issued by Prime Minister Konstandinos Karamanlis in Athens on 19 April--read by announcer]

[Text] Prime Minister Karamanlis has stated that despite the fact that he does not have either personal or party goals he could agree to be nominated for the candidacy of president of the republic provided that politicization of the election is avoided and deputies are allowed to vote according to their conscience. The prime minister's statement is as follows:

"As I have said in the past, I have no personal aspirations. If I had I would have satisfied them in 1975 when I was formulating the country's Constitution. At the time I could have strengthened the powers of the president of the republic, established his direct election by the people and been elected with a great majority. I could also have been elected with a great majority by the previous Parliament in which New Democracy had 220 deputies.

"Instead, I considered it my duty to remain in active politics in order to consolidate our still sensitive democracy and confront the critical internal and external problems bequeathed to us by the dictatorship.

"Therefore, I have neither personal nor party goals and it would be in accordance with my wish to withdraw at some point from politics after 45 years of service because in our country nobody knows how his life will end as a politician.

"Nevertheless, I could agree to be a candidate and place myself at the disposal of the national representatives and consequently of the country. However, in such a case I would wish that politicization of the election be avoided and the deputies be allowed to vote according to their conscience because only then, if I am elected, could I place myself above parties and exercise my duties politically uncommitted and with enhanced prestige.

"I believe that if this position is accepted it will rid us all of unnecessary dilemmas and will contribute to the stabilization of the regime."

In addition, in reply to a question on whether he intends to discuss the issues which have been raised by various parties on the occasion of the election of a president, Prime Minister Karamanlis said:

"I think that even if some of these issues could be discussed it is not proper for the prestige of the institution to link them with the election of the president."

Opposition's Response

AT191912 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1830 GMT 19 Apr 80

[Text] In connection with Karmanlis' statement, the opposition parties had the following reactions. Leader of the official opposition, PASOK Chairman A. Papandreou, after analyzing the constitutional rights of the parties in comparison with the rights of the deputies, declared in a statement that PASOK had already decided at the sixth meeting of its Central Committee that it would not cooperate in the election of a president from the current Chamber of Deputies and it stands on this decision. In its opinion the current Parliament does not express the political composition of the electorate.

EDIK Leader Zigdhis stressed that this hour required a clear statement of the prime minister's intentions.

DODISO [Democratic Socialist Party] Chairman Pesmazoglou mentioned that his party maintains its positions.

In a statement by its Executive Committee, EDA [Unitary Democratic Left] stressed that the vote of Mr Iliou on Karamanlis candidacy for president of the republic will be negative.

KKE [Exterior] mentioned in a statement that the stance of its deputies will be determined on Wednesday by the plenary session of the party's Central Committee.

Finally KKE (Interior) asserted in a statement by the Central Committee's executive office that the situation which is being created, together with the likelihood of new elections of the plebiscite type, should be confronted in unison by all the parties of the democratic opposition.

In reply to questions from the press on the reactions of the parties of the opposition, a government spokesman stated: The prime minister put forth an issue of principle. He did not ask anything from anyone. Consequently the nervousness, the haste and the phraseology with which the parties of the opposition reacted is surprising.

KKE (Interior) Statement

AT201430 Athens I AVYI in Greek 20 Apr 80 p 1

[Statement by the Executive Bureau of the KKE (Interior) Central Committee issued on 19 April 1980 on the presidential election issue]

[Text] "The prime minister and leader of 'New Democracy', Karamanlis, asked for the opposition's support so that he can be elected as a 'president of the republic who will be above parties.' He connects his election to a stabilization of the regime. Although Karamanlis can demonstrate positive elements in his post-junta policy, he is totally connected with the policy and responsibilities of 'New Democracy'. This policy, which has one-sided austerity, authoritarianism and 'we belong to the West' as its principal axis, has been rejected by the people who demand a change so that they can progress along the revivalist course toward democratic renewal. Karamanlis could perhaps become acceptable by the opposition as a joint candidate if he supplied political answers acceptable to the broadest majority of our people. In the way in which he presents himself, however, he cannot be a joint candidate. He is a candidate of the rightwing.

"If--over and above all this--he understood that the country needs a president who enjoys the broadest possible support, he could make a contribution if, through consultations with the political world, a way might be found for the support of a candidacy which would guarantee protection of our national interests, opposition to foreign dictates, and the smooth function of democratic institutions in accordance with the wishes of the greatest majority of our people.

"Naturally there are dangers but these dangers stem from dependence upon large-scale interests and the apparatus which 'New Democracy' and Karamanlis did not wish to strike against. Such dangers cannot be dealt with through the messianic attributes of one individual but only through a forging of national and democratic unity of spirit, through measures for strengthening and expanding democracy, and through democratic dialogue between the parties and the people within the framework of smoothly functioning democratic institutions.

"The KKE (Interior) believes that even after the Karamanlis declaration the situation which has been created, together with the prospect of elections of a plebiscite character, must be jointly handled by all the parties of the democratic opposition."

PASOK CHALLENGES NEW DEMOCRACY TO ELECTION CONFRONTATION

AT201649 Athens EXORMISI in Greek 20 Apr 80 p 1

[Editorial: "Take the Jump If You Dare"]

[Text] At long last the prime minister decided to rid the country of suffering under the speculation about his intention to run for the position of president of the republic.

He did not rid the country, however, of the spirit of despotism and his own "exclusivity." Karamanlis and the press which is friendly to him insist on relating the presidential election to "dangers threatening the future of the regime." They also use the "danger" of early elections. In this way, however, they are trying to force open doors. As far as PASOK is concerned, elections are most certainly necessary because its chairman, Andreas Papandreou, declared that the present composition of the Chamber of Deputies does not reflect the balance of power within the electorate. If anyone questions this--let them take the jump if they dare.

Karamanlis and his front force us to reflect back to the time of the political change when they usurped the vote of the Greek people under the Holt slogan [as published]: "Either you vote for us or there will be tanks again." It appears that according to the egocentric views of the prime minister the survival and the future of this country are irrevocably linked to his own existence.

Most certainly such a view takes us back several centuries to the era of the King Louis of France. Woe to the country which is lost without its "exclusive" leader.

We denounce this line which is being promoted by the prime minister himself, by the press which is friendly to him and by the state mass information media. According to this line, every time that the peoples democratic progressive forces approach authority, we begin to have "dangers" to the nation, to the regime and to everything which the sick mentality of the rightwing can expediently invent for the moment.

For Karamanlis and his front, the Greek people are only sovereign when they follow his deceitful slogans and they become "dangerous" when they refuse to follow them.

Interconnecting the country's calm, however, with the person of Karamanlis is an argument which turns against him personally. If he truly has the delusion of believing in this line then he must answer this great question: During the past 6 years, during which he exercised authority without interference, what did he do in this country to make sure that the smooth function of democratic institutions remained free from his own personal presence in the country's political life, in any capacity?

As for us, we believe that we will survive even without Karamanlis. Apart from all "president-mongering, danger-mongering, election-mongering" and the various deceitful tricks of the government, we await in readiness for the hour of confrontation before the sovereign Greek people.

We await for this hour with the unshakeable belief that this time the rightwing and its various champions will be forced to rid the country of their position of authority so that the way may at long last be opened for the great democratic change.

I KATHIMERINI CLAIMS BOTH RALLIS, AVEROF CANDIDATES FOR PM

AT191210 Athens I KATHIMERINI in Greek 19 Apr 80 p 1

[Text] Both G. Rallis and E. Averof persist with their original intention to compete for the leadership of New Democracy in case K. Karamanlis moves to the office of president of the republic.

According to verified reports by I KATHIMERINI, the contrary rumors which had been put in circulation recently regarding a "compromise" between the two most dominant successors are unfounded since Rallis and Averof continue to maintain that the issue of succession must be resolved by the parliamentary group on the basis of the party's charter and by adherence to democratic procedures. They themselves have stated that they will respect and obey the decision.

Specifically the rumors which recently tended to create confusion in connection with this issue allegedly said that G. Rallis had already accepted the "solution" that Averof be nominated as the only candidate and be elected "by acclaim" while he himself would accept any ministry to be offered to him by the next government.

DHROSOS WARNS AGAINST U.S. 'ERRORS OF JUDGEMENT'

AT201614 Athens I KATHIMERINI in Greek 20 Apr 80 p 8

[Yeoryios Dhrosos commentary: "Simple and Unpleasant Things on the Issue of Our Return to NATO"]

[Text] It is extremely easy to express opinions and make aphorisms, particularly from afar, on the great issues of our return to NATO, on Greek-Turkish relations and so forth. There is a lot of room for conjecture here. Naturally, since all negotiations on the issue are secret, one can make a conjecture on whatever one wants or on whatever seems natural and could, therefore, appear logical. In essence, however, things are extremely simple, although unpleasant. We have a recent article for example by a Greek-American professor who with great patriotism and emphasis tells us that the deadlocks we have reached are due to the fact that the Turks conduct their politics in a cunning, determined manner while we, on the other hand, neither clarify our positions nor handle our "affairs" with any determination.

Here, therefore, we have certain deviations from the truth. First of all there never were nor are there any Greek demands. We ask for nothing. We simply do not want any alteration in the status which now exists in the Aegean and we do not want any alteration in the balance of power between Turkey and Greece. We are not prepared to pay any ransom for our return to NATO. [paragraph continues]

We do not want to cede any of our legal rights to others or any of our rights derived from established facts--rights which have belonged to us to date. We have demonstrated our determination to insist upon these rights through rejection of repeated plans submitted to us and of much advice offered to us. We made it clear at the same time that there are alternate solutions to which we will resort if ever there is a choice between these proposals and any loss of our rights. Our position on this was always crystal clear, even though we are well aware of the numerous interests which at this very moment press for our return to our position as a full member of NATO.

The policy of the Turks was, in a certain way, both expected as well as not particularly cunning. They realized that international coincidence made their geographic position more important and they tried to exploit this as much as possible. Primarily, of course, they tried to exploit the situation financially becuase they had a great sense of urgency in this sector. It was, at the same time, very certain to everyone that they would succeed in this effort and that they would gain a temporary postponement of their economic crisis. They added certain political demands to their financial demands which, however, remained more or less transparent. They thought: If we succeed, then we all succeed, adding that anything achieved would be a gain. Thus they started talking about the correction of injustices, about military needs and so forth.

It is true the Americans did attempt to change the Turks' mind but the Turks raised the question of "honor" by saying that they could not negotiate under the threat of pressure. They threatened the Americans and in this way they won them over to their own side. If the Americans had insisted a little harder at that time they would have achieved everything. They did not see this and they gave in to Turkish threats, or rather Turkish pseudo-threats. The Turks had absolutely no way out. They needed huge sums of money. Such sums could only be provided by the West, in other words, by the Americans. There was no alternative way out for them. The Americans, however, bent over and stopped insisting. At the same time the Turks do have the formal right of refusing Greece's return without certain conditions. In this way things went as far as they did.

Greece has always rejected these conditions and has never given in under various forms of pressure. Greece had nothing else to do. It tried and it continues to try to exploit its own political and geographic position. Events in the Middle East, however, are developing with such speed that Turkey's position continually becomes more important.

If now the moment of judgement ever does arrive and Turkey, as it did in the past, chooses a certain neutrality, then this is another thing altogether. This would be another error in judgement by the Americans for which they will have to pay deeply as they have paid for all such errors in the past. We, however, cannot convince them about this in advance.

'UNDERSTANDING' WITH U.S. RECOGNIZES IRANIAN RELATIONS

TA191617 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 19 Apr 80

[Text] It has been announced that an understanding has been reached on Turkey's unique relations with Iran in talks held between Turkey and the United States regarding an economic embargo against Iran.

The Foreign Ministry Information Directorate General has issued a statement in connection with the U.S. wish concerning Turkey's participation in the embargo being imposed by the United States against Iran. The statement says:

The U.S. Government has contacted its allies and friends, including Turkey, regarding the sanctions it wishes to impose on Iran. Views have been exchanged on the issue during the contacts held between the U.S. ambassador and Turkish Foreign Ministry officials and Turkey's special relations with Iran have been explained. An understanding has been reached on the uniqueness of these relations.

ECEVIT COMMENTS ON IRAN SITUATION, U.S. PRESSURE

Remarks on Embargo

NC210730 Istanbul MILLIYET in Turkish 19 Apr 80 p 6

[Text] Ankara, special--Referring to the critical situation in our region, Republican People's Party Leader Bulent Ecevit told members of his party's joint group that the Middle East had been converted into a focus of international dispute. Ecevit added: "If the Iranian administration overplays its hand, the United States may sacrifice the hostages. In fact, the United States is rapidly approaching such darkness."

Maintaining that both the United States and the USSR are massing troops at strategic points close to Iran, Ecevit said this about embargo: "I am not aware of the extent of pressure being brought to bear on Turkey in connection with the embargo imposed on Iran, for our government maintains complete silence about it. If Turkey participates in the embargo, Iran will be pushed into the Soviet Union's sphere of influence against its will. We do not know whether the United States has considered the risks involved in this."

Meanwhile, also dwelling on Iraqi-Iranian friction, Bulent Ecevit stated that these two countries could mutually use racial and ethnic differences against each other. Ecevit added that such a development would concern Turkey as well. Ecevit concluded: "Friction in our region has escalated. This tension has proved that it can assume dangerous dimensions which would cause concern throughout the world. One can imagine how easily the whole world can be dragged into a conflagration by events that may erupt in our time in such an important area as the Middle East."

Comments on Iran-Iraq Tension

TA181905 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 18 Apr 80

[Text] RPP leader Bulent Ecevit has said that developments in the Middle East have gained new dimensions in recent days and that friction has escalated. Speaking at the joint meeting of his party's Senate and National Assembly groups, Ecevit said that the tension and friction between Iran and Iraq have reached great dimensions and that this situation might lead to a hot war.

Noting that such a war will not be restricted to the two countries alone and that it will lead to a new worldwide crisis, Ecevit said: of course, we cannot remain uninvolved in such a crisis and war; we cannot remain outside its area of influence. So much so that we might be the country most affected by it.

Ecevit said that the primary weapons used by Iran and Iraq against one another are ethnic and sectarian discriminations and that these weapons and means can easily affect Turkey as well. Noting that Turkey can be a pillar of stability and tranquillity in the region due to its geopolitical position and its historic and cultural relations, Ecevit said: I believe that at this stage Turkey's primary duty should be to try and reconcile Iran and Iraq, both of which are our neighbors, by maintaining our very close ties with them and by inspiring trust. Another duty that befalls Turkey--a vital one from Turkey's viewpoint--is to definitely take measures aimed at rendering ineffective Turkey secessionist movements, which are being used as a means for war in these neighboring countries. However, on the contrary, as a result of the government's attitude, the effects of these movements on Turkey's domestic situation are being increased; the danger is being exacerbated.

Ecevit said that the United States is applying very open and heavy pressure on its allies and friends regarding the sanctions which it wishes to impose on Iran. Noting that no doubt Turkey was also being pressured on the issue, Ecevit added that the government's silence on the issue increased his concern. Noting that the public was ignorant about the government's views regarding regional problems and that the government did not brief the opposition and the parliament on the issue, Ecevit added that the government created the impression that it let events take their own course.

Ecevit said that those who intended to creat disturbances in Turkey and destroy the democratic regime regarded combining violent acts directed against the regime with secessionist movements as the only means of dragging the masses into conflict. Ecevit added that, in combating violence and secessionist movements, one should refrain from adopting measures that might cause confrontation between the state forces and masses.

ENERGY MINISTER CLAIMS MORE CRUDE OIL TO BE IMPORTED FROM USSR

[Text] The amount of crude oil Turkey will import from the Soviet Union this year has been increased by 500,000 tons. The agreement envisaging this increase in crude oil imports from the Soviet Union will be signed in Moscow next week. LEADERS COMMENT ON CONSTITUTIONAL CHANGES, MAY DAY CELEBRATIONS

Demirel Statement

TA181801 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 18 Apr 80

[Excerpts] Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel has said that there are signs that, to a large extent, inflation will be controlled through the economic measures adopted on 24 January. Demirel has noted that he will not allow anyone to carry the pictures of Lenin, Stalin or Marx or flags with hammers and sickles on the streets of the country. Demirel held his weekly meeting with acting President Ihsan Sabri Caglayangil and talked with journalists upon emerging from the Cankaya Mansion.

A journalist recalled that DISK [Confederation of Revolutionary Worker Unions] is preparing to celebrate May Day and inquired about the views of the National Security Council on this subject. Demirel replied:

[Begin Demirel recording] Do not ask me the National Security Council's view. Ask me my own views. Let me tell you something: No one has the right to walk on the streets of this country carrying the pictures of Lenin, Stalin and hammer and sickle flags. There are Turkish (?leaders) and there is the Turkish flag. Let everyone carry those. We will not allow anyone to carry the pictures of Lenin, Stalin or Marx or flags with hammers and sickles on the streets of this country. This is not only my duty. It is the duty of every Turkish citizen. These acts are not related to freedom. They are merely destructiveness. Everyone should ask us to fulfill this duty. This is Turkey. This is our country and the state is the state of the Turkish Republic. [end recording]

Replying to another question, Demirel said that his party is in favor of the president being elected by the people. However, in that case, the system has to be changed and the authority and responsibility of the president, the government and the parliament should be readjusted.

On the subject of the state of emergency bill, Demirel noted that the preparations started by the previous government are continuing and that as soon as a president is elected he will seek a large consensus from other parties for the rapid enactment of this bill and the bill envisaging the establishment of state security courts. Demirel declared that, if an agreement cannot be reached with other parties on this subject, his party will submit both draft bills to the parliament.

In reply to another question, Demirel stated that Iran and Iraq should solve the disagreements between them through peaceful means. Expressing the wish that the disagreements do not turn into a hot war, the prime minister said: If there is a hot war in this region of the world, great difficulties will arise. We are concerned. We are following the events with concern and with extreme care.

Ecevit Address

TA201746 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 20 Apr 80

[Excerpts] RPP leader Bulent Ecevit said that those who realize that they will not be able to make the constitutional changes they want through legal means are now attempting to attain their goals through certain games and pressures. Ecevit noted: They are now aiming at illegal means.

Addressing the rally organized by the RPP in Sakarya today, Ecevit said that incidents of violence and the rate of inflation have increased 400 percent during the 5 months of the Demirel government and that all the claims and policies of the Justice Party have failed.

Pointing out that Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel and Nationalist Action Party leader Alpaslan Turkes are obstinately ignoring the crimes committed by the rightist militants, Ecevit said: Both leaders are among those who provoke acts of terror and secessionism as well as protecting militants.

Noting that it is no coincidence that calls for a constitutional change have recently intensified, Ecevit stated that the Justice Party wishes to make a constitutional change that will increase the power of the government and the big capitalist circles and will break the power of the people and the workers.

Ecevit continued: May Day is approaching. In a democratic and legal country, everyone is free to choose whether they wish to celebrate any particular day. However, there are different ways of celebrating. I call on workers from the RPP, who are loyal to democracy or have adopted the democratic leftist view, and on my worker friends who realize the workers' rights secured by the RPP and value them. The kinds of flags that the workers who are loyal to democracy and who have adopted the democratic leftist view--especially the RPP workers--can and cannot carry are known. The kinds of marching songs that they can and cannot sing and the kinds of pictures or symbols that they can and cannot carry are also known. Certain union leaders, who have been elected for certain duties through the support of these workers, cannot make these workers walk behind flags and pictures that they do not believe in. They cannot gather the workers around these flags and pictures. They cannot make them sing or listen to songs and slogans that are contrary to their beliefs. Our workers should not be misled by those who wish to drag Turkish workers behind the flags, pictures, songs and slogans of regimes that benefit from democratic workers' rights and even grant them insufficient rights or do not recognize any of these rights.

DISK Leader's Comments

TA191805 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 19 Apr 80

[Text] The leader of DISK [Confederation of Revolutionary Worker Unions] and GENEL-IS [Public Services Employees Union], Abdullah Basturk, has said Turkish workers have always been opposed to adventurist methods and to political murders.

The General Council meeting of GENEL-IS, affiliated with DISK, opened in Ankara today. After the national anthem was sung, Basturk addressed the meeting. He said that the union was opposed to limiting seniority pay, freezing wages and limiting union rights. Noting that there were attempts to eliminate workers' rights through a police state mentality, Basturk said that the union will not remain silent in the face of such an attitude and that it will continue to defend workers' rights and freedoms until the end.

Pointing out that the necessary legal steps have been taken for celebrations on May Day--workers day--to be held in the best possible manner, Basturk added that preparations in this regard have been completed. Referring to urbanization problems, Basturk said in his speech that municipalities were condemned to be crushed by municipal problems. Noting that the municipal revenues law, which was approved 32 years ago, was far from being adequate to meet current needs, Basturk called for the speedy ratification of the bill aimed at increasing municipal revenues. The GENEL-IS General Council meeting will last for 2 days. Union representatives from many countries are participating in the General Council of GENEL-IS, which has the largest number of members of all the public services unions.

NAP LEADER FAVORS EARLY ELECTIONS, CONSTITUTIONAL CHANGES

[Excerpts] Nationalist Action Party [NAP] leader Alpaslan Turkes said that the state security courts bill should be enacted as soon as possible and a referendum should be held on issues vital to the state. Turkes also stated that his party considers it essential to hold early elections as soon as possible. Turkes addressed the NAP rally held in Bolu today.

Pointing out that anarchic incidents could not be prevented even in provinces where martial law is being enforced because a firm attitude is not being adopted against communism and secessionism, Turkes said that the government did not fulfill its promise to eliminate anarchy although it has been in power for 5 months. Turkes called on the government to adopt a firm attitude on this. Expressing the view that there is no threat of fascism in Turkey, Turkes said that the nation should be enlightened and alerted in the face of the communist and secessionist threats. Demanding that this should be adopted as a national policy, Turkes said that the state security courts bill should be enacted as soon as possible, a referendum should be held on important national issues and constitutional changes which will strengthen the state should also be effected as soon as possible.

Pointing out that Turkey has been going through a period of political instability and weak governments, Turkes said that, in view of the current circumstances, elections should be held as soon as possible to ensure a strong government. He continued: It is necessary to grant new authority to various federal institutions on measures against internal and external threats directed against our nation and establish new institutions to deal with this subject. All these necessitate constitutional changes. These changes should be effected without any loss of time. It has become essential to make certain constitutional changes to prepare the way for a more powerful role by the president and the government.

GRAND NATIONAL ASSEMBLY EXTENDS MARTIAL LAW AFTER DISCUSSION

[Text] The Office of the Prime Minister's note concerning the 2 month extension of the martial law, which is currently being enforced in 20 provinces, and the exclusion of Erzincan and the inclusion of Agri in the martial law enforcement areas, has been adopted by the Grand National Assembly. After the Office of the Prime Minister's note on the issue was read at the joint session of the Senate and the National Assembly, which began under the chairmanship of [Assembly] Deputy President Ismail Hakki Yildirim at 1500, Minister of State and Acting Interior Minister Orhan Eren spoke on behalf of the government. Eren said the region in which Turkey is located is becoming more turbulent and that assaults directed against the regime have not yet been placed under control.

Noting that the state has mobilized all available means in its struggle against organized terror and that the efforts exerted have begun to yield fruit, Eren said positive developments have been observed in the Province of Erzincan and that it would be appropriate to lift the martial law in that province. He added that it was viewed as beneficial to include Agri among the martial law enforcement areas because of the various destructive elements being concentrated in the province and because the political atmosphere along the eastern border was becoming tense.

Expressing the views of the RPP group, Senator from Ankara Ibrahim Ozturk said the government, which had come to power holding great presumptions and defying anarchy, had not delivered what was expected of it in the fields of economy and domestic security. Noting that the government was dragging the country into darkness through faulty administration and partiality, Ozturk said that removing this government from office has become one of the most important duties of the parliament. He also said that the RPP found the continuation of the martial law to be convenient from the viewpoints of not enlarging the wounds opened by the government and of stopping the shedding of fraternal blood.

Expressing the views of the Nationalist Action Party [NAP], Deputy from Kahramanmaras Mehmet Yusuf Ozbas said that, with the implementation of the martial law, armed organizations which opposed the state security forces but which had not been caught before the enforcement of martial law are being uncovered throughout Turkey. Noting that the enforcement of the martial law was not as successful as it had been in 1971, Ozbas claimed that limiting the martial law to various provinces played an important role in this. Pointing out that the rate of success would be 100 percent if martial law were enforced throughout the country, Ozbas said the NAP group will vote in favor of extending the martial law.

Expressing the views of the Justice Party, Senate group chairman and Senator from Elazig Cahit Dalokay said anarchy and terror were directed against the state and the unity of the country. He said: We are happy to observe that anarchy has been correctly diagnosed. All the state forces have participated in this diagnosis. The threat is directed at the state. The unity of the country is the target. There are those who are plotting against the existence of the nation and the republican regime. Our reaction to this is definitely to struggle and not to surrender. Dalokay said his group will vote in favor of extending the martial law and including Agri in the martial law enforcement areas.

Expressing the views of the National Salvation Party [NSP], Deputy from Ankara Oguzhan Asilturk said that, given the current conditions in the world, Turkey was faced with the duty of becoming a very significant factor for stability in the Middle East. Asilturk added that, given the possibility of a hot war breaking out in the region at any moment, the Turkish Armed Forces should not lose any time enforcing martial law and should return to its original duty. Calling on the parties having groups in the parliament to unite, to assess the situation within the framework of a plan and to find solutions in order to enable the Turkish Armed Forces to return to their original duty, Asilturk said that duties befell political party leaders in regard to the issue. He said the group members were free to vote as they wished.

Replying to criticisms, Minister of State and Acting Interior Minister Orhan Eren said the government was exerting every possible effort to correct the various defects in the implementation of the martial law. Noting that the security forces were struggling against anarchy and terror throughout the country, Eren added that the struggle will continue until this trouble is eradicated.

After Eren's speech, the Office of the Prime Minister's note concerning the 2 month extension of the martial law, which is being enforced in 20 provinces, with the exclusion of Erzincan and the inclusion of Agri in the martial law enforcement areas, was adopted. The Senate and the National Assembly will meet jointly on Monday at 1500 to continue voting in the presidential election.

ARMENIAN SECRET ARMY WARNS AGAINST CIA PRO-TURKISH STAND

NC210750 Nicosia I DHIMOKRATIKI in Greek 21 Apr 80 pp 1, 10

[Text] The Armenian Secret Army Struggling for the Liberation of Armenia has charged that the CIA, in a perfidious attempt to protect Turkey from the Armenian blows, has begun spreading its agents in the ranks of the Armenian parties with the aim of causing a split in the Armenian leadership.

In a proclamation issued in Van, Eastern Turkey, the Armenian revolutionary leaders openly attacked the United States and its imperialist allies--as it calls them--warning them again that the Armenian armed struggle will continue until the establishment of a free and independent Armenia.

The proclamation says: "All the information in our hands indicates clearly that the U.S. secret agencies are serious in their designs to strike at our organization and leadership. This is a result of the many hard blows we have dealt to imperialist Turkey.

"Our members and followers throughout the world should know that our armed struggle is incompatible with U.S. imperialism and its secret agencies."

The proclamation was issued to mark the fifth anniversary of the armed struggle by the Armenian Secret Army against Turkey.

GENDARME OPERATIONS--In various operations conducted by gendarme units throughout the country between 26 March and 11 April, 604 suspects were apprehended, 101 of them charged with murder. A statement by the Interior Ministry's Information Office adds that various weapons were confiscated during these operations and that a workshop in which arms were manufactured was discovered in the Ericek village of Giresun. OKITA STOPS IN BRUSSELS EN ROUTE TO EC MEETING

OW210238 Tokyo KYODO in English 0227 GMT 21 Apr 80

[Excerpts] Brussels, April 21, KYODO--Japanese Foreign Minister Saburo Okita said here Sunday (Monday Japan time) that Japan still insists on a peaceful solution to the Iranian hostage crisis. Okita told reporters that the European Communities (EC) was "certain to come up with some sort of measures" against Iran at its foreign ministers' meeting in Luxembourg Monday and Tuesday in response to the U.S. call to apply more pressure for the release of the American hostages in Tehran. Japan is ready to coordinate with the European Community whatever decision the meeting makes. But, Okita added, efforts will still be made to find peaceful means to solve the hostage problem when he meets with his EC counterparts.

Okita arrived here Sunday night and is scheduled to fly on to Luxembourg Monday to attend the EC foreign ministers' meeting. Okita told reporters he will meet his EC counterparts in Luxembourg under a directive of Prime Minister Masayoshi Ohira. Japan wanted to have its views reflected in whatever decision the EC foreign ministers might make regarding the Iranian issue, he said.

PARTNERS REPORTEDLY PREPARED FOR CONCESSIONS ON BUDGET ISSUE

ID211037 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 21 Apr 80 p 1

[Alan Osborn report: "Hopes Grow of EEC Budget Deal"]

[Text] Signs of a general compromise in Mrs Thatcher's fight to cut Britain's massive Common Market contributions have emerged just one week before the crucial Luxembourg summit meeting of EEC heads of government. Reports from yesterday's meetings of EEC finance ministers in Sicily and from diplomatic sources in London and Brussels confirm that all the parties are now prepared to make important concessions.

It is stressed that several key questions are still unsolved. The EEC finance ministers will discuss the matter again in Luxembourg today. A revised set of proposals is likely to be drawn up by the Brussels Commission this week which will be considered by representatives of the EEC member governments on Thursday.

In Sicily yesterday the Italian treasury minister, Signor Pandolfi, said he was "cautiously optimistic," but added that a number of critical problems remained.

Mrs Thatcher is believed to be seeking a reduction of some 900 million pounds in Britain's payment, which this year is likely to be about 1,200 million pounds.

Mr Roy Jenkins, Commission president, said recently that the gap between the two sides had narrowed to about 250 million pounds, implying that France had substantially raised its "offer" from 350 million pounds, though a French spokesman later described this as "ridiculous."

Mrs Thatcher would be expected to have an extremely hard job domestically in defending a cut of 600 million pounds or less--just half the net payment. This would still leave Britain as the second-largest contributor after Germany in spite of being only the seventh-richest member.

But there seems little doubt that the government has now accepted the idea of a package deal and may be ready to make significant concessions to France on lamb and on farm prices.

President Giscard d'Estaing has insisted that the problem can be solved only in the context of a wider solution involving these and other topics.

A clue to the attitude on agriculture could come when farm ministers meet in Brussels tomorrow to consider Commission proposals for a 2.4 per cent farm price increase this year.

Mr Walker, agriculture minister, has called for price freeze--at least for products in surplus--but all other member countries want far higher increases than the Commission. France is likely to insist on British support for an increase of five per cent or more as a condition for budget concessions.

On lamb the French want Britain to support a common EEC policy for mutton and lamb aimed at providing price guarantees to producers. Britain would probably have agreed some time ago but for France's provocative act in defying a European court order for it to admit imports of English lamb.

According to some reports the marked retreat by both Britain and France from the tough stands they were taking less than a month ago is a direct result of the worsening international situation.

As to the actual form of any settlement it now looks as though the starting point will be the 350 million pounds cut conditionally agreed in Dublin in November. On top of that will be large measure of extra Community spending in Britain.

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE DELEGATION ARRIVES IN CYPRUS

NC201600 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1400 GMT 20 Apr 80

[Excerpt] The chairman and one member of the five-man delegation of the EEC Executive Committee and the European Investment Bank arrived in Cyprus today. Their aim is to continue the investigatory talks with the Cyprus Government for the second stage of the Cyprus-EEC association. The other three members of the delegation are expected to arrive in Cyprus late tonight.

On his arrival at Larnaca Airport, the head of the delegation, Mr Pierre du Chatteau, director general for foreign affairs of the EEC Executive Committee, stated that during its stay here the delegation hopes to familiarize itself with the situation on the island and the problems Cyprus faces. He said: We will continue the talks that another EEC delegation had in Cyprus last May in order to ascertain your wishes and intentions regarding the implementation of the financial protocol that exists between the European Community and your country.

He added: This time we will pinpoint projects and thus enter a more concrete stage in our financial cooperation.

REPORTAGE ON EEC MEETING TO DISCUSS IRAN SANCTIONS

Carrington Plan Outlined

WA220932 London REUTER in English 0620 GMT 22 Apr 80

[Text] Luxembourg, April 22, REUTER--Common Market foreign ministers today discuss concrete steps to back the United States in its dispute with Iran, including a plan which could stop imports of Iranian oil. The plan, to be implemented in two stages, has been drawn up by British Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington. It provides first for a reduction in the diplomatic staff of the nine European Economic Community (EEC) countries in Tehran, with a parallel reduction in Iranian Embassy staff in Western Europe, and for "coordinating views" on existing economic accords with Iran.

British sources said these accords included those governing oil imports and their revision would mean an effective halt to purchases of Iranian oil by Common Market countries.

The Carter administration has cut commercial and diplomatic ties with Iran and is seeking Western European support to gain the release of hostages held in the U.S. Embassy in Tehran since November 4.

British sources said the second stage of the Carrington plan would provide for a total trade embargo with Iran, except for food and medical supplies.

The sources said a delay was needed between the two stages in case some countries had to put the measures before their national parliaments for approval. West German sources said they believed the British plan had a good chance of success. West Germany has been pushing for firm European backing of the U.S. position.

Japanese Foreign Minister Saburo Okita, who arrived in Luxembourg yesterday to consult with his Common Market colleagues, agreed that Japan and the Community should stay in close touch on measures to back the United States, Japanese sources said.

The Japanese minister met Luxembourg's Deputy Prime Minister Gaston Thorn, Italian Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo and Lord Carrington yesterday. The sources said he was seeking meetings with the French and West German foreign ministers before leaving Luxembourg this morning.

North Sea Oil 'Key Card'

LD212134 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 2059 GMT 21 Apr 80

[By Geoffrey Meade, PA staff reporter in Luxembourg]

[Text] North Sea oil emerged tonight as the government's key card in its plan to back America over the Iranian hostage crisis.

Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington's plan, which includes an immediate halt to the purchase of Iranian oil, is being considered by Common Market foreign ministers in Luxembourg tomorrow. And tonight the indications were that any EEC countries hard hit by an oil ban may be able to rely on Britain to make up the shortfall.

Tonight more and more Community members were lining up behind the plan which Lord Carrington will present to his colleagues as the only way to demonstrate solidarity with America and ward off the threat of military action by President Carter if all else fails to persuade the Iranian authorities to release the capitives.

The foreign secretary's two-stage proposal includes an immediate halt to the purchase of Iranian oil, which counts for about 6 percent of all EEC imports. Hardest hit would be West Germany, which could be expected to ask Britain to help make up its 10 percent shortfall if the scheme went through. British officials have made it clear they would be prepared to consult any partners suffering from the move to see how the shortfall could be made up. Last year Britain imported 210 million [as received] worth of oil from Iran.

The proposed embargo is the toughest element in stage one of Lord Carrington's package. The other elements include a reduction in EEC Embassy staff in Tehran and Iranian diplomats in the Community, the introduction of visas for Iranian nationals, and a formal ban on arms sales to Iran. Britain has already effectively introduced an arms ban.

Lord Carrington is also calling for an end to new economic agreements and service contracts.

If these moves have no effect on the Iranian authorities by a date to be agreed, part two of the package would be brought in. This would involve the trade sanctions President Carter has asked for from Europe, with the exception of food and medical supplies.

Acceptance of the plan would be another feather in Lord Carrington's cap after his Rhodesian success. It is seen as a way to bind the Nine in a pledge to support President Carter and indicate to the Iranian leadership that Europe means business if the crisis is not settled.

The initiative is based on the assumption that President Carter's call for joint sanctions by Europe would be unacceptable to some countries for the time being. In any case it would mean national legislation for some countries--including Britain--and needs time to prepare.

Meanwhile, the UK is pinning its hopes on agreement on the first stage, and also agreement on all the necessary preparatory steps for sanctions. The government knows from bitter experience that sanctions do not always work. But officials argue it is almost as important to show America a united Common Market as it is to wave a united fist at Iran.

Colombo-Okita Discussions

OW220046 Tokyo KYODO in English 0029 GMT 22 Apr 80

[Excerpt] Luxembourg, April 21, KYODO--Foreign Minister Saburo Okita of Japan and Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo of Italy, the chairman country of the European Community (EC), agreed Monday that the views of Japan and the EC on the Iran issue are virtually identical. They confirmed that Japan and EC shared the same views on the problem of economic sanctions against Iran after Okita and Colombo explained the positions of Japan and the EC on the matter.

During the hour-long meeting, Okita said Japan was hoping for a peaceful solution of the Iran problem and said it was necessary for the hostages at the American Embassy in Tehran to be released as early as possible through peaceful means. He said various efforts must be made to prevent the U.S. from taking "non-peaceful" means. He thus intimated that some sort of measures must be taken against Iran to prevent the U.S. from resorting to military actions, such as a sea blockade.

Colombo said he highly evaluated the Japanese stand on the matter. He promised that the Japanese views will be reflected at the second-day session Tuesday of the meeting of EC foreign ministers.

He explained the EC views in respect to economic sanctions against Iran but details were not made public because the foreign ministers' conference was still being held.

Okita also met separately with British Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington and French Foreign Minister Jean Francois-Poncet Monday. At the meetings, it was made known that the EC countries have virtually reached agreement in views on the need to take some sort of measures against Iran. Japanese sources said the EC was expected to reach agreement on measures alomost similar to the two-stage plan proposed by Britain.

Okita-Genscher Talks

[Excerpt] Luxembourg, April 22, KYODO--West German Foreign Affairs Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher said here Tuesday that the European Community will decide on its economic sanctions against Iran later in the day and indicated that West Germany will take an additional measure in May to press the Iranian Revolutionary Government into releasing the 50 American hostages held at the U.S. Embassy in Tehran.

In his meeting with Japanese Foreign Minister Saburo Okita, Genscher said the EC has no reason to delay a decision on a package of punitive measures against Iran until EC leaders meet on Sunday. Genscher also said the EC must hurry to determine how they should deal with Iran because the decision will affect the Tehran government in the resolution of the hostage crisis. It was urged, Genscher went on, to apply fresh pressure on Iran to free the hostages soon after the scheduled parliamentary elections in Iran on May 9.

The remark was interpreted here as a sign that West Germany will make a new move aimed at gaining freedom of the American hostages.

Other topics taken up during the one-hour meeting included the Palestinian issue, the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan and relations between Bonn and Moscow, Japanese sources here said.

'Common Stance' Necessary

OW221203 Tokyo KYODO in English 1157 GMT 22 Apr 80

[Text] Luxembourg, April 22, KYODO--Foreign Minister Saburo Okita said here Tuesday Japan, the United States and West European nations have no choice but to maintain a "common stance" against Iran concerning the hostage issue. Okita made the remark at a news conference on the eve of his departure for home following talks with Common Market foreign ministers on what steps European nations and Japan should take against Iran in joining the United States to seek an early release of 50 Americans held at the U.S. Embassy at Tehran. He said Japan in principle must go along with the European Community (EC) in any steps that might be taken against Iran and stressed that "Japan, the United States and European nations have no choice but to maintain a common stance (against Iran) concerning the hostage issue."

He said he had a "frank exchange of views" with key foreign ministers of the Common Market, adding that he thought his hurriedly arranged trip to Luxembourg was worthwhile. He said progress in mutual understanding between Japan and Europe has been achieved as a result of his visit. Europe will have better understanding of Japanese views and thinking on whatever situation that may develop in the future, the foreign minister said.

He said Japan will cooperate in principle in whatever decisions the European Community makes on the Iranian question. He said he thought it would be good if Japan decides its measures against Iran before Prime Minister Masayoshi Ohira goes to Washington for talks with President Jimmy Carter on May 1.

If the EC makes its decision before Ohira's departure it would be of use to Japan in making its decision, he added.

Okita said he hoped there would be progress toward the release of the hostages once nations take actions against Iran. He said measures to be taken against Iran would make Iran understand that its release of the hostages at an early date would have effect not only on its relations with the United States but also on industrialized nations as well.

He said Iran seems to distinguish the United States from Japan and Western Europe in its policy and thinking but added that Japan, America and Europe must be united concerning the hostage issue. The question, he said, is how much Iran understands this.

Possible Cuts in Japan Embassy

OW220156 Tokyo KYODO in English 0144 GMT 22 Apr 80

[Text] Luxembourg, April 22, KYODO--Officials accompanying Foreign Minister Saburo Okita late Monday night suggested possibilities to cut the personnel of the Japanese Embassy in Tehran and the Iranian Embassy in Tokyo as a sanction against Iran.

The officials suggested reducing the personnel of the Japanese Embassy in Tehran from the present four to three and to have Iran cut the present 16-member personnel of the Iranian Embassy in Tokyo.

Japan is in a position to cut its own embassy personnel, but the reduction in the personnel of the Iranian Embassy in Tokyo is an exceptional measure if it is realized.

Thus, whether the suggested sanction measures should be taken will be subject to future study.

The officials also said Japan would work out its sanction measures based on those by the European Communities (EC), by taking consideration of Japan's circumstances.

LE MONDE CITES 'TOUGH' PARLIAMENT RESOLUTION ON U.S. STANCE ON IRAN

LD211311 Paris LE MONDE in French 17 Apr 80 p 48

[Philippe Lemaitre and Alain Rollat report: "European Parliament Wants 'Emergency Debate' on Iranian Crisis"]

[Excerpt] Strasbourg (European Communities)--On Wednesday 16 April the European assembly decided to hold an "emergency debate" despite opposition from the socialist and communist groups. The three political groups which form the assembly's center-right majority--Christian democrats, British conservatives and liberals--requested an emergency debate on a very "tough" draft resolution calling for the Community to support the U.S. action fully and directly. [paragraph continues]

The European Parliament, the text says in particular, "thinks that diplomatic relations between Iran and the EC member states should be suspended unless the embassy hostages are released and, thus, again urges the Iranian authorities to release the hostages quickly, giving a specific date for their release. It urges the foreign ministers to take all measures which are necessary and possible, in close consultation with the United States and other members of the Atlantic alliance, to force the Iranian authorities to release their hostages."

It is possible that this document may be amended somewhat in order to make it less abrupt; for instance, the majority of the liberal groups does not want the assembly to make such a categorical statement in favor of suspending bilateral relations.

The progressive European democrats group, to which rally representatives for the republic belong, submitted another draft resolution calling for an emergency meeting between the Americans and the European Nine in order to "jointly decide the appropriate measures for obtaining the hostages' release as soon as possible and for restoring normal and peaceful relations with Iran." The idea is to assert Western solidarity but, before taking specific decisions, to hold transatlantic consultations which so far have not taken place.

Explaining the socialist group's opposition to an emergency debate on Iran, socialist group chairman Glinne (Belgium) said: "We must not forget that the Parliament adopted a resolution calling for the hostages' unconditional release last November, at the socialist group's initiative. There is no point in hastily opening a new debate." Indeed the group, which is divided on what attitude to adopt, does not feel ready for such a debate, as several of its members have openly stated.

KREISKY INTERVIEWED ON INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS

DW210912 Munich ARD Television Network in German 1815 GMT 17 Apr 80

[Interview with Austrian Chancellor Bruno Kreisky by correspondents Dieter Schroeder, Joachim Sobotta and Konrad Falter with Rudolf Muehlfenzl, Bayerischer Rundfunk as moderator in the ORF [Austrian broadcasting administration] studio in Vienna--live]

[Text] [Muehlfenzl] Tonight's ARD Television Network discussion comes from Vienna. Our guest is the Austrian chancellor, Dr Bruno Kreisky. I must thank you very cordially, Mr Chancellor. I know that you are in the middle of harsh parliamentary debates and actually have come to join us in the interval between two debating sessions. Once again thank you very much.

The participants in the discussion are my colleagues Dieter Schroeder of SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG, Joachim Sobotta of the RHEINISCHE POST, and the ARD correspondent in Vienna, Konrad Falter. The sequence has been somewhat mixed up, but, ladies and gentlemen, the colleagues are known to you, and we will introduce them again during their individual entries into the discussion.

Mr Chancellor, our date has not been arranged by coincidence. Exactly 4 weeks from now Austria will observe the 25th anniversary of the State Treaty. In a speech before the United Nations you, Mr Chancellor, said once that detente policy actually began with the Austrian State Treaty and that the Helsinki conference formed the climax of that policy. Surely we cannot necessarily speak of detente policy right now; the superpowers are facing each other in confrontation. You, Mr Chancellor, are the head of government of a neutral country at the interface between East and West. Do you still see any concrete starting points for the continuation of detente policy?

[Answer] I see them above all in reality, because as dramatic as events in the Middle East and, on the whole, in the region of Afghanistan, Pakistan, and Iran are, nothing as yet has happened in Europe which would herald the end of detente. Not that I mean to say by this that detente policy is divisible, but as matters stand, fortunately, no aggravation has resulted in Europe so far.

[Question] Is this really the case, Mr Chancellor? Is it not a fact that though the Soviet Union does have an interest in maintaining calm in Central Europe, there are a number of indications nevertheless that it will try to enhance its position? It is bringing pressure to bear on its allies in the Warsaw Pact. It will naturally show in Central Europe, too, in the very near future that it is displeased with our reactions in connection with the Olympic games which we, from our viewpoint, really must show after Afghanistan? This is what we in the Federal Republic fear will happen.

[Answer] Yes indeed. Well, I do not know what will happen. Probably a worsening of the political climate will ensue. Yet it is a fact that nothing has happened so far in Europe. After all, you know best where the contentious points are, and so do we. This is the whole truth. I cannot predict what will be or what will happen in the near future. I also believe that a worsening of the political climate is indeed possible. So our task is all the greater; it is all the more important for us to endeavor to prevent this from happening.

[Question] Mr Chancellor, we assume that detente policy had already met with a sudden or initial end after the arms gap closure decision by NATO in the fall of last year, that is to say, even prior to the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. The German chancellor has lately come out with the sensational proposal that East and West refrain from deploying medium-range missiles, at least for a limited period of time.

In the view of the opposition in our country this spells a freeze to the imbalance between East and West and, as some opposition politicians argue, an undermining of the joint position of NATO. How do you assess the initiative of your colleague Helmut Schmidt, anyway?

[Answer] Well, it is not up to me to intrude into FRG or NATO policies. All I can do is assume that Helmut Schmidt has pondered his proposal very very carefully, and I must say that if this were possible I would deem it a very substantial measure.

[Question] Mr. Chancellor, even before Chancellor Schmidt possibly goes to Moscow, you will have an opportunity here in Vienna, on the occasion of the festivities marking the 25th anniversary of the State Treaty on 15 and 16 May, to arrange a sort of mini-summit. The two foreign ministers of the superpowers, Gromyko and Vance, are coming and as far as I know, you have also invited the foreign ministers of your neighbors. This might be a chance to hold a sort of mini-Helsinki. What do you anticipate from all this and, what is most important, are you doing more than just offering an opportunity for a meeting? Have you intervened to reestablish the dialogue between the superpowers?

[Answer] No, we have developed here what is really a very modest idea. We advocate the view that a quarter of a century having passed since the conclusion of the State Treaty, it would be sensible to invite the signatory states, whose foreign ministers at the time signed the State Treaty, to send their foreign minister here again. This happened once before, after 10 years, and it was quite useful. This is all that Austria intends: We invite the four signatory states to send their foreign minister to Austria. And just a few hours ago today the Soviet ambassador called on me and told me that Foreign Minister Gromyko will come to Vienna on 16 May, and he used an interesting phrase, saying: Under the proviso that the other three foreign ministers come.

To prevent us from concentrating too much on the signatory states, as it were, we used this opportunity as an occasion to invite the foreign ministers of our neighboring states; and we have a lot of neighbors indeed. I believe [word indistinct] that they will come, too. This was done without any political motive; it was because we especially do not want to create the impression that we wanted to arrange such a great political meeting here, or believed that we could arrange it. Thus we also invited the neighboring states. What these gentlemen then will do in Vienna on the afternoon of the 16th will be their business. We will not intrude, nor will we give ourselves any airs. After the function in the Belvedere where the State Treaty was signed, a commemorative plaque will be unveiled within the framework of the festive function. Then there will be a luncheon at 1400 with the Austrian federal president. Then the gentlemen will be free in the afternoon and they can do what they want.

[Question] But are they not supposed to go to the Spanish riding school?

[Answer] In that case a special showing would have to be arranged because normally it is on Thursday. But if they want to, we can [words indistinct].

[Question] Regarding crisis areas, Mr Federal Chancellor, you once said that a division of labor between the nonaligned and the neutrals would be desirable where decreasing tensions in crisis areas is involved. How do you envisage such a political activity taking place among a great number of states where a distribution of weight is involved? Will there be some coordination mechanism, and how should it function?

[Answer] Well, it is true that unfortunately there are numerous hotbeds of crises in the world. The first thing one must do with such hotbeds of crises is to try to halt the spread.

[Question] Like in medicine?

[Answer] Yes, the spread must be halted [words indistinct]. Unfortunately one cannot creep in with medicine; one must apply certain methods. When Austrian soldiers in the United Nations stand on the Golan Heights between Israel and Syria, they serve to halt the spread, sometimes for years. It is an activity calling for great sacrifices. When Austrian soldiers stay for years between the Greeks and Turks on Cyprus, they do it for the same purpose. When there are such crisis hotbeds of an acute character, one often needs the confidence of both superpowers. It is natural that the neutral states in Europe have the confidence of Western democracies because they belong to the Western democracies. The nonaligned states, on the other hand, as a rule enjoy the confidence of the other superpowers. So one can find solutions occasionally where both are engaged, and there exists a certain degree of confidence in both, or a minimum of mistrust on both sides.

[Question] Regarding the actual hotbeds of crisis, one of your deputies in the party Presidium has recently been to see Castro. Your visit to Cuba has been under discussion for a long time. Can you conceive of coordinated action in the case of Afghanistan?

[Answer] Well, if you want to know about the motives, I can gladly explain them to you quite frankly. Parliamentary Deputy Dr Picher, the chairman of our parliamentary group, was in Latin America at a meeting of the Socialist International, and he then went to Cuba. He also met Fidel Castro, and he pointed out my standpoint:

First, Afghanistan is a nonaligned state. He is the spokesman of the nonaligned states at the moment. I believe it is his duty to take care of this matter.

Second, we cannot ignore the geographic position Cuba is in. He cannot ignore a deterioration or aggravation of the world situation. A deterioration would be the result of a discontinuation of detente.

Third, I said that because of your close relations with the Soviet Union you will be the first to know whether the Soviet Union is prepared at all to accept some sort of a compromise. Prior to making preparations for this and wracking one's brains, it must be found out whether there is a chance.

This is what he told Castro. Castro answered that he was aware of all these matters and that he had sent his foreign minister to Afghanistan and Pakistan. We all know that. First of all some sort of modus vivendi must be established between these two states.

[Questions] Mr Federal Chancellor, probably the most acute world crisis can be described with the key word Iran, because the world power America is directly challenged there, and has even been humiliated for months. I would like to know from you how far you as the government chief of a neutral country are directly involved in this fact, and what possibilities do you see that Austria, which after all represents something in world politics, will bring its weight to bear--certainly it is a moderate weight. Would it, for instance, do so with regard to the Olympic boycott issue? As far as I know, you were approached, erroneously, by the White House in a letter. It is certainly one of your concerns. but from a moral and ethical point of view should it involve you?

[Answer] Well, I do not think it happened erroneously with regard to a resolution the Security Council passed on the Mideast issue. No, I believe that we were approached on this, we are expected [words indistinct]. I must say that one must differentiate: The Olympic boycott hangs together with Afghanistan; the suggested boycott measures of the Americans are in connection with Iran.

From the very first day we tried to offer our good offices in this matter. We have maintained contacts, we have done all kinds of things. This is known very well in Washington. We have tried to be useful. We also have relations with the present political forces in Iran, but, gentlemen, you know yourselves that on one side there are men who strive toward normalization, while on the other side there are others who obviously have a great deal of influence and who do not want to have such normalization. What is one supposed to do in such a situation? I cannot give an answer. I can just say or just try to see that the forces of reason, those who strive for normalization are not weakened too much. As regards the Olympic boycott, I have a personal opinion. Legally or according to law it is not possible for us to tell our sports organizations: You cannot go to Moscow. We are not at all able to say that. I do not exert camouflaged pressure. I instead say: You all decided together to have the next Olympics in Moscow.

[Question] You mean the sports organizations?

[Answer] Yes, all of them in the whole world. You all knew that the Soviet Union is a communist state--that cannot be contested either. And all of you ought to have known that something might happen there. So you were not surprised by the fact that this is a communist state and [words indistinct]. I don't see that it is possible to tell the Austrian athletes not to go to Moscow. I can tell them: You can do whatever you want. Those who do not want to go [words indistinct] who cannot reconcile it with their conscience to go, should stay home. We do not know how many [words indistinct] pass; we will not prevent them from doing it.

[Question] But you do have a personal opinion, Mr Chancellor, do you not?

[Answer] It is my personal opinion that such a measure will not achieve the intended result. This is my personal opinion which, however, I do not want to impose on others. I say so only because [words indistinct]. I do not want to dodge voicing my opinion. I do not believe that this will do much good, even though I understand U.S. public opinion as well as the step the President has suggested. I do understand that, but as far as Austria is concerned, I personally do not consider this an expedient solution.

[Question] Mr Chancellor, surely it is true that all those wanting to go to Moscow were aware from the outset what kind of a country they would be going to. This is completely uncontested. Nobody could have been surprised at learning what regime or what form of government this country has. But in the meantime some significant actions have taken place which surely have changed the assessment, such as Afghanistan, for instance. Can one really say that this does not concern me?

[Answer] I am very much concerned about that. In this issue, too, you have seen that jointly with other statesmen I have left no stone unturned to attain a solution. I am aware that this is very hard to do; I am very much concerned indeed. But this is no reason why I should believe that the boycott of the Olympic games is a measure (?that will attain the intended ends). I might say it is the expression of the extreme displeasure which the American people want to demonstrate. Here, too, the vote in the Olympic Committee was not unanimous. After all, the proportion was....

[Question] Two to one.

[Answer] Well, it was not that, it was a bit less than two to one. Still, two to one in the United States as well means that there, too, people view this differently. I do not even want to discuss it because I do not like to criticize a measure which President Carter has taken in such a determined manner. For my part and as far as Austria is concerned I say that we pursue a different line here.

[Question] Mr Chancellor, I would like to discuss a different trip to Moscow, a potential trip, namely that by Chancellor Schmidt. Perhaps you cannot give him any advice, but perhaps you might be able to say how you assess this invitation, whether you consider this as an indication that Moscow might be seeking a dialogue too, not only with the Federal Republic but also, through this medium if I may put it this way, with the United States.

[Answer] Pardon me, but first I must answer another question lest [words indistinct] under the boycott of Iran. We cannot join in the boycott measures.

[Question] Economic boycott, trade boycott?

[Answer] Because even if war were to break out between the two states, an externally neutral state cannot decide to take such a boycott measure. It is at least entitled to the courant normal, that is the normal goods exchange. It does not intensify it, it does not profit by the boycott of the others, but what was applicable before must (?remain unchanged). This is approximately what our answer will be to our friends in Washington, whom we will assure of our friendship and whom we will tell that we will do everything in our power to overcome the taking of the hostages. We regard this as a most serious crime under international law. In my opinion it violates a religious commandment, because envoys have always been taboo. This is what I have to say about it, to wind up this topic. Now as far as the Moscow trip by Chancellor Helmut Schmidt is concerned, I cannot give him any advice. Nor do I think he needs any. [laughter]

[Question] My question was how you assess the invitation? It did come at an interesting time.

[Answer] I believe that if you receive such an invitation there is little sense in rejecting it, also if Germany [words indistinct] and I say Germany on purpose, namely, both states. After all, you cannot just ignore that a stateman as respected as Helmut Schmidt makes a certain impression on his Soviet interlocutors with his arguments. Who would want to do that?

Do you, on the other hand, see a chance--I admit it is a difficult question to ask you--for the Western alliance under the leadership of the United States, which has been under quite a bit of strain anyway, to be even further driven apart by this invitation?

[Answer] No, I do not think so. I do not believe that at all, on the contrary, I am convinced that Moscow can hardly have a better spokesman from the Western alliance than Helmut Schmidt, surely none better.

[Question] I believe you will be seeing him before he leaves?

[Answer] I do not know. I will surely be seeing him, though I do not know whether this will be prior to that date. Far be it from me to arouse the impression of intruding into his affairs. But since we are talking here in Vienna I might say that if I were in his situation I would go too. After all, gentlemen, we did go there 25 years ago, not knowing what awaited us then.

[Question] You could only gain 25 years ago, Mr Chancellor, when you went to Moscow.

[Answer] No, we could have lost a lot. There were some communist newspaper editors here in Vienna who told me later--when they were no longer communist having resigned from the party after the events in Hungary and Czechoslovakia--that the board of editors in the communist newspaper here had harbored hopes that it would happen as it had with Hacha in Berchtesgaden, with Hitler.

They would say: Either you take Communists into the government or the Iron Curtain will go down on the line of demarcation. Well, it did not exactly happen that way. We were a country occupied by four powers, and we were constantly threatened by partition. But it did not happen that way. There were some people who warned us not to go, saying: Who knows what is in store for you there?

[Question] Mr Chancellor, may I revert to the other hotbed of crisis, the Middle East? You have made this your concern with a great deal of participating, partly mediating and partly giving impetus. We have just heard the report on the results of the talks between Begin and President Carter. What is your forecast? How will things proceed?

[Answer] Badly. It has always been bad because, in my opinion, the Israeli prime minister really does not have a true desire to achieve a solution on the Palestinian issue. Since this forms the crux of the matter it has been clear to me from the outset that this will not come to a good end. Too little was fixed and too little of a committing nature was agreed on at Camp David for that, so my prognosis is very gloomy. A change in the initial situation will probably only be achieved with an internal change in Israel, which can be anticipated.

[Question] You will be going to Egypt shortly, Mr Chancellor, but you will not be visiting Israel. May we conclude from this that you see no sense in having a talk with Prime Minister Begin, preferring to wait until the opposition is in government again, as seems likely?

[Answer] I will surely not go to Egypt prior to 26 May because I do not want to expose myself or As-Sadat to the charge that I have induced him to do something. I will not disturb these negotiations, certainly not. I have no reason at all to go to Israel. First, nobody has invited me. I also do not believe that the Israeli prime minister feels the urgent need to meet me. He does not like me at all.

[Question] Did you coordinate the recognition of the PLO with the Israeli opposition leader who is politically close to you? Does he agree with your opinion regarding the establishment of a Palestinian state?

[Answer] In no way at all. We have not coordinated anything. On the contrary, he wrote me a letter in which he says that he regrets it very much--one could almost say that he protests against it--and second, he rejects a Palestinian state. But that is never a problem in politics. Today it looks like this, and tomorrow it can look completely different.

[Question] Mr Federal Chancellor, your approach to the Palestinian problem has caused worldwide attention as well as attention in our country. One must clearly say in this connection that you are a European statesman of Jewish origin, and one can take it for granted that you want the Israeli State, established more than 30 years ago, to continue to exist in a safeguarded way with the people being able to live in the coming decades as well. If you, nevertheless, act for the Palestinians in the way you did, one must conclude that you believe the Middle East could be pacified with the establishment of a Palestinian state, probably under the leadership of state chief 'Arafat. Have you not been disproved by many, many facts--also recently--such as bomb explosions, acts of terror, to the extent that it almost hurts?

[Answer] No, I am hurt by the fact that these assassinations exist. But the others, the bombing of Palestinian camps in Lebanon, also hurt me. Children have also been killed there. I reject adding up such a gruesome bill, adding up dead children, dead Israeli children, against dead Palestinian children. I am for the policy I represent because I see in this policy the only possibility for overcoming this horrible and disgusting terror.

My personal situation. ..Well you see, I am an Austrian. My family has had its home here in this state, in old Austria, for centuries, since the existence of any documents. I am the last to reject my Jewish origin in any way. I have no reason at all to feel ashamed of it in any way, not at all. But I am not a Zionist. I do not consider Zionism a solution to the problem. But, Mr Editor, I recognize the existence of the Israeli State, that a great civilization has been achieved by the people there, that it was the last refuge for most of these people. A part of the justification of the policy I represent is that this state ought to exist longer than the states of the crusaders did at their time. Isn't that so? I see such a possibility only via an understanding between Israel and its Arab surroundings. The problem is simply connected with the unsolved Palestinian problem.

One more thing: Mr Editor, the Israeli State, its constitutional basis, lies in the famous UN decision of, I believe, 1947 or 1948. But it is always ignored that two states were established at that time, namely, the Israeli State and a Palestinian state, and the Palestinians are still waiting for that state. They have the moral right to state that claim. This is my opinion, and I would say so in all cases.

[Question] On principle one can naturally follow you, Mr Federal Chancellor, but in practical politics the question naturally comes up as to whether this very strong action on behalf of the PLO might not possibly have the opposite effect, first, because it could make the Israelis a bit more stubborn, giving them the feeling of being pressed with their backs to the wall, and, second, the situation naturally has changed a bit compared with 1948. Obviously the danger exists that this second state, a Palestinian state, if it came about would be a threat to Israel today. Fears that such a state would very much be under Soviet influence, for example, can certainly not be discarded.

[Answer] Well, if we were to accept established facts, it would look nice with your German unity. I am saying that one cannot claim a right for oneself which one is not prepared to concede to others. In world politics we must keep to the principles of political morals, we must grant to others the rights we claim for ourselves. I say this most frankly.

The second thing I want to say is that public opinion in Israel is much more receptive than you think. Naturally I was scolded very much, as you say in Germany, for this step. But I received very interesting letters from important Israelis, written on the stationary of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. Important scholars have stressed that they welcome this step, that an increasingly greater circle of people is beginning to understand this policy. Do not ignore the fact that in Israel today there is an enormous Peace Now movement. Matters have changed [words indistinct] certainly slowed down the process. That cannot be said.

[Question] The central problem, Mr Federal Chancellor, is whether you are not the only one who is too optimistic vis-a-vis the people who would indeed head the government, namely, 'Arafat's people.

[Answer] First of all I would not be certain at all who would head the government in such a Palestinian state because the Palestinians are very sensible with regard to real democracy, something that hardly exists anywhere in this part of the world with the exception of Israel. Isn't that so? Enormous changes in political awareness have taken place. It would be a new state, a democracy. I must tell you something in connection with fear of the communists. Nobody fears the communists as much as the Saudis. The Saudis said recently: We are in favor of this state. It is a fairy tale that it would be a communist state. They know the people who will build it. (They) will support it so much materially that its viability will not be called into question. Can one ask for more than this approach of the Saudis?

[Question] The Saudis are also afraid of the Palestinians, if I may add that.

[Answer] The Saudis are not as afraid of the Palestinians as you think. Had the Palestinians been involved in the last affair, it would have been a real catastrophe.

[Question] You mean the occupation of the mosque?

[Answer] Yes. Gentlemen, do not ignore the fact that in Kuwait, for example, there are certainly as many Palestinians as Kuwaitis, though I do not have the latest figures. Even more, they work there. The others try to sell their oil. After all, that is a difference. They are building the country. That demonstrates the significance of the Palestinian problem. No Arab state of this region can afford today to ignore the Palestinians, whether they like each other or not. Look, who liked the so-called ethnic German or ethnic Austrians when they came? They were there, they carried political weight, they were efficient because they had to build everything from scratch. The same is true of the Palestinians.

[Question] Regarding a second hotbed of crisis in Europe--you were the first government chief to visit Yugoslavia since Tito fell ill. Do you have the impression that the people in Belgrade, despite the continuously increasing pressure from Moscow, will stay on their independent course vis-a-vis Moscow?

[Answer] Whether it is--let us say--noble or not, it is a fact that we cannot afford to be sentimental. It is a fact that Yugoslavia lives politically within their power sphere and that the new men hold the reins very firmly in their hands. No delusions--these people have been well picked, they know their task and they are worthy of our greatest confidence, aside from the fact that they have a regime we do not like and that there are (many things) we do not like.

This is different compared with us because of the different political origin. Despite this rejection these men are worthy of our confidence. They fulfill their task with firmness and considerable dignity. They realize that without Tito they will not have the international prestige they had with Tito. They know all of this precisely, but they know that they are an important country, an important part of the European Continent, and they are very tested and courageous fighters.

I am telling you that what Stalin did not risk will certainly not be risked by his successors.

[Question] Mr Federal Chancellor, do you consider it right that the European Community has recently offered and signed a very favorable trade agreement with Yugoslavia?

[Answer] Yes, because I consider everything correct that will lead a state such as Yugoslavia closer to Europe, to the kind of Europe we want to have. That is natural. If this were not done we would run the risk that Yugoslavia's economic dependence on the East would increase even more. How would you have political independence then?

[Question] Mr Federal Chancellor, permit me to ask a question with a bit of a speculative accent. Could one or could you imagine that, against the background of its existing interest in somewhat loosening the firm ties between the West European states, NATO and the Americans, the Soviet Union again might bring up the idea of a reunited and neutral Germany?

[Answer] The fact that the Kremlin rulers would like very much to achieve even a loosening of relations between the Federal Republic of Germany and the United States, as was the case with France under De Gaulle--it certainly was a slackening of the alliance, to put it mildly--is natural, I would say. Why should they not want it? They would certainly like it.

[Question] Also at the price, Mr Federal Chancellor, that other relations would exist between the Federal Republic of Germany and the GDR, other relations than are there now?

[Answer] You know, I do not believe the other thing. I can still remember--when we talk of the State Treaty 25 years ago--the then Vice Chancellor Schmidt asking Federal President Scherf and Mr Molotov whether the things that had been worked out for Austria could possibly serve as a model for Germany--a neutral and reunified Germany. Molotov said very clearly that this would not be possible. I asked myself, as the youngest of the delegation, I asked Mr Mikoyan: Well, is all this applicable to Germany? Mr Mikoyan did not give a direct answer. He said one thing: The neutrality of a small country can be established with a paper. The small country will beware of violating the neutrality and of ignoring the paper. But what should be done if a state of 70 or 80 million inhabitants considers from one day to the next: Shall we wage war? I concluded from these considerations that it did not have the character of a model, that what we did at that time did not have the character of a model.

[Question] [words indistinct] Times have changed and the Soviet Union today is such an enormous military power that the problem might possibly look different. Neutralization of Germany as a price for reunification would mean the complete breaking apart of the Western alliance. So might it possibly become interesting some day?

[Answer] I can only cite historical experience. We once talked about reunification with Mr Khrushchev. It was the night when he was here with Kennedy. I asked him that question. He asked me whether I considered him a good communist. I said I was no expert in this respect [laughter] but I assumed so. He said: I would not be able to stay in the Kremlin 1 more day if I gave up a communist Germany. Okay? But he was dismissed from the Kremlin for less than that.

[Muehlfenzl] Mr Federal Chancellor, at the end of this discussion I must thank you again for your readiness to answer our questions. I thank my colleagues Mr Schroeder, Dr Falter, and Mr Sobotta for their cooperation, and I would like to wish a pleasant evening to you ladies and gentlemen.

NO SANCTIONS AGAINST IRAN PLANNED

[Special DIE PRESSE report: "Austrians Can Stay in Iran"]

[Text] Vienna (EKOE)--The Austrian Government will not make an appeal of any kind to the nearly 60 Austrians who are currently working in Iran to leave the country and return home. "It would not be in line with our policy if we were to ask the Austrians to return home," a Foreign Ministry source declared, adding that--contrary to the FRG--Austria does not plan any sanctions against Iran. Bonn has recently asked all FRG citizens living in Iran to return home, except those who have to stay because of work ties.

Apart from the 67 women holding Austrian citizenship who are married to Iranian subjects, there are at present only about 60 Austrians still in Shi'ite leader Khomeyni's country, most of them doing construction work for the Austrian Porr Corporation.

KREISKY TO PAY OFFICIAL VISIT TO FRG 5-7 MAY

AU221001 Vienna WIENER ZEITUNG in German 22 Apr 80 p 1

Denmark's Jorgensen To Attend

AU221002 Vienna DIE PRESSE in German 22 Apr 80 p 2

[Bonn correspondent Engelbert Washietl dispatch: "Socialists Meeting in Hamburg: Kreisky, Jorgensen and Schmidt"]

[Summary] Although the program of Chancellor Kreisky's 5-7 May visit to the FRG has not yet been fixed in detail, Chancellor Schmidt intends to invite his guest to have dinner at his house in Hamburg after the first working day in Bonn. Anker Jorgensen, Denmark's Socialist prime minister, has also been invited to that dinner. It is not yet certain, but likely, that the dinner will also be attended by SPO Chairman Willy Brandt. Two working talks between Kreisky and Schmidt are scheduled in Bonn. In addition, the Austrian chancellor will call on President Carstens and make a short visit to Duesseldorf.

TRADE PROTOCOL WITH HUNGARY SIGNED

AU211005 Vienna WIENER ZEITUNG in German 19 Apr 80 p 7

[Unattributed report: "Austrian-Hungarian Trade Talks Concluded"]

[Summary] Austrian-Hungarian economic talks held within the framework of the cooperation agreement of the fall of 1979 were concluded on Friday morning [18 April] with the signing of a joint protocol by Trade Minister Staribacher and Hungarian Foreign Trade Minister Veress. "As was declared during the talks, there are currently about 90 cooperation contracts on the company level. Another 100 projects involving mostly small and medium enterprises are pending." About half of the already operational cooperation agreements are projects of the machine building, automotive and electrical engineering sectors, with the remainder being chemical and pharmaceutical industry, foodstuff industry or agricultural projects.

The two delegations presented lists of further possible cooperation projects that will be brought to the attention of potential partners in the other country. "In the framework of the commission meeting, moreover, the talks about large projects, such as the joint utilization of brown coal despits on the Austrian-Hungarian border, the supply of Austrian electric power in exchange for Hungarian aluminum and the planned link between the CEMA and the UCPTE [Union Pour Le Coordination de la Production et du Transport del Energie Electrique] power grids were continued. On these projects there is agreement in principle. They will probably be discussed during the forthcoming unofficial meeting between Chancellor Kreisky and Hungarian Premier Lazar [26-27 April]."

In addition, the sides agreed to further promote the cooperation of Austrian and Hungarian enterprises in third markets--projects of this category are already being studied on the company level--and in the future to hold joint commission meetings within the framework of the cooperation agreement together with those within the framework of the trade agreement.

IOC MEMBER SEES LOS ANGELES OLYMPICS ALSO IN DANGER

ID211329 Brussels LE SOIR in French 15 Apr 80 p 3 80

[Unattributed report: "Prince de Merode: Jimmy Carter 'Strangled' U.S. Olympic Committee"]

[Excerpt] Apart from Moscow's unbridled reaction, which speaks of Washington being prey to an "imperial obsession," there has been no shortage of people adopting stances after the U.S. Olympic Committee's decision. Let us begin with a Belgian voice.

Questioned on Belgian radio's French service, Prince Alexandre de Merode, Belgian member of the International Olympic Committee [IOC], said that he presumed that essentially practical reasons had guided the U.S. committee vote, since it was "strangled" financially by President Carter after the latter's decision to suppress certain subsidies and tax exemptions normally granted to that committee.

The prince, who denounces a paradox in President Carter's attitudes--boycotting the Moscow games in the name of freedom while also reducing the freedom of his own athletes--also believes it worthwhile to consider moving the 1984 games planned for Los Angeles. In effect the Belgian IOC member fears that those games could in turn suffer a boycott, this time from the countries of the East. Moving the 1984 Olympics (it was too late for the 1980 games) would thus amount to a defense of the Olympic movement's very survival.

And the Belgian Olympic Committee's attitude? Unchanged, in the words of the prince (LE SOIR editor's note-- he is only empowered to speak in his own name, however), who is still a keen supporter of participation at Moscow, where the games will be only partially devalued by the American absence... which, one can hope, is unlikely to be taken as an example by the countries of West Europe, however anxious they are to show their solidarity with the United States.

The 1980 Moscow games without the United States. The 1984 games perhaps moved from Los Angeles: Is this the chance for Olympia henceforth to become the games' traditional home, as Greek Prime Minister Karamanlis suggests? The Prince de Merode acknowledges the attractive idea, but stresses the problems that would be posed by 2 million visitors to the same place for 2 weeks every 4 years. One solution, perhaps, would be to hold only the basic events at Olympia, and the others (the team events, for example) in other places. This suggestion will appear on the agenda of the IOC Congress in Baden-Baden next year.

PARTY LEADERS DISCUSS FORMATION OF NEW GOVERNMENT

[Text] The political crisis: Talks for the formation of a new government led by Wilfried Martens opened at 1030 this morning. The six party presidents, each accompanied by one person, representing the three traditional political families, in other words, the Socialists, Christian-Socialists and Liberals, both French-speaking the Flemish, met at 1030 at Prime Minister Wilfried Martens' private residence, the Hotel Lambermont in Brussels.

Coalition Prospects Viewed

ID211423 Brussels LE SOIR in French 15 Apr 80 p 2

[Marcel Bauwens report: "Charged by the King With a Factfinding Mission, Mr Willy Claes Is Determined To Act Quickly"]

[Text] The king has charged Deputy Prime Minister Willy Claes with the task of inquiring into the possibilities of quickly forming a government capable of confronting the budgetary, economic and social problems and with a sufficient majority to implement the institutional reform. Mr Claes has accepted this mission.

This is the text of Saturday's palace statement: Mr Claes set to work with his close collaborators immediately, and met [Flemish] Socialist Party (BSP) President Karel van Miert and Prime Minister Wilfried Martens as early as Sunday. He was to continue his consultations on Monday. Today he will be meeting the other party presidents and the Chamber chairmen. He expects to progress as quickly as possible. There is no fixed term to his mission but, like most politicians, Mr Claes is convinced that a government must be formed in the shortest possible time.

The weekend in politics has also been marked by various stances: Those of the French-speaking party presidents on French-language television, those of the Senate's Flemish group leaders on Belgian radio-television [Dutch service] and finally that of Mr Cools at a Socialist meeting in Barvaux-sur-Ourthe.

The clash of all these statements and the detailed analysis of the palace's text provide certain political indications not without significance. Thus the king is seen to be interested in whether a government can be formed to which the two missions of improving the budgetary situation and implementing the institutional reform can be entrusted.

On television all the French-speaking presidents announced their preference for a government whose first aim would be the institutional reform. This assertion assumes its full significance when you recall that some voices within the Christian People's Party (CVP) have been heard to express the view that the economic and financial problems should be dealt with urgently and the examination of the community dispute postponed. As the guest of the Socialist canton of Grand Durbuy in Barvaux, Socialist Party [French-speaking] (SS) President Cools reaffirmed his belief that the social and economic problems and regionalization should be solved concomitantly. Moreover, he made a statement which puts the first obstacle in the way of future negotiators. He said that he was "not vetoing" a tripartite coalition with the Reform and Liberty Party (PRL), but explained that this was only a "temporary formula" to resolve community problems.

There is still some way to go before it can be said that the formation of a three-party government has been achieved.

Mr Cools' statement certainly takes the sting out of a fine row which threatened to start within his own party. In fact Mr Edmon Leburton, the former prime minister, former PS president and leader of a movement within this group, made some remarks in an interview in Saturday's "Het Laatste Nieuws" [The Latest News] which were hardly in accord with President Cools' line.

In effect, Mr Leburton spoke against any French-Speaking Front. The former prime minister is also in favor of a government formed from the three so-called traditional parties: the Socialists, Christians and Liberals. The fact that Mr Cools does not rule out the tripartite formula will undoubtedly stop some outbursts at the next PS Bureau meeting. It remains, true, however, that there is no unanimity at this party's summit: Mr Leburton condemns a French-Speaking Front which for Mr Cools is the linchpin of the present political game.

A Three-Party Coalition, Times Two

Meanwhile, people will have noted the reticence of Party of Freedom and Progress (PVV) representative Mr Vandorpoorten on the confrontation program. He was anxious to explain that the Flemish Liberal Party leaders have not yet spoken on the advisability of any eventual participation in government.

Nor can we forget the distance between Flemish and French-speaking Liberals on community problems. The former owe the Volksunie nothing when it comes to linguistic radicalism, and they represent a parliamentary force practically double that of their French-speaking counterparts. When people speak of a three-party coalition they must not forget that this is really a "six-party coalition" a three-party coalition in both great communities. This does not make things easier!

The CVP, too, through Mr Bob Gijs, its leader in the Senate, is in favor of the three-party coalition. As for PRL President Gol, he has already given sufficient notice that his party is a candidate for government. Not unconditionally, however. The Liberals want fiscal and economic measures which the Socialists will undoubtedly find hard to concede without a quid pro quo. The economic-social negotiations are promising to be as difficult as the eternal regionalization.

CPN TO BOYCOTT PARIS CP PARLEY; CITES LACK OF CONSULTATION

ID221409 Rotterdam NRC HANDELSBLAD in Dutch 16 Apr 80 p 4

[Own correspondent report: "CPN Boycotts Communist Summit"]

[Excerpts] Rotterdam, 16 April--The Communist Party of the Netherlands [CPN] has decided not to take part in the European communist parties' conference scheduled for Paris at the end of this month. This is clear from an article by party President Henk Hoekstra published in the party newspaper DE WAARHEID yesterday.

The CPN's main objection seems to be that there was no close consultations with the other parties on the Polish-French initiative. The CPN knows nothing about the conference, party President Henk Hoekstra said in DE WAARHEID. However, the CPN does not support "some PCI spokesmen" who apparently explained that a meeting of European communist parties on the question of peace as a whole would be pointless. However, the CPN thinks that the Paris meeting should first have been prepared by all parties at the national level and should not be the result of "decisions from one or sevemal centers."

IRANIAN EMBASSY WARNS AGAINST GOVERNMENT EFFORTS FOR SANCTIONS

LD211216 Hamburg DPA in German 1036 GMT 21 Apr 80

[Excerpts] The Iranian Embassy in Bonn today warned against imposing economic sanctions against the country. Iranian Charge d'Affaires (Mehdi Navab) stressed in a press statement that "hasty decisions" in the wake of American sanctions would have long-term consequences for German-Iranian economic relations. If the relationship of trust is disturbed, Iran would come to an understanding with other trading partners. The Federal Government's efforts to get the EC countries to join in the sanctions demanded by the U.S. Government jeopardize the traditionally good relations between the German and Iranian people. The Iranian Embassy here sees signs that influential interest groups in the Federal Republic have not yet abandoned their hope of restoring in Iran agreeable circumstances exclusively to their own advantage.

GENSCHER REMARKS ON SANCTIONS, SOLIDARITY WITH U.S.

Urges USSR To Back Hostages' Release

LD211430 Hamburg DPA in German 1338 GMT 21 Apr 80

[Text] Bonn--FDP Chairman and Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher has called on the Soviet Union to support the efforts of the international community of states for the release of the American hostages in Tehran. Addressing his party's presidium he said today in Bonn that a definite contribution by Moscow to the solution of this problem could be an "important element in creating trust between East and West."

FDP Spokesman Josef Gerwald stated that Genscher once again expressed to the Free Democrats' leading body his conviction that the Soviet leadership is just as unwilling as the West to put peace in danger. However, the precondition for solving the crisis concerning Afghanistan is that Moscow immediately complies with the UN demand for an immediate withdrawal of the troops it sent in there, and that it finally reacts positively to the EC proposal for a nonaligned and politically independent Afghanistan. Following his talks during the independence celebrations in Zimbabwe he got the impression that the Third World governments will, like the EC and the United States, make a thorough and constructive examination of every serious proposal leading to Soviet troop withdrawal.

[Reporter Kroenig interview with Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher, date, place not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] The session of the European Community's foreign ministers will deal with sanctions against Iran. A commentary broadcast in our press review has asked whether or not Europe would eventually follow up its words with solidarity vis-a-vis the United States and muster its energy to impose sanctions. This seems to me a question one can answer with a clear yes. Or do you see that differently?

[Answer] The Federal Government believes that this is necessary. The opinion-forming process that took place at our extraordinary meeting in Lisbon strengthens my conviction that the other European governments see this problem exactly the same way [words indistinct]. We are convinced that we must act jointly. The discussion tomorrow will deal with the problems of a legal basis and the framework in which we will have to make decisions. As regards the matter itself, we have no doubts that all the European governments are as convinced as we are with regard to the necessity of joint action.

[Question] Probably also because there are no legal backdoors any more through which one could steal away?

[Answer] I did not say that anybody wanted to steal away. Everybody has his special problems. But above all stands the necessity of a joint decision and of joint action in order to demonstrate the Europeans' ability to act on a very difficult matter.

[Question] Even though you probably still have doubts about whether the economic sanctions against Tehran will lead to the freeing of the hostages?

[Answer] I believe that the question of which decision could be important and in the interest of the hostages must primarily by answered by the government which is especially trying to release the hostages, namely, by the U.S. Government. The U.S. Government considers it useful and helpful that such a decision is made not merely by the Europeans but also by other friendly countries. I consider it necessary in this respect that, in the interest of the principles of the world community, we must stand together with those who like us are greatly concerned about the fate of the hostages in Tehran. I believe it is a good sign of worldwide cooperation that the Japanese foreign minister will come to Luxembourg particularly to achieve joint action with us. So there will not only be Europeans by themselves, but the Japanese along with the Europeans. What is happening in Tehran involves us equally as human beings and as an active government.

[Question] But will support for the Americans last only as long as Washington renounces military action? Or is that also included, so to speak?

[Answer] Well, the European Community is not a military installation, but I believe that particularly in the exploitation of peaceful possibilities it ought to be shown that we all stand together with regard to this question. This will certainly make the use of military means rather unlikely. I think everyone will have to make a decision from this point of view. We all ought to consider that the U.S. Government over the past months has shown a great degree of responsibility with regard to safeguarding and preserving of world peace in connection with the hostage problem. I am not certain that every government which has the same military power would have acted in a similarly responsible way.

[Question] Observers still criticize the American policy for presently concentrating on the hostage affair while putting aside the dangerous links with Afghanistan, the Arab-Israeli conflict, the West's oil supply, and the dangerously tense relations between the United States and the Soviet Union. Does Bonn hope to bring more influence to bear on Carter by supporting the U.S. sanctions so that he will see all this together, so to speak?

[Answer] Well, it is always easy to criticize. Anyone wanting to tutor others in international politics will have little success. But it is a fact that a conference pays more attention to the one whose will to help is not doubted. It is necessary indeed for all of us, the United States and the Europeans, to reach a joint assessment of the East-West relationship and realize that it is necessary to prevent an aggravation of those relations. This is also the reason why we keep calling on the Soviet Union to finally be prepared to negotiate with us on medium-range weapons. As far as I am concerned, it is imperative to prevent the East from imposing a new arms race on us. Hence, it is necessary for the Soviet Union to finally be receptive to our proposals and to negotiate with us on medium-range weapons. The European Community has submitted a proposal on a status of nonalignment for Afghanistan. In that case, too, it is necessary for the Soviet Union to declare its readiness for negotiations and talks. During my visit to Zimbabwe I talked with a number of outstanding people from the Third World who would welcome such a solution just as we would. I hope that responsible persons in the nonaligned movement, especially those who also bear responsibility in the League--by those I mean, for example, Prime Minister Mrs Gandhi of India--will succeed in becoming active on this issue.

The nonaligned states will have to play an increasingly important role for the stability of the world lest we transfer the East-West conflict to the Third World--which we wish to avoid under all circumstances. This means that an attempt must be made in various ways to achieve a relaxation in the conflicts which currently depress the world. This also is the field to which our efforts on the Middle East problem--toward implementing the right to self-determination for the Palestinian people--belong. This means that all these problems need to be viewed as a broad interrelationship, and that it is necessary to prevent an even more serious situation from emerging as a result of even more hotbeds of conflict. This is our position on foreign problems.

Domestically, I think it is important for us to enhance the weight of our country in international politics, and we need to avoid suppressing common convictions between the government parties and the opposition, wherever these exist. [Words indistinct] for election campaign reasons; rather, we should express these common convictions. This means that dialogue must be possible not only with the outside but just as urgently at home.

[Question] Does this include the preparedness of the chancellor and you yourself to go to Moscow and talk with Soviet politicians to solve the overall crisis in the world?

[Answer] We have always advocated the view that the dialogue must not be interrupted, especially in difficult situations. The significance and the expediency of a journey must be reviewed under the prevailing circumstances, namely, whether the visit can live up to its ends and purposes. This is why the decision on this trip has not as yet been made. Preconditions for it must still be clarified with our partners as well.

[Question] Will you be meeting Gromyko?

[Answer] [Words indistinct] As far as we are concerned, it will always be a basic principle that the opportunity for talks must be utilized.

[Question] Do you mean to say that you would also exploit the opportunity to talk with Foreign Minister Gromyko in Vienna, for example?

[Answer] If this is possible it ought to be done in any event. But even earlier, before the end of this week, the Soviet foreign minister will be visiting Paris. This visit alone--I mean the results of this visit--will influence the decision on what further talks which Europeans will hold with the Soviet Union and which the United States will hold with the Soviet Union will be useful and expedient. On principle they are always appropriate.

[Question] Gromyko in Paris, perhaps in Bonn as well?

[Answer] At the moment there is nothing to substantiate that.

[Question] But you would not be disinclined if the Soviet side should indicate its interest?

[Answer] Not at all.

SPD APPROVES SCHMIDT'S PLANNED MOSCOW VISIT

LD211734 Hamburg DPA in German 1703 GMT 21 Apr 80

[Excerpt] Saarbruecken--The SPD Presidium has approved the chancellor's planned visit to Moscow. At a meeting in Saarbruecken today the Presidium spoke out in favor of Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt "representing the Federal Republic's interests on the basis of Western decision" during his talks with the Soviet state and party leader, Leonid Brezhnev. The chancellor's visit to Moscow, it was stressed, could help to introduce some calm into a difficult international situation. This could be of value to more than just the two countries concerned.

CHANCELLOR SCHMIDT REITERATES POLICY ON OLYMPICS

LD211912 Hamburg DPA in German 1844 GMT 21 Apr 80

[Text] Dortmund--At an SPD congress on sport policy in Dortmund this evening, Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt reaffirmed that the decision on participating in the Olympic summer games rests with the National Olympic Committee and the sports associations themselves. The chancellor made it clear to the approximately 200 people attending the meeting, however, that the Cabinet, in its recommendation regarding the Olympics scheduled to be announced Wednesday, would adhere in this respect to the position which has already been outlined several times.

It is up to the Soviet Union to create the political prerequisites for the Olympic games by making a positive response over Afghanistan. He could understand "the deep, personal disappointment" of many participants and organizers who had for years made sacrifices. On the other hand, they should also consider "whether there is not a solidarity obligation towards U.S. athletes."

Following the conclusion of the SPD meeting, Olympic winner Annegret Richter and world champion swimmer Gerhard Moerken, as spokesmen for a Social Democrat initiative on behalf of athletes and voters, handed over a resolution calling for the participation of German athletes in Moscow. Schmidt described the athletes' action as "understandable," but said that however much he desired Olympic success for the athletes "from the bottom of my heart," he saw no possibility of any other recommendation in view of the political situation.

DIE WELT WEIGHS LEGAL INTRICACIES OF NAVAL BLOCKADE

DW181235 Bonn DIE WELT in German 15 Apr 80 p 7

[Article by Dr Wolfgang Schumann: "International Law Prohibits a 'Peace Blockade' Against Iran for Carter"]

[Text] In the event the United States decides in favor of a blockade against Iran, a conflict between the United States and third states not directly involved in the Iranian-U.S. conflict is foreseeable. This raises important questions of international law about the permissibility of such blockades:

Would a blockade lead to a state of war with Iran, and would all third states therefore have to behave like neutrals in war?

Would the United States be allowed to apply force against Iran because of the taking of hostages even without a state of war, since what a blockade involves is force?

Would third states, in the event of a blockade, be obligated to tolerate the blockade, and what punishment would be imposed on blockade runners?

The success and the quick effect of a blockade essentially depend upon whether the shipping of all states can be forced to observe it. This would be the case if a blockade automatically led to a state of war between the blockading power and the blockaded. This is because during a war the states not involved in that war are obligated to stay neutral, meaning that they must stay out of the conflict and recognize blockades of one of the war-waging powers. Correspondingly, the blockading power has the right in war to compel neutrals by force of arms to observe it.

Since a blockade constitutes an extensive military measure and entails drastic effects for the blockaded state, one might believe that it always leads to a state of war. Even if a blockade elicits the idea of a warlike conflict because of its great military expenditure, this does not yet say anything about a state of war taking effect under international law.

For this reason it is necessary to deal with the legal interpretation of war and its history. Up to the beginning of the 20th Century every state was conceded the right to wage war. This was the essential reason why a subjective interpretation of war prevailed. Under this interpretation the state of peace remained intact in the event of military conflicts if neither of the antagonists wanted war. Hence a declaration of war was required, no matter what the form.

The attitude that one could freely choose between war and peaceful means in the controversy with other states changed at the beginning of the 20th Century. As a result of the stepped-up world trade and the concomitant, amplified international contacts, the view gradually prevailed that war no longer was part of the "normal" means of waging disputes. On the contrary, war was felt to be an extraordinary state, the ultimate means of settling controversy.

Then followed the attempts to conduct war through peaceful order in the League of Nations and through additional treaties such as the Locarno Pact (1925) and the Briand-Kellogg Pact (1928). The attempts to banish war altogether and to eliminate the use of force as a means of settling political difference, if possible, remained unsuccessful, however. After World War II this led to a situation in which the prohibition of the use of force in international relations was adopted by the UN Charter without differentiating between war and peace. But if this difference is no longer made, does the legal state of war with the consequence of a special law of war and the neutrality obligations in a blockade still exist under United Nations law which is valid throughout the world?

The following has emerged as valid law from the legal discussions and from the practice of the postwar period:

Even if the ban on force encompasses the prohibition of war, it is necessary nevertheless to apply the international law of war in prohibited wars in order to localize the conflict and to prevent it from turning into uncontrollable chaos.

The attempt was made to tie the beginning of the state of war to objective characteristics. Thus, the state of war was to exist when military conflict was regarded as war historically or when it was directed against another state as a whole. This description of the objective characteristics already shows how unless they are in practice. This attempt to introduce a further objective interpretation of war had the purpose of aiding the prohibition of war and of having humanitarian rules of waging war gain effect.

Meanwhile, it is generally recognized that the humanitarian rules of warfare are applied in any kind of military conflict. [paragraph continues]

Since the prohibition of war is also comprehensively regulated by the ban on force by the United Nations, there is no longer any need for tying the beginning of the state of war to objective characteristics.

Hence, valid international law continues to be the subjective interpretation of war which demands for the beginning of the state of war a declaration of the will for war on the part of at least one of the parties involved. But declarations alone, without ensuing use of force, are not enough.

In a naval blockade against Iran because of the taking of hostages it is unlikely that one of the parties involved would bring about the state of war by declarations. Even if there is a lot of talk in Iran right now about waging a "holy war" against the United States, they will most probably refrain from a legally significant declaration of war, especially to preclude neutrality obligations by third parties and to prevent an eventual isolation. Hence, we must proceed from the assumption that a blockade would not lead to war but would be carried out in a state of peace as a so-called peace blockade.

Blockades in a state of peace were permissible under certain provisos under international law that was valid prior to the law of the United Nations. A common law on the permissibility had formed in the 18th Century. Since the historical developments which were essential for the emergence of the peace blockade law have been largely buried in our minds, it is worthwhile to list them:

Blockade against Norway by Great Britain and Sweden (1814) to enforce the merger of Norway with Sweden.

Against Holland by Great Britain and France (1832-1833), to achieve the separation of Belgium from Holland, which the five European big powers as guarantors of the 815 treaties had recognized in a treaty again in 1831.

Against Mexico (1938) and Argentina (1838-1840) by France, which was supposed to be a punishment for the violation of legal rights of French citizens, but which politically belonged to the conflict between the old and new worlds.

Against New Granada (1837) and Nicaragua (1842 and 1844) by Great Britain, serving the protection of its extensive trade as well as the extension of its existing influence in these areas, but which also had the pretext of violations of the rights of British citizens.

Against Greece (1885) by Great Britain (Pacifico blockade), in order to implement restitution demands on Athens by Don Pacifico who stemmed from Gibraltar.

Against Brazil (1862-63) by Great Britain in order to implement restitution claims for the plundering of a trade vessel.

Against Greece in 1886 and 1897 by the European big powers to enforce the incorporation of Macedonia and the island of Crete by Greece against Turkey in the framework of ideas pertaining to a balance in the Balkans.

Of the east African coast of Zanzibar (1888) by Germany, Great Britain and Italy to cut short the slave trade.

Against Venezuela (1902-03) by Great Britain, Germany and Italy to implement protection of their citizens and claims for payment.

Of the coast of Montenegro and north Albania (1913) by the European big powers to implement the cession of Albanian territories to Montenegro, Serbia and Greece, which was decided at the Berlin congress of 1878.

From these events developed the common law that peace blockades as punishment for violations of civil law are admissible as long as the violation and the blockade stood in some proper relation. Since the reprisal could only be directed against the state that had violated the international law, it was forbidden in a peace blockade as a reprisal to handicap the navigation of third, uninvolved states. It has been argued for a long time against the passage right of third states that a more effective reprisal measure would be particularly useful to avoid extended conflicts, particularly war and that, therefore, as in a state of war, neutrality duties must be observed in a peace blockade like in a state of war. But the third point prevailed, namely, that in punishing a violation of law only the violator can be hit.

For the assessment of blockade plans vis-a-vis Iran according to the law prior to the establishment of the United Nations, it can be said that the reprisal of a blockade would be legally admissible as punishment for the taking of hostages but--and this is the decisive difference with regard to a blockade in a war with neutrality duties--the navigation of third states may not be handicapped.

The law of the United Nations, as mentioned, forbids threatening with or applying force in "international relations" if it is directed against the "territorial inviolability or the political independence of a state" or if it is "otherwise incompatible with the aims of the United Nations." Those things that are compatible with the aims of the United Nations are primarily the exceptions envisaged in the stipulation, that is, measures of the United Nations itself to preserve and reinstate world peace, or self-defense measures of one or more states against an "armed attack."

A peace blockade, it is being argued, as a reprisal for punishment of violations of international law, thus would be admissible according to the law of the United Nations if the blockade as a measure on the high sea does not interfere with territorial inviolability, if it does not endanger as a temporary measure the political independence of a state, and if it otherwise does not oppose the aims of the United Nations. Such an interpretation and justification of reprisal blockades under the law of the United Nations, which has been tried several times, would be superficial. It would be incompatible with the aim of renunciation of force, namely, to avoid the bringing about of conflict situations through the application of military force. According to the meaning of the stipulations, it is necessary to consider also those threats with and application of force as impermissible which would curtail only temporarily the political freedom of action. So valid international law says, according to the stipulations of the United Nations, that a blockade in peacetime as a reprisal against a violation of law is impermissible.

It remains to be discussed whether the ban on military reprisal and thus the peace blockade reprisal would be inapplicable, because the collective security system of the United Nations, due to the opposition of the big powers, fails to fulfill its purpose and cannot guarantee effective protection of individual states. Without protection by the collective security system, the individual state cannot be expected to renounce the implementation of its rights to military force. According to the valid principle of international law of "clausula rebus sic standibus," the general international law valid prior to the establishment of the United Nations could have become valid again. Under that prerequisite a peace blockade against Iran because of the taking of hostages could be legally admissible.

But a revival of the right to self-help given in 1945 cannot be proved on the basis of the practice of states. On the contrary, it has become clear that, despite the Security Council's inability to act and its lack of strength to implement, because of the disagreement of its permanent members, the United Nations has not abandoned the collective security system to the advantages of reviving rights of individual states. Sufficient examples can be cited in this connection.

As early as in 1946 through 1950 the UN General Assembly gained political weight due to its measures taken in the Spain, Greece and Korean problems because of the insufficient cooperation of the big powers in the Security Council. In the resolution "uniting for peace" of 3 November 1950, the General Assembly had interfered in the Security Council's sphere of authority, raising the claim of being able to recommend military measures of force to the members in order to maintain or reestablish international peace. Thus the General Assembly, by maintaining the collective security system, wanted to overcome the Security Council's inability to act by taking over part of its function.

There was similar action early this year when, after the Soviet veto in the Security Council against the decisions in connection with the Afghanistan intervention, the General Assembly took over the matter and condemned it with a big majority. This action is an expression of the fact that the United Nations is seeking the way of political elimination of the dangers of war and of violations of international law, thus adhering to the legal system of collective security without the right of an individual state to apply force. It must also be mentioned that the United States, during the Cuban crisis of 1962 when it applied the means of a peace blockade, did not maintain the revival of self-help rights according to the general international law of 1945, but claimed the responsibility of the Organization of American States as a regional organization.

The result: Peace blockades as reprisal measures are impermissible according to valid international law, thus also a U.S. blockade against Iran.

DIE WELT ANALYZES SCHMIDT ARMS CONTROL PROPOSAL

DW161550 Bonn DIE WELT in German 16 Apr 80 p 2

[Ruediger Moniac article: "It Was Genscher's Reaction Which Made the Extent of the Chancellor's Proposal Clear"]

[Text] The way the chancellor acted was unusual. For his recent sensational proposal he did not choose the central political stage in Bonn. He chose the regional congress of his party in Hamburg at which the comrades adopted the party ticket for the Bundestag elections. Number one on this ticket: Helmut Schmidt.

The federal chancellor said in Hamburg on the arms policy: "An initial step in the right direction could be that both sides simultaneously renounce the deployment of new or additional medium-range weapons for a certain number of years and use this period for negotiations. I admit that the present lead of the Soviet Union would continue to exist during this period. But that would be the case anyway for the 3 years at least (Schmidt meant by this: Until the NATO decision will have been implemented--the editor), and the Soviet lead would even grow during the 3-year period the West needs for production."

The chancellor's words in Hamburg remained generally unnoticed. The day after, in the election campaign in the Ruhr area, Schmidt repeated his proposal. Again it remained unnoticed by the public. It was only after Schmidt asked the SPD Monday to publish excerpts from the speech he made Friday that it was noticed in all of the Federal Republic.

The first to discover in Schmidt's proposal an explosive for the coalition and NATO was Chancellor Schmidt's direct neighbor in the Cabinet. Schmidt's deputy, who is also federal foreign minister, chose a most remarkable method of dissociating himself from the chancellor's initiative. Hans-Dietrich Genscher had his spokesman tell DIE WELT: "There is no intention of changing th attitude of the Federal Government." [paragraph continues]

"The decisions of December 1979 remain valid." The minister could not have dissociated himself more coolly and more clearly from his own chief of government without violating the necessary rules of politeness.

One must remember what the North Atlantic alliance decided on 12 December last year following intensive discussions. Then it will become clear what effects the chancellor's initiative might have which, by the way, was "not discussed beforehand with any government member or NATO" (as Government Spokesman Klaus Boelling told DIE WELT). Paragraph 7 of the NATO communique dated December 12, 1979, says roughly: The tactical nuclear weapons in Europe with a range of over 1,000 kilometers will be modernized by the deployment of 108 Pershing-II missiles and 464 cruise missiles. At the same time, it is further stated in paragraphs 8 and 9, the alliance sees sees in the efforts for an arms control "an integral part...guaranteeing the undiminished security of its member states and making the strategic situation between East and West more stable, more surveyable and more controllable on a lower arms level on both sides."

The recent proposal by the chancellor might be apt to soften the cohesion of NATO regarding its will to modernize the nuclear arsenal stationed in Europe, because Schmidt talks about a "certain number of years" during which East and West should renounce the introduction of new or additional medium-range weapons and use the time for negotiations. He does not say in his decisive first sentence that the 3 years could be used for such negotiations, which are required for producing the new weapons in the United States. Although Government Spokesman Boelling, answering a question by DIE WELT, said that the chancellor "surely meant the 3 years," it is still not quite clear.

This lack of clarity is threatening in that Schmidt--whether deliberately or not, must remain open--softens the NATO decision. It is not so certain anymore whether the chancellor is really prepared to accept the deployment of the new U.S. weapons on German soil from 1984 on--which he also had decided upon in the NATO ministerial council in December--if arms control negotiations have failed by then to contribute to the stabilization of security on a lower level. Therefore, if the chancellor does not define his move in more detail, he will jeopardize the solidarity of the alliance and thus also the prerequisite on the basis of which the United States has started production of the Pershing-II and cruise missiles.

PRC FOREIGN TRADE OFFICIAL TALKS WITH INDUSTRIALISTS

LD211551 Hamburg DPA in German 1417 GMT 21 Apr 80

[Text] Bonn--Otto Wolff von Amerongen, chairman of the Eastern committee of German industry had a meeting in Bonn on Monday with the chairman of the PRC Council for the Promotion of International Trade, Yang Yaoting. Taking part in the talks were other leading representatives of industry, trade and banking.

On welcoming the Chinese guest, Wolff underlined the international PRC trade council's particular importance for German industry as a platform for establishing contacts with interlocutors in the People's Republic. The Chinese organization has contributed toward the promotion of economic exchange between the two countries.

FRANCIOS-PONCET ADDRESSES ASSEMBLY ON FOREIGN POLICY

LD211715 Paris LE MONDE in French 18 Apr 80 pp 6-7

[Unattributed report: "Invasion of Afghanistan 'Has Hit Relations and Balance on Which Peace Is Based'"]

[Text] These are the main passages of the speech which Jean Francois-Poncet delivered to the National Assembly late in the morning of Thursday, 17 April.

After recalling that "for more than 20 years" French foreign policy has been "independent in its principles and its approach," Mr Francois-Poncet stressed the "three major events on which concern is focused."

He defined them as follows:

"The Soviet Union intervened militarily in Afghanistan to maintain the regime of its choice there; in the Middle East and in some regions of Africa conflicting inflexible attitudes are still blocking the paths to peace; in Europe itself a seemingly financial debate between one of the member states and its eight partners is calling into question the Community's foundations."

Events in Afghanistan, the minister said, are "particularly serious for three reasons":

"A people's independence is under attack.... Neither the fact that a communist government was already in power in Kabul, nor the Afghan authorities' appeal which the Soviet Union claims it merely answered, nor the foreign interference which allegedly took place can disguise the gravity of that.

"None of these explanations can be accepted. I will not dwell on the chronology of the events; it formally contradicts the theory that an appeal was made. As for the alleged interference, there is scarcely any proof that it took place; the rudimentary weapons which the Afghan rebels possess belie the existence of such interference. If this had been the case there would have to be some explanation of why neither the United Nations nor the nonaligned movement was asked to examine the problem and why an expeditionary corps equipped with extremely heavy weapons was immediately sent in.

"All eyewitness reports agree that the Afghan people reject the presence of foreign troops, whether by armed resistance or silent opposition.

"This situation created in this way affects the balance in the whole region.... The great powers have always been tempted to try to control this crossroads. Fortunately they have done so in vain. That gave peace a chance. By taking the stance it has, the Soviet Union is jeopardizing balance and security in this part of the world.

"These events have an even wider influence: They have been carried out by one of the two powers which alone hold the means of launching a world conflict and which hence have special responsibility in maintaining peace.... A blow has been dealt to the relations and the balance on which peace is based."

"Detente, a Word Which Does Not Have a Good Press"

Mr Francois-Poncet then examined the future of detente--a word which does not "now have a good press, which is a sign of the crisis through which we are passing." For him, however, detente "has not prevented crises but has prevented them from deteriorating." [paragraph continues]

"Detente," Mr Francois-Poncet added, "is not an easy path. It is not an alibi, nor an illusion. It can be achieved by strength and maintained by vigilance. It requires moderate attitudes from all sides and respect for common principles. It requires partners to understand each other and accept each other as they are. It presupposes a clear balance of forces which is accepted as such.

"In short, it has rules which, although different from the rules governing confrontation, are no less urgent. The strength of France's African policy and the continuous effort it devotes to its security are not intended to tone down its detente policy but are an integral part of it."

However, the minister continued, the situation is deteriorating. After mentioning the force used in Angola, the Horn of Africa, Yemen and Kampuchea, he said: "Misunderstanding and distrust have arisen between the two superpowers. Contacts between their leaders have become rare. On the one hand decisions have been taken which are incompatible with the need for the moderation and restraint without which relations between East and West degenerate sooner or later into confrontation. On the other hand, lack of continuity and strength has created doubt as to the nature of the objective pursued, and the reliability and constancy of the policy followed."

Going on to define French policy, the minister stated: "It is not a question of bowing to a fait accompli or of joining the spiral of confrontation. In present circumstances France's only weapons are strength and dialogue. Both are vital."

Recalling that he had described the intervention in Afghanistan as "unacceptable" in a communication to the USSR ambassador in France on 6 January, Mr Francois-Poncet added:

"Unacceptable means that the Soviet action not only violates principles but also the balance which forms the foundation of international relations and ensures the maintenance of peace. The word does not just express a moral reaction. It defines a political objective.

"This objective is the withdrawal of the Soviet troops. Some people, often the same people who accuse us of timidity, laugh at the excessive ambition of this objective. I would like to answer them. The question is not whether the withdrawal of Soviet troops will be easy to achieve. It is whether it is necessary...."

Mr Francois-Poncet then recalled "the way to return to a normal situation.... For this, two conditions must be fulfilled: The presence of foreign troops must be ended; the great powers and neighboring states must make the necessary pledges to ensure that Afghanistan cannot constitute an advantage or a threat for anybody."

"France," the minister continued, "is also anxious to maintain contact with the Soviet Union--in Madrid this fall within the framework of the CSCE and in Paris where I will receive Mr Gromyko on 23 April.

"Dialogue is never more necessary than in a time of crisis. Of course, it is not enough just to talk in order to reach agreement, and I do not pretend that it is. However, abandoning dialog means losing even the chance of making yourself understood. Now France has things to say to the Soviet Union. There is probably no country in a better position than France to make the gestures necessary to restore detente and to show it the risks it would take by sticking to the path it has taken.

"The action on 27 December, which was portrayed as a limited and temporary action, is becoming a large-scale permanent operation. The intervention is being followed daily by the inevitable consequences of its prolongation.

"Force always ends by producing an opposing force. The distrust it engenders is contagious. Unless the crisis is solved quickly, the whole edifice of East-West relations as built in Helsinki and Belgrade for 15 patient years is in danger of collapsing."

Middle East: Conflict Will Not Be Settled by Arms or by Terrorism

Referring to Mr Giscard d'Estaing's recent statements on the Palestinian people's right to self-determination during his recent visit to the Gulf states and Jordan, the foreign minister said: "They were in keeping with a line which had been asserted for more than 10 years. Therefore the message was not fundamentally new: However, it came from France and fulfilled an expectation.

"Too many commentaries have sought to distort the intention of these statements and betray their spirit for me not to try to explain and clarify the matter again. France's policy is not based on ulterior motives or prejudice. Its only objective is peace and it consists in a small number of simple propositions."

Mr Francois-Poncet then cited the three "propositions":

"First proposition: The only solution to the problem is a political solution. It cannot be settled by arms or terrorism....

"Second proposition: A lasting political settlement cannot disregard or ignore the two fundamental factors of the Jewish people and the Palestinian people.

"Throughout its history the Jewish people have experienced terrible trials; as everybody remembers, these culminated in the tragedy of the Nazi holocaust. Through courage and effort they have again found a territory and built a state. This state has the right to security and respect. France has never stopped proclaiming that.

"The Palestinian people exist in the consciousness which they themselves and others have of their own, distinct individuality. Bruised, scattered and exiled, they are nowhere at home; they feel alien everywhere. They are entitled to a country of their own.

"Third proposition: Any political solution will have to be global. It is uselsss to imagine that it is possible to resolve the problem of Israel and the Palestinian problem independently of each other. They are as inseparable as the two sides of one coin. As long as the Palestinian people remain alienated, Israel will enjoy no security. And this alienation can end only under conditions which would guarantee Israel's security.

"Everything stems from these three considerations--on the one hand evacuation of the territories occupied in 1967.... Only such an evacuation can give the Palestinian people a territorial base without which both their right to a homeland and their right to self-determination would only be fictions devoid of any practical significance.

"And, on the other hand, Israel's security.... Israel's borders resulting from such an evacuation must be fully recognized and their security effectively ensured. The Palestinian people's right to self-determination must be exercised within the framework--and, consequently, the limits--of an overall settlement in which the State of Israel finds the precise, concrete and constraining guarantees of security which it can rightly expect. The international community, through, inter alia, the Security Council--no permanent member of which, let me remind you, has ever challenged Israel's existence--will have solemnly to engage its authority with a view to ensuring respect for such a settlement. France has indicated that it is willing to play its part in the field.

"And, finally, it is obvious that such a settlement cannot be binding unless it is accepted by all parties concerned, which should even be enabled to participate in its preparation....

"It has been alleged that, by recognizing the Palestinian people's right to self-determination, France has shown that it is not unduly concerned about Israel's right to existence and security. It has even been insinuated that it has done this on account of sordid self-interest. I defy anyone to find in the government's statements the least hint which could support these allegations which call France's honor in question.

"France is committed to Israel's existence and heedful of the conditions for its security as much as anyone else is. However, what it wants is not the kind of security prevailing in a fortified camp but security and peace. Challenged borders will never be secure borders."

Referring to the "Palestinian charter" and "certain statements" showing that the PLO's objective is Israel's destruction, the minister continued: "The settlement which France proposes implies that all parties concerned are to renounce whatever in their claims is excessive, unjustified or unacceptable. Let me be absolutely clear about it: This applies both to the PLO and to Israel. We will not support any other solution. This means that the contacts which we have established and which we have maintained are unambiguous. They confer neither privilege with respect to representation nor exclusivity. They merely take cognizance of a necessity."

Mr Francois-Poncet spoke next on the Camp David negotiation process: "France does not fail to recognize the efforts and the will for peace which these negotiations have cost. The evacuation of the Sinai and the normalization of bilateral Israeli-Egyptian relations are major events. And I do not hesitate to say now that if the same principles could be applied to the West Bank and Gaza, and if the present talks facilitated the global settlement of which I have spoken, it would receive France's vote in advance.

"But the negotiations have not yet succeeded. This stems from the conceptual differences of the parties themselves.... Moreover, I note that the Camp David accords talk explicitly of the Palestinian people and their legitimate rights. What people is this and what are their legitimate rights if the right to self-determination is excluded?

"Here as elsewhere, France has better things to do than apportion praise or blame. Its role is to point out what it considers just and necessary in the interests of peace. And, if circumstances demand, it is to take the appropriate measures in concert with its European partners which share its convictions. This is what it is doing and what it will do."

"Europe Is Threatened"

Noting that "Europe is threatened" and "must unite" and that "the agricultural policy is the cornerstone of the Community edifice," the minister explains the litigation on lamb:

"It is false and dishonest to claim that, because France is slow in applying an unfavorable decreee from the Court of Justice, it is breaking with the Treaty of Rome. The reverse is true. Nobody...has ever suggested opening the frontiers without setting up a joint marketing organization. The stubborn rejection of such an organization for lamb is not only in contradiction with the just claims of our lamb producers. It leads us to wonder what is the aim being pursued; to wonder whether it is not to turn the Economic Community into a simple free-trade zone. This is indeed why the government will not compromise on this question: It questions an essential principle; it affects a legitimate interest."

On the problem of the British contribution, the minister stated: "The government is disposed to take into consideration the difficulties Britain is encountering. It knows and appreciates the efforts that Britain is making.... It is prepared to give its support and aid to its ally from the dark hours.... But it will defend the principles and achievements of the Common Market. It will oppose compromises which would attack the foundations of the European Community.

"...It's one of two things. Either the British Government asks for reduced aid of limited duration, as other governments have done before it--the problem then is one that the Community has resolved in the past and which it must be capable of overcoming now--or else Britain asks that the Community bills charged at its frontiers and on its territory should approximately balance the Community's spending on the United Kingdom. It would then be a matter of introducing an entirely new principle into the Community's practice, that known as a 'fair' return."

"...If, during the debates at the end of the month, there were to be a majority inclined to ratify so profound a change, France would ask for precise proposals and would study them.... It would do so with the firm conviction that the system adopted in 1970 is the one most suited to the requirements of the Community's development.

"What France could not accept, on the other hand, is that the rule of a fair return should be applied to a single country which would thus benefit from the singular privilege of being in and out of the Community at the same time.

"Moreover, it goes without saying that, at a time when the Community is pondering the advisability of changing one of the most important rules of its operation, it could not neglect or postpone the essential problems posed by its daily existence. Thus the European Council will have to take the decisions which will enable the agricultural prices for 1980 to be set, the decreeing of the economy measures required by the growth in agricultural spending, the settlement of the lamb problem and the solution of the fishing problem which has existed since Britian joined and which is one of the tests of its European will.

"...The moment to abandon the work has surely not come. A solution can and must be found. For this to be possible it requires that each partner agrees to adapt to the Community and that none asks the Community to adapt to it."

On the conflict in Chad, Mr Francois-Poncet said: "The government shares the keen concern aroused by this conflict among all the friends of that country, beginning with France. The latter respects an attitude of strict neutrality. By its unstinting humanitarian aid it is working to ease the population's sufferings. The French Embassy is maintaining permanent contact with all the parties to try to obtain an end to the fighting and to the tragedy."

The Iranian Crisis

Finally, the minister recalls France's loyalty to the Atlantic alliance while explaining that the latter "is not, as far as we know, one of protector and protected." These principles are applied to the "unjustifiable trials imposed on the U.S. diplomats in Tehran." He continued: "A universal rule has been violated, the respect of which is essential to the maintenance of peaceful international relations. France's friendship for the Iranian people cannot exempt it from condemning such a violation. Alone or with its European partners, through diplomatic or other channels, France has ceaselessly worked for an end to this. But the solidarity which unites it with the United States in its cruel trial cannot relieve France of deciding for itself and at the opportune moment the measures which it considers the most appropriate and the most effective."

DENMARK

RECALLED AMBASSADOR BRIEFS MINISTER ON IRAN SITUATION

ID221007 Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Danish 15 Apr 80 pt 1

["KJOL" report: "Iran Ambassador Home for Consultations"]

[Text] Denmark's recalled Ambassador to Tehran Jorgen Adamsen gave Foreign Minister Kjeld Olesen a thorough briefing on the situation in Iran on Monday. Jorgen Adamsen, together with the other EEC ambassadors, delivered a protest to President Bani-Sadr on Saturday against the continued detention of the hostages in the American Embassy.

Ambassador Jorgen Adamsen told BERLINGSKE TIDENDE that it has not yet been decided how long he will remain in Denmark. The EEC foreign ministers will meet again on 22 April, when the situation will be debated after studying the Iranian reaction to the EEC protest. At this stage the EEC also wants to consult Norway, whose ambassador has also been recalled. Jorgen Adamsen arrived in Tehran as ambassador on 2 April after 6 years as Denmark's ambassador to Helsinki. He had not yet been able to present his credentials to Bani-Sadr before delivering Denmark's protest as part of the EEC ambassadors' joint action.

AKTUELT URGES SUPPORT FOR U.S. ATTEMPTS TO FREE HOSTAGES

ID211255 Copenhagen AKTUELT in Danish 15 Apr 80 p 2

[Editorial: "State Hostages"]

[Text] It is actually rather surprising that the United States has not demanded European solidarity before now in the affair of the 50 American hostages in Tehran. However, President Carter has now demanded "action" from his European allies and Japan, and a deadline has been set for their response. The result must be their participation in sanctions against Iran. In the meantime the ambassadors of the EEC countries in Tehran have been recalled for "consultations."

The situation is fantastic and without parallel. For almost 6 months an assortment of 50 Americans have been kept prisoner in a frenzied, fanatical country. It seems as if Iran's president has realized the seriousness of the situation and sought a solution--but he is weaker than Khomeyni, who supports the students who took the hostages.

The alternative that has been worked on--to transfer the hostages to the care of the Revolution Council--is, if anything, an even more insane arrangement and would mean that the state would be the official holder of the hostages!

Iran does not follow normal legal principles or diplomatic tradition, and in this situation the United States ought to be able to count on the support of the rest of the world in the only reasonable demand: that the hostages be released.

SWEDEN

RECALL OF TEHRAN AMBASSADOR 'CONSIDERED,' BUT NO SANCTIONS

LD221005 Stockholm DAGENS NYHETER in Swedish 16 Apr 80 p 6

[Unattributed report: "Ullsten Adopts Sharper Tone: Tehran Ambassador Home, No Economic Boycott"]

[Text] Sweden could recall its ambassador to Tehran for consultations. However, there can be no question of sanctions to support U.S. efforts to secure the release of the hostages in Iran. A decision to recall Ambassador Bundy has not yet been made.

"Sweden will not take part in economic sanctions which have not been accepted by the UN Security Council," Foreign Minister Ola Ullsten explained on his tour of Japan. He added that such measures would not be particularly effective in achieving what needed to be achieved. The Eastern bloc countries would be all too eager to step in and replace the boycotting nations, he said.

The United States has asked for support for its cause from a number of nations, Sweden among them. It also suggested different forms of sanctions against Iran. For Sweden's part Ullsten made a gesture by once again condemning the taking of the hostages in Tehran.

"It is a cynical game played with human lives when the staff of the American Embassy in Tehran are being held hostage for political reasons," the foreign minister said.

"The situation is not only repulsive from a humanitarian standpoint, but is also completely unacceptable and conflicts with international law and recognized principles of decent international behavior."

According to TYDNINGARNAS TELEGRAMBYRA, he also said that Sweden's consideration of the recall of its ambassador is to be seen against the background of Sweden's support from the outset for the American demand for the release of the hostages.

"But, at the same time as we protest, it is important that we learn to live with the Islamic nations' desire for greater independence. If the United States imposes a naval blockade against Iran, there is not much that Sweden can do about it," the foreign minister went on to say. Recently Norway and Denmark have recalled their ambassadors in a similar manner.

The question of whether Sweden will participate in the Olympic games in Moscow this summer remains open. If the Olympic games become an Eastern bloc competition, now that the United States and West Germany have decided to stay away, it could be difficult for Sweden to take part alone. "The Swedish Olympic Committee intends to take part. But if the committee feels isolated it could reconsider its attitude. The government does not intend to interfere in the matter," Ullsten said.

Ullsten's statement on Olympic participation must be taken as hinting at a foreign policy problem that could arise if all Western nations including neutral Switzerland and Austria support the U.S. boycott. Sweden would find itself in a difficult position with regard to its neutrality if it were the only Western participant among nations otherwise wholly from the Eastern bloc.

PAPER COMMENTS ON REASONING BEHIND CARTER'S 'HARD LINE'

LD221043 Stockholm DAGENS NYHETER in Swedish 15 Apr 80 p 2

[Editorial: "Carter Issues Ultimatum"]

[Text] Few West European states can be really satisfied with their handling of the problem of the embassy hostages in Tehran. For the most part they have acted as if the release of the hostages was an American headache and not a serious question for the entire international community.

It is still, of course, remarkable that the U.S. President has chosen to reveal to millions of television viewers that he has delivered a deadline to the Atlantic Pact nations for their participation in the economic and diplomatic sanctions that he recently implemented himself against Iran. The West German foreign minister has denied that such an ultimatum exists. But we could hear for ourselves on Swedish television on Sunday evening that Carter said that the others did not have long to make up their minds. For the first time, too, he frightened us with the alternative of military action.

Carter and, to a greater extent, his aides show increasing irritation that the NATO nations at least do not show greater solidarity on the questions of Iran and the boycott of the summer Olympics in Moscow. They are now primarily asking for support of the program of sanctions against Iran, for which an overwhelming majority has already voted in the Security Council. A reasonable request, it would seem to many.

But we cannot overlook the deplorable fact that the Soviet Union used its veto against this entire program. The Carter administration cannot blithely intend that superpower vetoes be disregarded in practice? This line of thought could have the strangest effects if one remembers, for example, American vetoes against earlier Middle East resolutions which the United States wanted to halt.

The reason why West European states have been reluctant to take steps against Iran is not merely fear of the reactions of the oil-rich Muslim world (the Iraq-Iran crisis shows that the Arab camp does not entertain particularly warm feelings for Iran). The reason is perhaps mostly the fear that a hardline approach by the West would throw Iran into the arms of the Soviet Union.

The British newspaper THE GUARDIAN points out a little sharply that iron measures could have been used in the first weeks of the crisis. Then came the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan and the United States itself chose more unobstrusive diplomatic efforts to try to repair relations with Iran. Despite everything, the country was seen as a possible Muslim ally in a situation in which the whole of Islam reacted against the Soviet policy.

Now the presidential election campaign and the prospect of a future duel with Ronald Reagan has led Carter back to a hard line. By both threats and bribes the U.S. President has also succeeded, at least initially, in inducing his own Olympic committee to say no to the Moscow games. If nothing unexpected happens, the competition will in any case be crippled. Jimmy Carter, under pressure himself, has further increased the pressure on West European nations to make up their minds, on several fronts, and this does not improve the climate in this politically chilly spring.

COMMUNIST LEFT PARTY DEFERS DECISION ON PARIS MEETING

LD210903 Stockholm DAGENS NYHETER in Swedish 11 Apr 80 p 6

[Magdalena Ribbing report: "Communist Meeting in Paris: Werner Will Hold His Answer"]

[Text] The meeting of European communist parties in Paris at the end of April must be broadened before the Swedish Communists will take part. The Communist Left Party leader Lars Werner has not yet replied to the invitation of the French and Polish communists, but he told DAGENS NYHETER that the party committee has discussed the reply, and will answer next week.

On Thursday even the PCI formally declined the invitation to the meeting. The PCE has also declined, as has the Yugoslav party. The reasons why these parties do not want to participate in the European communist meeting are several, not least that the PCF has relapsed into a pro-Soviet posture and shown direct solidarity with the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan.

The invitation has gone to a communist party in each European country. It is signed by the French and Polish communist parties, and the only point on the agenda is how to promote continued struggle against rearmament. The Communist Left Party has not yet reached a decision on its invitation, but the party's Executive Committee discussed the matter Thursday and next weekend the party committee will decide whether or not to take part. "We are not discussing different alternatives," said Lars Werner, "and we have a number of questions to ask. We believe the conference ought to be broadened and we have a number of viewpoints on this."

[Question] Broader contacts? In what way?

Lars Werner said: "The struggle for peace and disarmament do not only concern communists."

[Question] Do you think that the French Communists are good communists?

Lars Werner replied: "We do not generally evaluate other parties in this way, but we know the French party's stance on the Afghan question and other matters. Party meetings across national borders are a good thing," Lars Werner said. "The broader, the better."

The question which has put wind into the sails of the Communist Left Party in recent months--nuclear energy--will not be discussed at all at the European communist meeting in Paris. The Communist Left Party does not intend to take any initiative in the matter either and so will not attempt to influence its sister parties in other countries to enter the struggle against nuclear power.

AMBASSADOR TO IRAN RECALLED; CITIZENS ADVISED TO LEAVE

WA220933 London REUTER in English 0625 GMT 22 Apr 80

[Text] Tehran, Iran, April 22, REUTER--Britain today recalled its ambassador to Tehran and the British Embassy advised its nationals to leave Iran unless they had pressing reasons to remain. Ambassador Sir John Graham left Tehran this morning and an embassy spokesman said there would be a major cutback in diplomatic personnel starting tomorrow.

An embassy statement to British residents said: "The embassy will no longer be able to afford you consular assistance and protection and those whose business permits them to leave should now do so."

(European Common Market foreign ministers met in Luxembourg yesterday to discuss concrete steps to back the United States in its dispute with Iran. These included a proposed reduction in European Economic Community (EEC) diplomatic staff in Tehran.)

The eight EEC ambassadors here--Luxembourg has no diplomatic representation--were called home last week to report to their governments on the crisis. Sir John was the only one to have returned to Tehran. He had now been recalled, officially for further consultations, the spokesman said.

Foreign Ministry Statement

[By Shenai Raif, PA staff reporter]

[Text] The British Embassy in Tehran will not be closed down despite the recall of our ambassador, the Foreign Office said in a statement today. The statement, issued in London and Luxembourg, said the ambassador had been instructed to return to London today to receive personally Lord Carrington's instructions following the crucial meeting of EEC foreign ministers in Luxembourg on the Iran crisis.

"The embassy has also been instructed to prepare to make substantial reductions in staff pending the outcome of the meeting," the statement said. "There is no question of closing the mission. A charge d'affaires and a small staff will remain in Tehran."

The Ambassador Sir John Graham was recalled to Britain a few weeks ago for consultations. He was not expected to return to Iran until the end of the Luxembourg talks, but surprisingly returned last week.

It is not expected that the foreign ministers meeting in Luxembourg will decide to break off complete diplomatic relations with Iran in order to secure the release of the 50 American hostages. And a British Foreign Office spokesman said today that Sir John's return did not represent a break in relations with Iran.

The Foreign Office today declined to comment on a British Embassy statement to Britons in Tehran, which said: "The embassy will no longer be able to afford you consular assistance and protection and those whose business permits them to leave should now do so." The British Embassy employs 30 diplomats when at full strength. Sir John took over from Sir Anthony Parsons as ambassador last year.

The Iranian Embassy in London refused to comment on the latest move today.

GOVERNMENT TO HELP FINANCE ALTERNATIVES TO OLYMPICS

LD212323 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 2313 GMT 21 Apr 80

[Text] The government will offer financial help to sports organisations to hold competitions at the highest possible level as alternatives to the Moscow Olympics. Foreign Office Minister of State Mr Douglas Hurd told the Commons in a short late-night debate that the government had been in close touch with the three British federations--hockey, yachting and equestrian--which had already decided not to go to the games. He added: "We are ready to give modest financial help for those who have followed our advice as to where British interests lie. It is quite right to thank those who have taken that decision at great personal sacrifice."

Mr Hurd said it was possible that an alternative yachting regatta could be held in the UK and the government had promised every possible support for such an event. Consultations were also being held with the equestrian authorities for an alternative competition, whether in the UK or overseas. "The government will play its part in making sure that British riders have the opportunity to compete at the highest possible level this year."

Mr Hurd insisted that sportsmen would "increasingly see the competition at Moscow is not worth the journey." He said it was not sensible to attack Sir Denis Follows and the decision of the British Olympic Association to go the Moscow games. "I profoundly and strongly disagree with the decision they have taken. I think clearly it was a foolish decision, taken before they needed to take it, which has put British competitors in an increasingly difficult and isolated position." Mr Hurd said the boycott was steadily gathering momentum and declared repeatedly that the Moscow games were "in the process of disintegration".

"The predictions we made are now coming true. It is increasingly clear that the Moscow Olympics in the form they were originally devised are disintegrating, and in several sports already the competition will be second-rate."

Mr Hurd denied the government's stance over the games had any connection with the American presidential election. "It really is not a matter of presidential election campaign," he said. "If we allow the Soviet aggression to continue unchecked then it is likely to be (?repeated)."

Mr Hurd was replying to West Lothian's Labour MP Mr Tam Dalyell who had earlier condemned President Carter's call for a boycott of the games and the government's pressure to stop the attendance of British athletes. It as "preposterous and absurd" to suggest that Britain was dealing with Russian colonial power aggression, he declared in raising the issue of the government's efforts to co-ordinate an alternative games. The government had expressed this "romantic view" of Afghan freedom fighters gallantly resisting a Russian colonial power which bore "little relation to the facts", he said. The President's request was "not about the good of Afghanistan but about the dire political needs of Jimmy Carter. The brutal truth is that the White House of President Carter has drifted into a posture over Afghanistan on the whim of the American peoples' understandable frustration over the hostagea and their lack of economic success," he said.

Mr Dalyell said he hoped the British Olympic Association would "stick beside that special provision in the Olympic Charter which urges athletes not to be influences by political decisions." He believed the heroes of the day here Sir Denis Follows and other members of the British Olympic Association, who had kept their heads and acted not only for sport but the future of mankind. For Western athletes not to go to Moscow would be another step back into a cold war, Mr Dalyell warned.

BRITISH DEPUTY FOREIGN MINISTER MEETS GOVERNMENT LEADERS

Rolandhis Meeting

NC211633 Nicosia Domestic Television Service in English 1615 GMT 21 Apr 80

[Text] Britain's Lord Privy Seal and Deputy Foreign Secretary Sir Ian Gilmour, who is on a visit to Cyprus, today began formal talks with government leaders and other officials. Sir Ian called on Foreign Minister Rolandhis this morning. Later the two men were joined by other aides as well as the Cyprus and British high commissioners in extensive talks which covered the Cyprus problem, the international situation and bilateral issues. A communique says Mr Rolandhis outlined the Cyprus Government's views and reaffirmed its desire for a resumption of meaningful talks. Sir Ian reiterated the British Government's readiness to help in the resumption of the intercommunal talks. The communique says the meeting was useful and constructive and was held in a cordial atmosphere. During the day, the British minister also saw the president of the House of Representatives, Mr Mikhailidhis, and the Greek Cypriot negotiator, Mr Ioannidhis. An official statement says Sir Ian will be received by the president of the republic tomorrow morning.

Kiprianou Conference

NC221130 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1030 GMT 22 Apr 80

[Text] President Kiprianou today received the Lord Privy Seal, Sir Ian Gilmour, who is on a visit to Cyprus. The meeting was also attended by Foreign Minister Rolandhis, British High Commissioner Rhodes and Foreign Ministry Director General Pelayias. After the meeting Sir Ian stated that he was happy to have been received by President Kiprianou and added that during the meeting they discussed British-Cypriot relations and the Cyprus problem. At the same time, the president of the republic stated that he had a very interesting conversation which, of course, centered on the Cyprus problem. He added: I availed myself of the opportunity to explain the Cyprus Government's positions and views on the present phase of the Cyprus problem in the light of Turkish intransigence. President Kiprianou said that bilateral issues were also discussed and that he raised the financial aspect of the British bases as well as the question of Cypriot students in Great Britain.

Concerning the subject of financial demands by the Cyprus Government, Mr Kiprianou said that Sir Ian Gilmour had undertaken to convey the views that had been outlined. He added: In the meantime, a detailed memorandum on the subject will also be prepared and presented in the hope that some progress will be made. The president of the republic described his conversation with Sir Ian Gilmour as very useful. Today, Sir Ian also had a meeting with Archbishop Khrisostomos.

AKEL LEADER BLAMES IMPERIALISM FOR TALKS DEADLOCK

NC211754 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1630 GMT 21 Apr 80

[Text] Speaking at the AKEL district conference of Famagusta in Dherinia, AKEL Secretary General Mr Papaioannou has said that the failure of the recent efforts to resume the dialogue on the Cyprus issue is mainly due to the undermining imperialist moves against Cyprus. He reiterated the need for both sides to exert every effort for a resumption of the intercommunal talks based on the Makarios-Denktas agreement, the Kiprianou-Denktas agreement and the UN resolutions. Regarding the issue of rapprochement between Greek and Turkish Cypriots, Mr Papaioannou said that AKEL supports contacts among leaders of political parties and proposed that, at a certain stage, all leaders of the political parties from both sides meet in order to create a climate of trust in which the intercommunal talks could have a favorable end. The AKEL secretary general criticized the government on the purging and taxation measures and called for municipal and communal elections in the cities.

PAPANDREOU, OPPOSITION REJECT KARAMANLIS PRESIDENCY STATEMENT

AT211030 Athens TO VIMA in Greek 20 Apr 80 p 8

[Excerpts] Leader of the majority opposition party and PASOK Chairman Andreas Papandreou made the following statement:

"In the science of constitutional law it is a well-known fact that in a modern democracy the political will of both the electorate and its representative chamber are formed by the political parties which, according to the Constitution, are a basic institution for the function of the regime. In light of this development the meaning of the representative mandate has been altered, in comparison to what was acceptable in the past century, in the following way:

"On the one hand the deputies represent the nation, as provided for under article 51, paragraph two of the Constitution, but they form their political will within the framework of the party.

"The regulations of the Chamber of Deputies expresses this spirit in the clearest possible way by prohibiting the submission of a personal candidacy in the election of a president of the republic as well as the announcement in the Chamber of Deputies of the names of those who have expressed their intention to run for election to this post. It further relegates the role of naming candidates to the parties exclusively and not to deputies or to the Chamber generally. In this manner the political decision as to who offers guarantees which are above all parties as well as the qualifications for taking over the supreme position lies with the political parties and not the personal decision of individual deputies.

"The regulations of the Chamber of Deputies rule that the collective evaluation of the party provides more guarantees than the personal judgment of each of the deputies. This point is also incorporated basically in article 100, paragraph three of the Chamber regulations, which prohibit a preliminary debate prior to the election of a president of the republic because it considers that the deputies have already decided on their choice within the party to which they belong.

"Karamanlis' appeal to the political parties to violate the regulations of the Chamber of Deputies and to cease taking collective decisions--in the case of his own personal candidacy--is nothing but a disregard of the very institutions which 'New Democracy' itself created and enforced through the majority it has enjoyed in the Chamber of Deputies.

"It is, as a result, improper to call upon the parties to dissolve themselves on the altar of the election of the leader of 'New Democracy' to the presidency.

"For decades Karamanlis has been the exclusive representative and spokesman of the rightwing in Greece. It is, therefore, surprising that today he calls upon political parties to consider him also as a candidate above all parties.

"PASOK has already decided--during the sixth congress of its Central Committee--that it will not cooperate in the election of a president by the current Chamber of Deputies which long ago ceased to express the political composition of the electorate. It holds to this decision.

"Naturally it is obvious that 'New Democracy' and the rightwing in general will undertake every possible effort to combine the election of Karamanlis to the presidency with the future of democratic institutions in our country. Woe to us, however, if our country's democratic regime depended upon the presence of a single person in the presidency. If such dangers do exist after 6 years of the country's administration by Karamanlis, then most certainly Karamanlis does not offer the guarantees which are essential for the position of president.

"After 7 years of bitter experience, both the people as well as their conscripted sons know very well how to protect the democratic regime and how to establish peoples' sovereignty.

"In Greece it is 'New Democracy' which is in danger, and not democracy itself."

The Government

It was announced that a "government spokesman," in response to questions from representatives of the press on party reactions to the statements of Prime Minister Karamanlis on the issue of the presidency of the republic, made the following statement:

"The government's prime minister raised an issue of principle and asked nothing from anyone. The nervousness, the haste as well as the terminology with which the opposition parties reacted is surprising."

The Position of the KKE

The press bureau of the KKE yesterday issued the following statement:

"The Political Bureau of the KKE has decided to convene a meeting of the Central Committee plenum which will define the specific position of the party's parliamentary group during Wednesday's Chamber of Deputies meeting."

I. Zigdhis

EDIK leader Ioannis Zigdhis made the following statement:

"Even at this moment, arrogance remains the leading characteristic of K. Karamanlis; bravery is once again absent. This is because at this point a clear statement of his intentions is required and not a resort to indirect blackmail.

"The prime minister should also learn that the statement 'nobody knows how one will end ones life as a politician' does not only apply to our own country but to all countries. Consequently his turning of this truth against his own country is unjust and ignorant."

I. Pesmazoglou

KODISO [Party of Democratic Socialism] Chairman I. Pesmazoglou made the following statement in response to Karamanlis' statement:

"The personification of the question of the election of the president of the republic as well as the efforts to deal with the problem through proclamations leads to the disorientation of the people and to shirking of responsibilities. [paragraph continues]

"The well-known KODISO proposals, made last January, regarding the election of the president in conjunction with a cleansing of public life were not made for reasons of expediency nor are they aimed at party gains. They arise from the objective need for a strengthening of the institutions and the regime. It is specifically for the purpose of the nonpartisan conduct of the office of the president and for the authority of the institution that it is necessary to have reforms which will publicly confirm both principles as well as intentions. KODISO insists upon its positions."

The EDA [United Democratic Left] Executive Committee

The EDA Executive Committee made the following statement:

"With its one and only marginal vote the EDA cannot share the views of the prime minister who asks to be elected as nonpartisan president because of his long involvement in public affairs, both before and after the junta. He functioned both as a founder and leader of ERE [National Radical Union] as well as founder and leader of 'New Democracy' who has been deeply involved in politics and particularly in party politics. He has dealt even with this issue of the presidency right from the outset with a similar party spirit.

"Evaluating the negative and positive aspects the EDA has concluded to vote against Karamanlis as a candidate for president of the republic."

The Progressives

The leader of the Progressives, Sp. Markezinis made the following statement:

"The commencing process for the election of the president of the republic is constitutionally correct. Any probable abstention from voting is also both constitutional and according to parliamentary procedure. There are severe objections from a political aspect. The Chamber of Deputies which is called upon to cast its vote is approaching the end of its term of office and it represents the will of the people as it stood three years ago. To be elected the president must cooperate with the Chamber which will reflect the will of today and of tomorrow. Given the fact that today's majority in the Chamber represents the peoples minority (42 percent) and that since its birth (1977) this minority has further shrunk, according to common knowledge, this further increases the political irregularity. Keeping in mind the form of the current Constitution, it fosters dangers of a severe constitutional crisis. These dangers could be avoided if parliamentary elections preceded or if they were of necessity held in case of a failure to elect a president. This is the crux of the matter.

"In view of the ever deteriorating economic situation of the country and in the midst of an explosive international situation, particularly in our own area, the necessity of a government with a recent popular mandate is imperative.

"Such a government, whether one party or a coalition, on the basis of a minimum national program, will be the only one which will have the strength and the authority to take and implement courageous and radical decisions in the economic and national fields. It is the only way to avoid street-corner politics if Greece is to survive. Much time has already been lost. It would be criminal if more is lost.

"The literary views of the prime minister on the subject do not touch upon the essence of the matter and consequently only affect him personally."

OFFICIALS CLAIM TRADE AGREEMENT TO BE SIGNED WITH IRAN

NC220700 Istanbul AYDINLIK in Turkish 20 Apr 80 p 3

[Text] Ankara (AA)--It has been reported that a comprehensive economic and trade agreement will be signed by the trade ministers of Turkey and Iran in Tehran at the end of May.

ANATOLIA AGENCY reports that this agreement will replace the 1964 agreement which has been in effect for the past 16 years. Under the new agreement Turkey will obtain oil and petroleum products from Iran. In return, Turkey will supply various goods to Iran, mostly industrial and agricultural products.

The statement further says that trade relations between Turkey and Iran showed a marked improvement from 1979, and that the forthcoming agreement will contribute to even greater improvements.

Ahmad Moshaveqzade, Iranian plenipotentiary [charge d'affaires] in Ankara, told the ANATOLIA AGENCY that "the new agreement will constitute a new step toward further development of bilateral relations."

TA192042 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1930 GMT 19 Apr 80

[Text] Under secretary of the Turkish delegation at the United Nations, Tugay Ulucevik, has said Turkey will encourage the intercommunal negotiations process in Cyprus. Ulucevik was replying to questions over the UN radio in connection with the resumption of talks between the Turkish and Greek Cypriot communities and the recent report submitted by UN Secretary General Waldheim to the General Assembly.

Ulucevik reiterated the view that Turkey and the Federated State believe that a just and lasting political solution to the Cyprus problem can be achieved only through negotiations between the two communities held under equal conditions. Ulucevik said Waldheim shares this view. He added that Waldheim's recent initiatives have not resulted in the resumption of the talks due to the negative attitude of the Greek Cypriot administration. Ulucevik stated Turkey and the Federated State have favorably received the statement in Waldheim's report that he will continue his activities aimed at resuming the talks. The Federated State has announced that it will try to make Waldheim's efforts successful. Turkey will continue to encourage the resumption of the talks.

COUNCIL OF MINISTERS CRITICIZES PETROGAL WORKERS

LD190559 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 2300 GMT 18 Apr 80

[Text] Six workers of the state oil company, PETROGAL, have been suspended by the management and disciplinary proceedings have been brought against them. It will be recalled that following the government's civil requisition order--rejected by the striking workers--the PETROGAL management council was empowered to take disciplinary action against those workers who failed to abide by the requisition order. Further disciplinary action might be taken, this time against the pickets, on the grounds of obstruction of the government's order.

In this connection, the presidency of the Council of Ministers has issued an official note stating that the picketing strikers are resorting to illegal and coercive actions against some of their fellow workers in an attempt to prevent--through verbal abuse, threats of physical violence, and obstruction of the freedom of circulation--those who have complied with the civil requisition order decreed by the government and resumed work from carrying out their duties.

The note adds that the government has taken appropriate steps with a view to ensuring free access to their work places and normal working conditions to those who have reported back to work.

MINISTERS REACH AGREEMENT ON SANCTIONS AGAINST IRAN

Statement on Sanctions

WA222246 London REUTER in English 2228 GMT 22 Apr 80

[Text] Luxembourg, April 27, REUTER--Following is the full text of today's decision by the European Common Market foreign ministers to adopt economic and diplomatic sanctions against Iran:

1. The foreign ministers of the nine members states of the European Community meeting in Luxembourg on 22 April discussed the implications of the recent events in Iran in the light of the reports by their ambassadors following the demarche to the president of Iran decided upon by the foreign ministers at their meeting in Lisbon on 10 April.

2. The foreign ministers expressed the solidarity of the Nine with the government and people of the United States at this time of trial.

3. While welcoming the visit by the ICRC (International Committee of the Red Cross) to the hostages on 14 April and noting the assurances given by President (Abolhasan) Bani-Sadr as to the living conditions of the hostages, the foreign ministers expressed their profound regret that the Iranian Government has been unable to give precise assurances about the date and methods by which the hostages would be released.

The Iranian Government continues to ignore the clear call of the UN Security Council and the International Court of Justice to bring to an end a flagrant violation of international law and release the hostages.

4. Since the hostages were first detained, the Nine, fully respecting the independence of Iran and the right of the Iranian people to determine their own future, have insisted that they must be released.

The fact that after six months they are still detained, despite the efforts of the Nine and the clear condemnation by the community of nations, is intolerable from a humanitarian and legal point of view.

5. The foreign ministers of the Nine, deeply concerned that a continuation of this situation may endanger international peace and security, have decided to request their national parliaments immediately to take any necessary measures to impose sanctions against Iran in accordance with the Security Council resolution on Iran of 10 January 1980, which was vetoed, and in accordance with the rules of international law.

They believed that these legislative processes should be completed by 17 May, date of the foreign ministers' meeting in Naples.

If by that time there has not been any decisive progress leading to the release of the hostages, they will proceed forthwith to the common application of the sanctions.

Steps will be taken within the Community in order that the implementation of the measures decided upon should not obstruct the proper functioning of the Common Market.

The ministers consider that, as of now and pending the entry into force of the measures mentioned above, no new export or services contract with persons or organizations in Iran should be concluded.

6. The foreign ministers decided, meanwhile, to put into effect without delay the following measures, to the extent that they are not already in force:

(I) Reduction in embassy staffs in Tehran,

(II) A reduction in the number of diplomats accredited by the Government of Iran in their countries,

(III) The reintroduction of a visa system for Iranian nationals travelling to member countries of the Nine,

(IV) The withholding of permission for the sale or export of arms or defense-related equipment to Iran.

7. The foreign ministers instructed their ambassadors to return to Tehran in the interval in order to convey the present decision to the Iranian Government, to follow the situation, and to undertake all possible efforts to alleviate and improve the living conditions of the hostages pending their release.

They expressed the hope that the Iranian authorities would act along the lines suggested in this statement.

8. The foreign ministers of the Nine, believing that this situation should be a matter of concern to the whole international community, call upon other governments to associate themselves with these decisions.

9. The foreign ministers decided immediately to contact the Government of the United States through the Presidency (of the EEC Council of Ministers) and to inform it of the decisions taken by them.

AFP Report

NC222010 Paris AFP in English 2014 GMT 22 Apr 80

[Excerpts] Luxembourg, April 22 (AFP)--The nine Common Market Countries today agreed on a series of diplomatic and economic sanctions against Iran, some of them immediate, aimed at obtaining the release of the 50 U.S. Embassy hostages in Tehran, official sources announced here today.

Foreign ministers of the Nine notably decided on an immediate reduction of member country diplomatic representation in Tehran and that of Iran in EEC countries.

It suspended arms sales to Iran but made no definite decision on boycotting oil purchases from the country.

They agreed however to discourage purchases of Iranian crude at prices higher than Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries (OPEC) recommended levels.

This was the first time that the nine European Economic Community members have taken a decision with as important political and economic implications.

During their debates, the ministers discussed whether their official statement should include a break in all existing contracts between the EEC and Iran.

They finally decided not to include the measure after it appeared that such reprisals would bring serious legal problems with the firms concerned.

Meanwhile, French Foreign Minister Jean Francois-Poncet said Tuesday that the "statement of the Common Market on Iran is the most convincing and the best adapted to the circumstances" to obtain the release of the American hostages.

He said the step fit into Iran's institutional process and eliminated any chance further sanctions would be postponed indefinitely.

It was not clear today if a transfer of the hostages into the charge of the Iranian Government by May 17 would be enough for a suspension of further EEC sanctions.

Lord Carrington on Decision

LD222136 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 2051 GMT 22 Apr 80

[By Geoffrey Meade, PA staff reporter in Luxembourg]

[Excerpts] Tough Common Market sanctions against Iran will begin on May 17 unless "decisive progress" is made towards releasing the American hostages, Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington said tonight.

The ultimatum was delivered after nine hours of talks between EEC foreign ministers in Luxembourg, where a package of measures was agreed in a bid to support President Carter's call for action from his European allies.

The measures to be taken from May 17 were outlined by Lord Carrington as:

A halt to all export or service contracts with Iran.

A reduction in embassy staffs in Tehran.

A cut in the number of Iranian diplomats serving in EEC countries.

Implementation of a visa system for Iranian nationals wanting to visit Common Market countries.

All the measures would begin immediately.

Governments will be asked to go ahead with legislation to enable sanctions to begin by May 17 if necessary.

"Unless very real decisive progress is made by then towards releasing the hostages, the sanctions will be brought into effect by the foreign ministers of the Nine, who will meet in Naples on that date," said the foreign secretary.

Lord Carrington said the ministers had expressed "their profound regret" that the Iranian Government had not given a precise assurance so far on the release of the hostages.

Lord Carrington warned: "Sanctions will be quite serious for the British economy, because we have a number of contracts with Iran, and it will mean a sacrifice on our part."

He went on: "But certainly the British Government is prepared to do this in view of the position in which the Americans find themselves, and the way they have been enormously patient in the last six months.

"We understand they cannot go on being patient if nothing happens."

He said the ministers had decided on their action because of the dangers of allowing situations like the Iranian crisis to happen without taking steps to prevent them occurring again.

But there was another factor.

"When your friends are in trouble, you support them, and it is very important for the United States to kn w that the Community is behind them."

He said he hoped America would regard tonight's decision as evidence of that support.

The measures agreed were virtually the same as the package Lord Carrington presented to the meeting for consideration.

But his proposal to stop oil imports from Iran to the EEC was dropped after a long debate.

Lord Carrington explained that European countries were, in any case, already carrying out President Carter's request not to buy Iranian oil at prices sharply different from world prices.

Lord Carrington did not amplify what "decisive progress" would be necessary in the Iranian situation if sanctions were to be avoided.

But he did hint that moving the hostages from the custody of their student captors into the hands of the authorities would not, in his view, amount to "decisive progress."

Asked whether he though the Nine's decision would stall American military action in Iran, he said he had understood there was less likelihood of military action if the Nine agreed to support President Carter in putting pressure on Iran.

A halt to service contracts between EEC countries and Iran includes the servicing of Iranian aircraft in EEC territory, but not the export of goods, which will come under trade and economic sanctions, if they are introduced.

The statement formally expresses the solidarity of the Nine, which the British Government particularly was anxious to achieve if the Common Market deliberations were to carry any weight.

The governments of Britain and France are among those which must now get down to the task of passing the necessary legislation in readiness for sanctions.

Some member countries do not need this step, however.

The statement says the fact that the hostages have been held for six months and are still detained is "intolerable from a humanitarian and legal point of view."

Lord Carrington defended the Nine from suggestions by American reporters in Luxembourg that the EEC had been a little late in backing President Carter.

"There was a very general feeling that we had to support the United States and no feeling that the EEC had dragged its feet in the past," he said.

The British Embassy in Tehran is preparing for a "rapid and substantial reduction in staff", a senior Foreign Office official confirmed today. But there was no question of a total shutdown, he said.

He added: "Our ambassador in Tehran, Sir John Graham, has been recalled to London so that he can meet Lord Carrington after the Luxembourg talks to be fully briefed on the British position."

Britons were preparing a mass exodus from Iran today.

The 300 businessmen and their wives and some of the 20 embassy staff were being offered places on a scheduled British Airways flight to Heathrow tomorrow.

The embassy said it did not know how many Britons would leave.

A trade embargo with Iran would have a disastrous effect on the Talbot Car Company's operation in Coventry. The company's "prop" for several years has been a major deal to supply car kits for assembly by the Iran National Motor Corporation.

Engines, gearboxes and transmission units worth 150 million pounds are due to leave the Talbot engine plant at Stoke, Coventry, this year.

Italian Foreign Minister Remarks

AU230848 Rome ANSA in English 0840 GMT 23 Apr 80

[Excerpts] Luxembourg, April 23 (ANSA)--Italian Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo has made it clear here that it is still not certain that the transfer of the American hostages in Tehran from the American Embassy to the hands of the Iranian Government would be sufficient to forestall European sanctions against the Tehran authorities.

After a meeting of EEC foreign ministers yesterday, Colombo, speaking as EEC duty chairman, admitted that transfer of the hostages from the Islamic militants in the embassy would be "certainly an important step" for the release of the hostages. But he said he could not foresee whether a step of this kind could be considered as sufficient to avoid application of the sanctions.

Colombo, who was asked by the EEC Nine to visit Washington to explain the European position, added that consultations would continue, especially as regards the juridical aspects of the decisions taken.

In this context, EEC sources would not rule out the possibility of clamping down on Iranian capital in EEC countries in order to offset any economic harm deriving from the decisions.

In other points Colombo cited the nine EEC foreign ministers as saying:

According to Colombo, the fact that the hostages are still detained after six months "despite the efforts of the Nine and the clear condemnation of the international community, is intolerable from the legal and humanitarian view point".

Colombo added that his task in Washington would be to "explain and clarify the reasons behind the provisions and mechanisms for the application of the sanctions" decided here.

EEC, INVESTMENT BANK DELEGATION MEETS WITH DENKTAS

TA221702 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1630 GMT 22 Apr 80

[Text] President Denktas received this afternoon a delegation from the EEC and the European Investment Bank now visiting Cyprus. The delegation is headed by the head of the Community's External Relations Department, Mr (Pierre du Chateau).

In a statement afterwards, Mr Denktas said that the aim of the Community was to finance projects which would serve entire Cyprus and that the delegation was holding contacts in the Federated State with this aim. He recalled that so far only the Greek Cypriot side had benefited from foreign aid, but he added that the protocol signed between the EEC and Cyprus included the principle that the aid coming from the Community should be spent on projects which would serve the entire island.

The president disclosed that he had asked for aid from the Community for the conclusion of the second phase of the Nicosia sewage project and for the preservation of water resources at Morphou.

The delegation later called on the prime minister, Mr Cagatay, and the minister of foreign affairs and defense, Mr Atakol. It will continue its contacts in the Federated State tomorrow after spending the night at Kyrenia.

NONPARTICIPATION IN IRAN SANCTIONS IMPAIRS U.S. RELATIONS

[Special DIE PRESSE report: "Now Officially: Vienna Rejects Iran Boycott"]

[Text] Vienna, (A.U.)--As has been reported, Austria's nonparticipation in the Iran sanctions demanded by the Americans has impaired the relations between Vienna and Washington. Although the U.S. Embassy in Vienna was not ready to make any comment, European observers circles assume that the Austrian refusal may acquire importance as a precedent for the decisions by other European neutrals.

The negative Austrian decision, announced by DIE PRESSE as early as last week, was handed over to two American diplomats at the Foreign Ministry by Secretary General Reitbauer on Monday evening [21 April]. The note, replying to an American aide-memoire, had been approved shortly before by the Austrian Cabinet.

In its reply Austria adopts the position that its permanent neutrality does not permit it to participate in the measures of one party to a conflict between third states. At the same time, the Foreign Ministry refers to the Austrian statements in the UN Security Council and the endeavors of the Austrian ambassador in Tehran. It states that every opportunity is being used to draw attenttion to the fact that international law is being violated in Tehran.

GOVERNMENT DECIDES TO ACCEPT 50 CUBAN REFUGEES

[Report on 21 April Austrian Cabinet meeting]

[Excerpt] On the request of the Interstate Committee for Emigration (ICEM) and of the Peruvian Embassy the Austrian Federal Government has decided, as a contribution to easing the situation of the Cuban refugees that have sought shelter at the Peruvian Embassy in Havana, to admit about 50 of these Cuban refugees to Austria. This relatively low number is due to the fact that Austria has already declared its readiness to help in numerous similar cases, as it did recently in the case of asylum seekers from Vietnam.

CABINET CALLS FOR BOYCOTT OF MOSCOW OLYMPICS

LD230934 Hamburg DPA in German 0919 GMT 23 Apr 80

[Text] Bonn--As expected, the Federal Government today called for a boycott of the Moscow Olympics by West German athletes. It was learned from government circles that the Federal Cabinet decided this morning to recommend to athletes not to take part in the Olympic games because of the Soviet Union's continued intervention in Afghanistan. The National Olympic Committee is to decide on the boycott issue on 15 May.

PAPERS CRITICIZE DEVELOPMENTS IN OLYMPIC BOYCOTT

DW230737 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0505 GMT 23 Apr 80

[Press review]

[Excerpt] STUTTGARTER NACHRICHTEN discusses the attitude of the international sports associations toward the Olympic boycott and writes: At their meeting in Lausanne the sports officials also studied the question of whether the chances for the games on the Moskva River could not be improved by clearing the games of political junk. The catch-words are national anthem, flag, and march-in. But let us not deceive ourselves. It is impossible to dodge the political question in that way--a question which quite clearly is: Go to Moscow--yes or no? Today the Federal Government will make a clear statement which has been long overdue and by which presumably other countries will orient their stance. In that respect the politicians should not allow themselves to be intimidated by the constant threats from the East. By the same token, they should desist from using political pressure to force its sports field to follow their course.

KOELNER STADT-ANZEIGER stresses the following: What these attempts amount to ultimately is, apart from the renunciation of flags and anthems, introducing a registration right for individual competitors whose National Olympic Committee decides on a boycott. These athletes then would appear as the representatives of their specific associations rather than of the National Olympic Committee, the result being that something like non-Olympic or semi-Olympic games would be held under the Olympic flag. It remains doubtful whether such solutions will earn any glory for the International Olympic Committee, and thus also for President of the National Olympic Committee Daume.

COMMENTATORS ASSESS EC DECISION ON IRAN

FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU

DW230756 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU in German 23 Apr 80 p 3

[Commentary signed "Ha": "Toilsome Act of Strength"]

[Text] The foreign ministers of the European Community states have agreed in an act of strength on common action against Tehran. The basis is not concern for the public mood in the United States, but the reasonable aim to implement adherence to international law and to achieve the release of the hostages in the Tehran U.S. Embassy who are being held in violation of their diplomatic immunity. The governments of the European Community therefore have set an ultimatum for Iran.

Federal Foreign Minister Genscher who was pressing for "immediate measures," had to curtail his aims in the Luxembourg negotiations. It is clear that the Luxembourg decisions will contribute less to the appeasement of the always more excitable U.S. public than Bonn had aimed for. On the other hand, however, Washington will have to realize that without Bonn's pressure these decisions would not have come about at all.

The question is now whether U.S. President Carter will now abstain from a naval blockade of Iran. In view of increasing Soviet troop concentrations and naval activities in the area around Iran, a blockade would considerably increase the risk of a clash between both big powers. The diplomatic activities of the Nine therefore will have to concentrate again on Washington. They can bring influence to bear on their great protective power only if they will be closely coordinated.

SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG

DW230855 Munich SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG in German 23 Apr 80 p 4

[Commentary signed Schr.: "EC Catalogue Without Value"]

[Text] The fear of the European governments of unpredictable U.S. measures against Iran cannot be very great, otherwise, the EC foreign ministers presumably would have sooner and more equivocally come to terms in Luxembourg on a catalogue of sanctions. What seems to have remained from the consultations is a bundle of recommendations from which each government can pick at random what it deems suitable for itself. The "agreement" of the Community will fail to make an impression on Iran as well as on the United States: Tehran will hardly regard it as a serious threat; Washington will be all the more disappointed and see a serious danger to the alliance.

In this vague form which was adopted, the reference to the Security Council resolution of 8 January does little good, even though the Europeans have thus formally exhibited cooperation with regard to Carter's wish for the implementation of this resolution. What is even weaker is the schedule of the foreign ministers: National measures are to be decided on by 15 May, but economic sanctions are to be imposed only after 31 May, in the event the hostages have not been released by then. Granted, it is true that sanctions do not show their effects immediately and that the rulers in Tehran need time, yet is it wise to grant them a greater respite than Carter has granted them? As an extreme means of pressure, the U.S. President has announced military measures for mid-May. Even if he did not state a specific date, feelings at home may well force him to fall into a faster pace. If the Europeans deem sanctions inexpedient for the liberation of the hostages they must, after all, ask themselves whether or not these sanctions would at least prevent Carter from any taking desperate action, particularly since they hardly have to make allowances for an end to Iranian oil deliveries. Meanwhile, Iranian oil is too expensive anyway for both the Japanese and the multis.

HANDELSBLATT

[Carl A. Ehrhardt commentary: "Solidarity, Yes--But...."]

[Text] The governments of the European Community countries are in a difficult foreign and domestic political situation in forming an opinion on actions vis-a-vis Iran. Solidarity with the United States is being spelled out differently by every country. But all realize that everyone in Europe has been challenged to do something for the United States that will make the Atlantic alliance partner abstain from military action, the consequences of which would be unpredictable also for Europe. According to international law, a trade embargo would be a permissible means for a peaceful settlement of a conflict (article 41 of the UN Charter). A full embargo by the European countries vis-a-vis Iran, however, even in view of the already reduced trade volume, would hurt Iran much more than the measures that have been taken so far by the United States. Only the European countries can inflict grave economic wounds on Iran, not the American countries. The European Community assesses differently the risk vis-a-vis the whole region and Tehran's turning to Moscow in the economic field. In the search for compromise and after a contribution to the avoidance of war, it was important to maintain the cohesion of the "Nine" in everything ranging below it [phrase as published].

In doing this they went even so far as to consider whether they should not right away renounce oil imports from Iran (presently 5.5 percent of all oil imports from third countries), so as to avoid making the impression that they had eventually found a consensus on the lowest common denominator only out of fear for the oil from Iran. "Solidarity, yes, but on a solid basis which can be implemented"--this was about the line on which they tried on Monday and Tuesday in Luxembourg to come closer to a consensus.

SCHMIDT SPEECH AT 20 APR SPD SECURITY CONFERENCE

DW211505 Bonn Tagesdienst Bulletin of the SPD Bundestag Faction in German 20 Apr 80 pp 1-19

[Prerelease of speech by Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt at SPD Security Congress in Cologne on 20 April]

[Text] Esteemed friends, esteemed guests:

I have a long manuscript here, but I have decided to use it only partially, preferring, as the artists would say, to produce more in the workshop. But I am frightened by this huge auditorium. The more people present, the more they expect a polished, well-phrased and smooth speech. Well, this is not what you will be getting this morning.

We have the motto "security for the eighties"--the topic of this congress--and the motto "security for Germany," a motto of the Social Democratic Party for this year. Actually, our national security in the eighties is more than just a national objective, a national task. We can only have security because we are making our own contribution toward security in Europe and in the world along with others, because we must rely on these others, because we must rely on their solidarity.

Security for people living today and for their children and posterity; solidarity with our friends; the preservation of peace in the world--these have always been targets of social democracy. They form part of our spiritual-political tradition. Security policy is an essential element of our peace policy, and peace policy is a major content of Social Democratic policy at large.

Heraclitus wrote 2500 years ago that war is the father of all things. But today we know and so has German social democracy known for more than 100 years, that peace is the father of all things.

To express it in a bit more modern way and commensurate with the present epoch, a bit more pointedly: War with its contemporary weapons of annihilation could very well spell the end of all things. Peace, however, constitutes the prerequisite for life, for progress, or, as Heinemann put it: Peace demands our all-out effort.

An active peace policy means, first, a security policy within the alliance; second, a policy balance through international arms limitation; third, policies on behalf of Germans in both parts of the divided fatherland; fourth, policies aimed at European unification; fifth, a policy of cooperation between West and East in Europe and in the world at large; and sixth, a conciliation of interests between North and South. Peace and security not only are matters of treaties, but also require an ethical, moral, and philosophical foundation. An orientation toward peace must be anchored in the thoughts and feelings of our citizens, in their awareness; it needs to be cultivated.

Our citizens must know, first of all, that peace requires efforts and constant endeavors, that it is not at all a foregone conclusion, a natural occurrence or a God-given thing. And they must be aware.

Secondly, of what they want to defend and why they want to defend it in case of emergency--when they have no other alternative. They must know what form of life, what material and ideological values they wish to preserve.

Therefore, security is not at all a mere category of military thinking. Our political stability, our democratic stability, our stability as a state of justice, our social network, our economic and social prosperity, our basic liberal system: All these are supporting pillars of our security; they are inalienable supporting pillars of our security.

It is therefore appropriate for our party to give this year, 1980, and our fall election program the motto "security for Germany" and, in so doing, to place essential predications concerning domestic policy, economic policy, financial policy, and social policy under this motto, so as to include them in a broad interpretation of our national security.

We all feel that the background against which peace and security have been discussed and studied these past weeks, the background against which I must speak here and now as well, has darkened over the past several months.

There are several hotbeds of alarm, causes of concern: the taking of hostages in Tehran, which has triggered a critical aggravation of tensions at least between the United States and Iran; the military intervention, the occupation of Afghanistan by Soviet troops; the continuing tensions in the Middle East where the negotiations on an autonomy arrangement for Palestine have been deadlined for late May; and, finally--and God knows not the least important even if I now list it in last place--the danger of another relapse into a large-scale, worldwide arms race between East and West in view of the present stagnation of SALT II, in view of the refusal of the Soviet Union to date to negotiate on the limitation of medium-range weapons.

I am positive that the world powers and their leaders do not want war. But I am afraid that they do not have at present an adequate war-preventive strategy; at least such a strategy is not discernible to the world public as adequate. And I am afraid that the two world powers currently are not talking frankly enough with each other about their fundamental objectives, their fundamental interests.

If you wish to defuse conflicts and avoid future conflicts, if you wish to prevent an escalation of existing conflicts, then it is necessary for all parties involved to be prepared and capable--both are not the same--to put themselves into the position of understanding the interests, psychology and realm of ideas of their antagonists. This is what is most important.

With regard to its SS-20 missile armament, the Soviet Union over the past 2 1/2 years has obviously been incapable of adequately putting itself into the sphere of interests of the opposite side--our Western or West European side. Nor has the Soviet Union been capable, obviously, of imagining how strongly hurt more than 100 nations of the world would feel by the invasion of Afghanistan. I shall refrain from citing examples--it is my impression--of the West leaving something to be desired in its understanding of Soviet interests.

Practical steps for conflict management can emerge only from the appreciation of the interests of the other, only from weighing them--a very complex, hard to describe structure of weighings that are different in each situation.

Practical steps toward conflict management will do no good unless both sides want them. Practical steps toward conflict management are of eminent significance for the preservation and stabilization of peace in the world at large. That applies this year just as it did last year and perhaps as it will even more so next year, in 1981.

Immanuel Kant wrote that peace is not a natural state but must be instituted anew time and again, not in the sense of a basic document but in the meaning of daily work--from Monday through Saturday and even on Sunday--and sometimes inveritable legwork which never reaches the light of public attention--except perhaps 30 years later when the archives are opened and the historians write about it. The instituting of peace, the daily instituting of peace will not be attained solely by public speeches and congresses like this one here. But it emerges as a result of daily activity, not only on the part of the most responsible people of the states involved, but down to the last person--I repeat myself--and into the soul of one's own people whose moral orientation toward peace is an important precondition for those in government to succeed in making conflicts manageable. Those bearing responsibility for political action, those who must take action, naturally have a number of instruments and institutions at their disposal; at the moment, a number of very tested instruments and institutions. For us, I need not cite for you, first of all, the North Atlantic alliance as one of these institutions; I need not tell you that in the world situation of these decades, in the world situation of the second half of the 20th Century, it is the alliance with which we are affiliated which alone can ensure a balance of military forces, a balance which is indispensable for the maintenance of peace--indispensable but, by itself, not yet sufficient for the preservation of peace.

At the federal level party congress in Berlin a few months ago, we Social Democrats conducted a long discussion in this context, and we also adopted a resolution that had been carefully prepared, a resolution which addresses the point I am talking about: "For the sake of safeguarding peace in Europe it is necessary to preserve the political and strategic unity of the North Atlantic alliance under the leadership of the United States of America." I am grateful that Alfons Pawelczyk and Herbert Wehner, as I have heard, have greatly emphasized during this congress the instrumental relationship with the United States.

Second, we Social Democrats said in Berlin that the combination of defense capability and detente policy must remain the basis of security policy.

Third, the stabilization of the military balance, if possible on a lower level, remains the central task of security policy.

And, fourth, we included the North-South dimension; if I had enough time today I would go into more detail about the North-South dimension regarding the problem of peace.

Fifth, we included in Berlin the peace-ensuring functions of the United Nations.

We Germans have reached the point at which we can make considerable claims for exerting influence. We have also practiced our influence, legitimized by the long, long years during which we lived up to our commitments toward the common alliance. The fulfillment of the commitments resulting from the community of the alliance continues to be in our national interest and in the national interests of our alliance partners, in the future as well. And I am inclined to believe it is also in the interest of those who are living in Eastern Europe across the border from us. It is in the interest of peace.

We must not overrate our importance in the world, but we do know that the German contribution to the alliance, to the extent it involves the military contribution, is essentially made toward the ground forces. Outward expression of this may be figures that could be cited: 230,000 young men are called up every year for a service of 15 months; 500,000 well-trained, well-equipped soldiers are strong reserves as a result of general conscription; our defense budget for financing all this has been increased by 3 percent a year since 1970--by a "real" 3 percent, as I must say lest I be misunderstood by some polemicist. We shall also increase it in the future.

In a private talk within a different circle of friends from other countries, I said yesterday that the defense budget definitely is an important matter within the framework of the West's security policy. Yet what is even more important is, first, to have men who know what they are defending and who are also inwardly prepared to do it; and, second, that these men be given decent and proficient officers and noncommissioned officers and, third, decent training. Fourth, it is true that they also need arms and budget funds. All this requires sacrifices in terms of funds, time and strength, and in training time if this interrupts a vocational career or training period. All this is necessary, and we do make these sacrifices. By we I mean our young people, our young men and society at large which raises the funds. At present we are making these sacrifices in a state of anxiety. I would like to make a very clear difference between anxiety and fear. I will return to this later.

A few weeks ago, on 5 February, the French president and I, in very clear terms, jointly underscored the role of the alliance, of the defense alliance, in view of the Afghanistan crisis; we did so in a joint statement. We said at the time: "The present crisis tends to unleash a process which gradually could yield most serious consequences, even if this were not intended." And we added that it is the concern of us both, of France and Germany, to aver the loyalty of the two countries to the Atlantic alliance under these circumstances as well as the determination of both to abide by its commitments.

In view of the world situation, this alliance, and also its military organization NATO, constitutes an inalienable link between the security of North America and the security of Western Europe. All of us know that we cannot have military balance on our continent without the presence of the Americans in Europe, without the strategic engagement of the United States on behalf of Europe; that, otherwise, without the United States and Canada, we could not have a balance of the military forces existing in Europe, exerting influence on Europe, and becoming effective on Europe.

Yet, as much as it is correct and fundamental to say that reliable peace and consequently detente cannot be achieved in the long run without balance, it is equally necessary to realize that balance alone is not yet sufficient for detente, but that the will for conciliation of interests [ausgleich] and the ability to compromise must be added--the ability to compromise on the part of all parties involved, too!

In bringing up our young people, and also in educating adults in political discussions, it is necessary for us to pay more attention to the virtue of compromising. This is necessary for the preservation of internal peace--you need not say this to a trade union member--and it is indispensable for the preservation of external peace. Anyone not able to practice compromise or not desirous of it is unfit for external peace.

The Soviet side, and also some other sides, now and then certifies to us or imply that, in the present situation, we ought to choose between the continuation of detente policy in Europe and solidarity with North America. These are sham alternatives. People talking that way have failed to comprehend how so-called detente has been made at all possible in Europe during the past 10 or 12 years. This cooperation between East and West in Europe has been possible only because of the alliance with North America because this alliance has been capable of creating and preserving the balance. The U.S. contribution and its visible expression by the presence of 250,000 or 300,000 soldiers here in Europe, and a number of no as tangible North American contributions in trategy and policies were and remain the prerequisite of detente in Europe. The Soviet leadership has long recognized this military and political presence of North America in all forms. Let me remind you of the results of the CSCE conference, the first great climax in Helsinki 5 years ago today: a policy, a conference, an agreement, a document on security and cooperation in Europe in which Canada and the United States naturally participated just as they have been participating in the MBFR negotiations in Vienna.

The soldiarity within such an alliance, be it between the European partners alone or be it with North America on the whole, cannot be managed in simple terms all the time. I have heard idle talk about a NATO crisis since 1953 when I was elected a member of the Bundestag for the first time and worked in the relevant committee--I believe at that time it was still called the committee for questions connected with the increase in Allied troops; later it was probably called the security committee, and again later its name became the defense committee. So in my parliamentary work over a quarter of a century I have heard or read the catchwords, "NATO crisis," with the regularity of ecclesiastical holidays. One should therefore not succumb to inner despair over it unnecessarily. But it is necessary to take every difficulty regarding mutual understanding within the alliance seriously. Each demands to be taken seriously for, after all, each must be overcome.

But, please, one should not be plunged into apocalyptic visions on that account. This should not happen on this side of the Atlantic or, please, on the other. Both sides realize that we can pursue our security interests only jointly. Our North American friends also are aware of that.

Both our North American friends and we Europeans know, and this should not be overlooked either over here or over there, that we are allied beyond the security interests through many, many other interests, that beyond that we are allied with each other in a very basic way--through common, fundamental values. In debating these basic values, some people forget or overlook the fact that the phrasing of the basic rights, for example, in the basic German law of 1949--after a certain bridging function exercised by St. Paul's Church 100 years earlier--more strongly stems from the spiritual tradition of the American Declaration of Independence and the American Revolution than perhaps from the French Revolution. This needs to be properly understood: We have common principles and basic values which ally North American with us--common basic principles of the democratic way of life. We share the belief in the inalienability of human rights.

It was not always the case that all states, all state leaders and all governments of the North Atlantic alliance equally felt committed to the basic values of democracy. For me, it is profoundly satisfying and in a way is also an additional guarantee of security that we have achieved a situation in which, for our alliance, an equal spiritual, moral, democratic basic attitude is fundamentally obligatory for all alliance partners.

I would like to look back upon the second half of the sixties when the term detente policy was not yet a standard phrase either in the positive sense of the word or--as some people would like to have it today--in the deprecatory sense of the word, when the word hardly appeared. In 1967 the alliance assembled together some wise men on the suggestion of the then incumbent Belgian Foreign Minister Pierre Harmel. What then emerged from their thinking gained significance under the title, Harmel Report. I would like to quote a few passages from that report.

Later on, in the annals of history, the report will gain even more significance than was realized then and is realized now. Among other things, the report says that the alliance is a dynamic, vigorous organization which constantly adapts to changing conditions. Thus, confidence was expressed here in the alliance's ability to adapt. Later on in the Harmel Report you find the whole philosophy of detente policy once again which I will sum up in two passages: establishing balance and cooperation on the basis of balance with the opposite part of Europe.

This security policy, which reaches beyond military security and which was conceived for the first time in the Harmel Report--the practical cooperation with the other side on the basis of the maintenance of military balance--was really the element which provided people in Europe, in the West as well as in Eastern Europe, with that increasing feeling of calm--the calming awareness of a relaxation of tension. The increasing feeling of being secure is what has allowed the regimes in East European states, depending on their respective national peculiarities, traditions and history, to permit developments which would have been impossible, inconceivable in these states in the fifties.

It is this encompassing security policy which on the whole gives people here in the West the awareness even today when anxieties are spreading, especially among people in Eastern Europe, of being immune to surprise situations such as those that occurred in Afghanistan--even though some people are fearful. But I say this: We must counteract fear, but we must take anxieties seriously. It is thanks to the comprehensive security policy of the alliance that fear is not spreading in our country even if the international situation is growing more difficult.

It is thanks to the comprehensive security policy along the lines of the Harmel Report that a climate has emerged here during the years--especially during the seventies--which favors a circumspect policy, a policy of commonsense. The fact that such a climate prevails in which a Federal Government is acting this or that way for the sake of cool commonsense, but also neglects to do this or that and refuses to be driven into a policy which, for example, seeks to adapt to the feelings and emotions of public opinion, this fact alone constitutes an essential contribution, a very essential partial element which is necessary in other states, too, for defusing the present crisis.

It goes without saying that all in this alliance can handle the same missions. We have recalled the catchword of the division of labor; a distribution of roles has been a foregone conclusion in the alliance at all times. Some alliance partners have never assumed a role on the high seas; others have never assumed a nuclear role, should not do so, and do not want to do so. There has been a division of jobs all the time in political respects as well. On the whole, by purusing different tasks, we are a common team after all. Division of labor, by the way, is an ancient invention--if I remember correctly its theoretical justification is 200 years old and comes from either Adam Smith or David Ricardo, or both. Thus, the advantages of a division of labor has been known since the 18th Century. It is known that it is advantageous for all not to have everyone doing the same thing, but rather to have one doing this and another doing that job--provided both fit together.

This also holds true for the political field, and it goes without saying that this applies to the economic sphere where this category of division of labor first emerged. Just look at the example of Turkey. What we have been doing for our alliance partner Turkey in the past few years and in 1979, especially in 1980, is a veritable showpiece example of us doing something where others cannot adequately take action.

But let me get back to the Harmel Report. It also said--and I quote verbatim--that "the road to peace and stability in Europe is based particularly on the constructive action of the alliance in the interest of detente."

The text of 1967. From this logical conclusion was drawn--again verbatim--"each ally should fully play their part in bringing about an improvement in relations with the Soviet Union and the countries of Eastern Europe."

Some polemicists today pretend that detente is a malicious invention of Willy Brandt or Egon Bahr. No: What is correct is that the Social Democratic leadership of that time and the later leadership of this state, the Federal Government after 1979, acted in full harmony with the common philisophy of the alliance accepted in the Harmal Report.

It was in compliance with, and implementation of, a commonly prepared philisophy of the alliance--at the moment I am using the term philisophy in the American sense--in compliance with a joint concept that the Federal Government made its contributions with its Ostpolitik and its policy on Germany. The most important contribution was, of course, the negotiations between the United States and the Soviet Union on the limitation of strategic arms which were opened between Nixon and Brezhnev in the late sixties. What has a certain significance for the relationship between the two world powers is the Quadripartite Agreement on Berlin, which is of immense significance to us but also to the relationship between the two world powers. After all, Berlin had been one of the traditional danger points between them for more than 2 decades--since the Berlin blockade, since the late forties.

All this has brought lasting advantages for the entire West, but also for the people in Eastern Europe. And it ultimately is the reason why Central Europe, Europe at large, is not a hotbed of crisis, and that the access routes to, and the ties and connections with Berlin are unharmed despite the critical developments in the Middle East today, in Afghanistan, in the Persian Gulf.

We do not wish to call into question what has been accomplished here in Europe because of the international hotbeds of danger of which I spoke. This is not just my own opinion. It is also the opinion of the U.S. President, a point on which we have been agreed not just since 5 March--the most recent time we had a chance to talk calmly and carefully with each other--but for a long time. This meeting in Washington on 5 March merely outwardly documented in a joint statement what we have known about each other all along. It says verbatim: "The chancellor and the President reiterated the determination of their countries to mitigate tensions in the world. They were agreed that it is desirable in the present time of aggravated tensions to preserve the framework of East-West relations which was established over 2 decades ago. This was said less than 2 months ago, after all the present hotbeds of danger had already emerged into full view.

I recall this because it is alleged in some commentaries in our country and outside that a basic difference of opinion exists on this question between America and us, as if we would have to make a choice, so to speak. I repeat: American-European or German-American solidarity. On the one side and, on the other side, a continuation of what is called detente policy is not an alternative: Both things much rather belong together.

I have said already that our German policy--the most important aim of which is to maintain the substance of the German nation despite the German partition--that our German policy is part of our peace policy.

Our German policy has many other aspects and facets which I will not deal with today in handling this issue at the Congress. But I want to recall that in late March we had a debate in the Bundestag, as we do every year about the state of our nation. As every other year the federal chancellor reported on the state of the nation in our divided country, pointing out that still much needs to be achieved as long as there is a wall and as long as violence takes place on the border. And then some commentators said or wrote later that the opposition was very puzzled that so much was reported about intra-German matters; actually it expected that a debate on the international situation would be the central issue--the Bavarian minister president expected that. He was "caught standing on the wrong foot," I have read. We will leave that as it may be, but we want to use it as a reason for making one thing very clear: We Social Democrats, we, the social-liberal coalition, we the Federal Government will keep an eye on all the confusing world political situations regarding the real interest of one German nation. This we are required to do.

We know that we can pursue our German interests only together with our partners in the alliance, particularly for historical and moral reasons with France, and particularly with the United States for reasons I have been hinting at. We are doing that. We will hold to this.

I wanted to talk of certain worries. Some people have held it against me, but most have agreed when last weekend I brought to the attention of the public an article by an American scientist which is worth reading. He wrote in FOREIGN AFFAIRS on the analogy of the current world situation and that of June or early July of 1914.

I have taken the liberty to say that, unfortunately, this was not completely wrong. I have noted everything that is completely different from that time. I will not pursue it now because it will waste time.

I have pointed out that the process at present is developing much slower than in June or in the first or second week of July 1914--that the process today takes months and maybe even years. I have pointed out that the structures of power today are different than they were then.

I have pointed out that, in contrast to then, none of the present leaders of the big powers--there are just two world powers today whereas there were five European powers then--are prepared to run the risk of war. That may have been somewhat different in 1914. At that time none of the governments really wanted the war (there may have been persons maybe in Petersburg, Berlin or other capitals who would have liked to have a campaign). The general will of the leadership of those five European states was not aimed at world war. They did not have the slightest idea of what could be touched off by world war, what it would mean for the peoples, for the states of Europe.

Today the people have a much clearer idea of that--the ruling people and the peoples themselves--of what war could mean today. Today military calculations do not play a prevailing, a main role among the governments, but they still play a role and that is probably how it ought to be. We must watch out that the role does not become too great. The Soviet Union particularly must watch out that the role of military calculation does not become too great in its leadership.

But one thing is still comparable despite all this, namely: It does not seem completely inconceivable that one could become involved in a grave conflict without really knowing it.

I fail to see the clearly recognizable, convincing strategy aimed at avoiding war in the present world situation. This is something that worries me. This is what makes me, the Federal Government and many others here in the hall ask ourselves what we can contribute toward avoiding further escalation.

After all, I have said that nobody believes that discontinuing solidarity would contribute to stopping a possible escalation or curtailing it. But what can we contribute within our solidarity--imbedded in it as we are and as we want to be, and as we will remain in our own interests--what can we contribute?

Certainly we can contribute the idea applied to the many hotbeds of danger I have mentioned--that one must force oneself to carefully recognize the interests of the others, that one should put himself in the other's shoes and look at the considerations, aims and fears of the others involved in the game. That pertains, for example, to all who are involved in the Tehran hostage tragedy. I would like to see, and I will repeat it once more, the Soviet Union in a clear way put itself in the position of the American nation whose people have been involved there for almost half a year now.

I would also like to see us, the Western parties involved--and I believe that in the West we Germans have experienced so much with regard to the taking of hostages, the temptation to react and the reactions we have dismissed due to cool reason which has won out over emotion--us in the West who suffer together with the Americans, I would like to see us in the West put ourselves into the position of various forces in Tehran, put ourselves in the position and see the interests in the neighbors of Iran, in the position of the other states of the region when we study possibilities for solving the hostage drama in a positive way. Speaking here as the federal chancellor I do not have to make concrete public suggestions. If I were a private citizen, it would be simpler for me.

One must equally put oneself in the position of all who are involved when it comes to ending the Afghanistan intervention. One must put oneself in the position of Pakistan, for example. One must know what the Baluchi want who live on both sides--in Iran as well as in Pakistan, and maybe also partially in Afghanistan. One must know about the worries and interests of the Indians in this connection. One must put oneself in the position of the other Asian states. One must put oneself in the position of the Islamic states.

One must put oneself in the position of the Soviet Union if one wants to solve this problem. We cannot ignore the fact that the Soviet Union has gravely violated international law. It must get out of Afghanistan! It does not belong there.

But we also know that none of us could or want to oust the Soviet Union out of there with military power. It is quite obvious that it will leave only if it makes up its mind to do so. Consequently, one must effect this decision. In order to do that, measures of diplomatic and political pressure are necessary as well as other means which will permit it to maintain in a tolerable way what it thought it was pursuing with regard to greatly exaggerated security interests when it marched in, and what it has invested in the way of its own prestige interests. On such consideration, for example, it based the suggestion which would be a partial element of a solution--the suggestion of the nine foreign ministers of the European Community that Afghanistan's neighboring states and the world powers should make statements on their own behalf which would be guarantees for the future inviolability, or as one calls it the territorial integrity, for noninterference in the internal affairs of Afghanistan; in short, for the sovereignty of Afghanistan and its nonaligned status. This suggestion, which was not immediately understood by all, was an attempt to contribute an initial important element to a concept that would take into consideration the interests of the other side.

Those who saw how the roughly 40 Islamic states met in the Pakistani capital of Islamabad shortly after the invasion, shortly after the vote in the United Nations--condemning in even sharper tones than in the United Nations the invasion of Afghanistan, but simultaneously condemning the continuous military occupation of the West Bank of the Jordan River--will recognize how important the Arab states are, for example, and how important it is to put oneself in their position and their interests when Afghanistan is involved.

One must not ignore the fact that there are not merely many Arab political leaders but also many people in Arab nations--on the street, as one says--many, many Arabs in the world who because of their ways of thinking and traditions consider the continuously unsolved Palestinian problem as a greater danger than what has happened in Tehran or Afghanistan. One cannot simply dispose of all these people and states. If one wants to win them over one must also muster understanding for their problems. One must help to solve their problems. The Arabs will not let themselves be pushed around from without; they accept that as little as we would accept it from anybody.

We Germans need to contribute to a situation in which our friends, our partners in the West, our counterparts or teammates--I would like to use both words, our treaty partners, our neighbors in the East as well--all of us will understand the interests of all of those in the Middle East who are involved.

For us Germans, this field--the Near East, the West Bank, the settlements policy, autonomy, right to self-determination, Israel's right to exist and to live within secure, recognized borders-- is a problem that is particularly difficult to handle in view of our recent past which I will recall only with the key word Auschwitz. We Germans have specific reason for maintaining particular restraint for a long time. Our allies, friends and teammates do not have such reasons, but they must put themselves in the position of those involved with regard to the Middle East problem.

The fourth point of danger which must be taken seriously is--as I said from the beginning--the danger of a new arms race. I have pointed out several times--which the American President has also done recently, so we are again in harmony there; not merely in solidarity but even in agreement with a view to important judgements on an important matter--that SALT II must be put into force. It is a most decisive instrument for maintaining a policy of balance in a fatally important field and on its various levels--at least for the years for which the treaty will be valid.

SALT I and SALT II are instruments of a policy of balance. The results are approximate parity in the special fields which are covered by the treaties. You know that neither conventional arms at sea nor conventional arms on the ground or in the air or many other things--the possibility of satellite war--are not involved in SALT I or SALT II. SALT is a sector dealing with intercontinental, long-range strategic arms.

But if this instrument, this policy of balance, were lost, it would be bad. It would also be bad if negotiations on medium-range arms did not begin. I am still certain that they will begin if the many critical aggravations in various regions of the world do not cause the atmosphere to deteriorate decisively in the coming years.

I dealt with this a few days ago and I just want to recall it by merely mentioning this. The double decision made by the North Atlantic Council in December was touched off by the fact that the Soviet Union for 3 years has produced, deployed and introduced a rapidly increasing number of medium-range arms--the SS-20 and the Backfire bomber.

Every one of these SS-20 missiles--in contrast to their predecessors--has three nuclear warheads which can hit three different targets simultaneously.

Every one of them can be reloaded two, three or four times. They are mobile, and it is therefore almost impossible to eliminate them. We have pointed out to the Soviet side, also on the occasion of the visit of Leonid Brezhnev 2 years ago, that this is danger and that this has to change the balance if it goes on for a few years. I was under the impression that the Soviet general secretary understood this. It was said to him not merely by the Germans. At that time, in May 1978, a far-reaching joint statement was issued which was signed by Brezhnev and me. An important part of it was the joint statement that approximate parity in all arms, in all categories of arms, was desired. It was absolutely clear that this also included Eurostrategic arms, medium-range arms.

Since then the Soviet armament in this field has progressed while nothing comparable exists on the Western side. This imbalance touched off one part of the NATO decision made in December; the other part was--and we considered it particularly significant regarding the reasons for a policy of balance as I mentioned before--the invitation to the Soviet Union to negotiate on a bilateral limitation of such arms with the aim of achieving limitation treaties similar to SALT I and SALT II.

Negotiations on Eurostrategic arms are not under way so far. The Soviet Union has so far not been prepared to begin negotiations despite the fact thatthis was twice offered by the Western negotiating partner, the United States, with all seriousness and at a high level.

The Soviet Union has thus far said that NATO should revoke its decisions: It has been saying for the last few weeks that NATO should suspend its decisions--thereafter it would be prepared to immediately negotiate on medium-range arms. Naturally that is not possible. It would mean that, in addition to the lead the Soviet Union already has in this field, it would achieve an additional lead every week--every week a new SS-20 missile is added in the East which is reloadable several times since every individual missile has three warheads--but nothing would happen in the West. That is not a tolerable basis for negotiations. In such a starting position for negotiations the balance in the long run could be changed in a most doubtful way to the disadvantage of Western Europe.

Since it will take the West until 1983 anyway to put out the first modern Western medium-range arms--we knew this when we made our decision in Brussels in December--and because these arms will by far not have the range of the Soviet missiles--they are in part still being developed and, at any rate, are not even being produced yet--since at least 3 years will pass until they will be deployed in the West, it is desirable that no deployment take place on both sides for 3 years and that one should start negotiations immediately--regardless of whether SALT II is ratified or not.

I have made suggestions in this respect, suggestions I remind you of but which will not change the situation of the world--I am neither ambitious nor arrogant in this respect. But these suggestions take into consideration the interests of the other side. I said that one must also put oneself in their position; one must take seriously their highest interests.

In the meantime, various propagandists in Moscow have rejected these suggestions publicly. That should not be a reason to give up pursuing them. If we were to give up everything that has been rejected by somebody else, we would not be sitting here today. Then there would not be a social-liberal coalition; then there would not have been a Social Democratic Federal Chancellor Brandt and no Schmidt; then many things would not exist which we have in fact achieved, neither in domestic nor foreign policies.

If the other party first says no, it is no reason at all to shelve something. Insistence also is part of a peace policy: the continuous drilling of thick planks!

I do not want to discuss in more detail today the other fields of arms policy because of lack of time. But I should point out that, despite all the concern, one ought to feel positive elements are also recognizable. I think of Gierek's suggestions in connection with other suggestions coming from Eastern directions which coincide in a certain way with the French suggestions on a general European disarmament conference. I have in mind that de facto the Soviet Union and the United States have so far done nothing that could violate the SALT II agreement they reached although it has not been ratified.

I still consider it a shortcoming that the American side has clearly said that it will treat the agreement as if it were ratified whereas no such statement exists so far on the Soviet side. The Soviet side has also so far observed the SALT II agreement. I have doubts, however, that prior to a ratification it will adhere to it by scrapping some of its missiles which it committed itself to if SALT II became legally valid.

But so far the Soviets have not violated SALT II. I consider that a positive fact which I would like to make the public aware of.

I also consider as positive that Moscow, like we here in the West, we in Bonn, and we in Washington, is continuing to seriously pursue the CSCE followup conference in Madrid for this fall. Maybe a result of that meeting will be a commission for a general European disarmament conference which has been mentioned by Gierek and particularly by my friend Giscard d'Estaing. So, it is not only negative points that are visible in the overall picture of international relations.

We will have to watch out in all of this that the term solidarity is not misunderstood. I want to start out from political solidarity in our great political party in order to derive appropriate conclusions with regard to solidarity in an alliance. These are two social structures which cannot be compared--a political party and an alliance. Historical comparisons are always lame, and yet one can learn something from them.

Political solidarity in our party does not mean that one person comes or that 15 people come together and say: This is the way it must be done, and 1 million members "will sing hallelujah! This is the way it will be done." Since the Social Democratic Party came into existence it has had an inner solidarity, a cohesion which has prevailed through two world wars, through oppression in Nazi times and persecution. But this solidarity always included considerable quarrels about what was correct and what was useful. Solidarity does not mean silent acceptance of something that has been decided by the other. It presupposes the stating of one's differing opinions, if one has any. It is the duty of solidarity to say to somebody, if one believes that he does not understand something completely: Something is missing here, or something is placed wrongly here. Or to tell him: I would do that differently. This is also valid for our alliance.

People who do not understand much about solidarity misunderstand such discussions--in our party, for example--always as a sign of a forthcoming split. With the regularity of Social Democratic federal party congresses this is always predicted by silly commentators, by a certain part of the German press. It has not happened and it will not happen. The same is true about solidarity in the alliance. Only such people who do not trust each other sufficiently need to be careful about saying what they really think to each other. This is why it has been so difficult for many years to achieve talks between Kohl and Strauss.

People who are certain of each other and of their mutual loyalty, who are certain of their mutual solidarity, do not need to have such fears. They need to give each other mutual help with regard to insight, approach and opinion. All this is not a curtailment of loyalty and solidarity; it is only possible on the basis of loyalty and solidarity. And it is necessary so as to preserve solidarity for the future.

Strong gestures, martial meetings, firm speeches or excited actions are not needed. One much rather needs understanding of one another. One must always try to put oneself in the position of one's friends and partners, and not only in the position of one's adversaries. That pertains to both sides of the Atlantic: I, for example, have a very deep understanding for the tragic Tehran dilemma of Jimmy Carter because of my experience with the murders of Buback and Ponto; the many persons in the entourage of Dr Schleyer; the experience in connection with his kidnapping and his murder 6 or 7 weeks later; the highjacking of 90 German tourists who had visited Mallorca and who wanted to fly home to Frankfurt but who were highjacked instead to Rome, the Arabian Peninsula with a stopover in Aden and Mogadischu. I at least have very, very great understanding for this pressure on one to act.

But all of you have experienced that yourselves. And if you examine yourselves, you also will see that you have a great deal of understanding for the bitterness of the Americans in connection with the kidnapping of their hostages in Tehran and the treatment of this crime by persons and authorities of this country who pretend to be the official top echelon of the state. We can understand only too well the feelings of the Americans. And the Americans need to feel that we understand it. Over there there are many who, like us in the common discussion round we established at that time--also including political leaders of the opposition at the federal and laender levels--have examined every idea, even the most exotic one, which means ideas that were not obvious at all, which were very far-fetched and maybe very dubious.

But we seriously examined every idea, regardless of how exotic it may have been, during the kidnapping of Schleyer and later on during the highjacking of the plane with its 90 passengers.

Many of you in your talks have examined very exotic ideas which, if you were honest, were not in accordance with the basic principles of the basic German law.

Many thousands of Germans thought about such ideas and the temptation was enormous, if one but had the power, to get Hanns-Martin Schleyer out alive even by violating the law and the Constitution if need be. I recall the pressure under which we lived and the temptation we withstood and how much luck we had in freeing the 90 people in Mogadishu, in spite of all the bad luck we had.

I recall all this in view of some critical, thoughtless and arrogant statements which have been voiced with regard to the action of the American nation, the action of the American leadership, since the taking of hostages in Tehran, which has lasted for 170 days now--almost half a year.

This is not a plea for action that has not been thought through. At that time we forced ourselves with regard to our problems--be it the Stockholm embassy or the Schleyer and Lufthansa double crisis--to make rational considerations. We had friends who helped us. We were helped by the opposition. We recognized that. We have never tried to shift responsibility onto somebody else. But I can tell you I will not forget as long as I live the responsiblity we felt, the awareness that whatever we did or did not do could also mean guilt for us.

Therefore, I appeal to those who make public comments, who speak publicly--be they politicians or journalists--to please put yourselves in the position of our American friends. This is a drama, a tragedy which cannot have the edge taken out of it through agitation, just as that would not be possible with regard to the other hotbeds of crisis I have mentioned.

If we want to reduce the dangers which are perhaps not being totally erroneously compared with the dangers of June 1914, we need solidarity among our friends, understanding among friends including ourselves. We need the solidarity of the alliance, the strength and ability of the alliance as we have unfolded and developed it through our own means for 25 years. But we equally need considered reason and predictability for this alliance and for the political leaders in the individual states of the alliance, and for the governments which jointly form the alliance.

We need an outstanding will for peace. I want to devote at least one sentence to say that if the will for peace is supposed to rule, if it is supposed to be the predominant principle, then this also includes the will for equalization between the North and the South.

I would like to summarize: We have worked out in the course of the years a modern concept in the Federal Republic, a security and peace policy concept that can be applied to the present situation. It takes into consideration a great number of elements. It contains a great number of factors--not only of a military character. This concept, which basically was outlined as early as in the sixties, was a good foundation for our daily political work; it is a good starting basis for future political work.

We have also achieved good results which form foundations for the future: significant contributions to the preservation of balance; important contributions to containment [eindaemmung]; and to the limitation of political tension in Europe; and significant contributions of a conceptional character for the containment of tension in the world. We have achieved many positive things with regard to our neighbors, particularly the German Democratic Republic, and really to the advantage of the people living here, to the advantage of the people living in Berlin.

We have made a real contribution to the preservation of the national substance. We have made a real contribution to cooperation in Europe. We have made a real contribution to detente in the world. We will also do so in the future.

In doing so we will know that all this is possible only if one can rely on balance. In other words, this will work only if we are able and willing in an emergency to defend our own interests, also militarily. All of this belongs together. He who does not want to have defense or who cannot have it, cannot achieve detente policy either.

HELMUT KOHL OPPOSES CHANCELLOR'S PLANNED VISIT TO USSR

LD221552 Hamburg DPA in German 1447 GMT 22 Apr 80

[Text] Bonn--Helmut Kohl, leader of the opposition in the Bundestag, has come out against Chancellor Helmut Schmidt's planned visit to Moscow. Kohl told the CDU/CSU parliamentary group in Bonn today that, after Schmidt's analysis of the present world situation given at the recent SPD congress on security policy, he had to issue a strong warning against the visit. With an assessment of the situation such as that given by Schmidt, a German federal chancellor would do more harm than good to the interests of the Western alliance and of the Federal Republic, too, with talks in Moscow. Kohl said that only direct contact between the leading statesmen of the United States and the Soviet Union could help solve the present crisis.

Kohl accused the chancellor of adopting a cold, critical posture towards the United States, like the majority in the SPD. "When the chancellor reproaches both world powers equally for their failure to produce a war-avoidance strategy, he completely ignores their unequal share in the causes of the present world crisis." It is equal to dangerously playing down the offensive and aggressive power policy of the Soviet Union when Schmidt compares Moscow's arming with medium-range missiles--which upset the balance--and the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan with mistakes that the West has made.

CSU FACTION LEADER SAYS SCHMIDT HAS FALLEN FOR SOVIET 'BAIT'

LD221550 Hamburg DPA in German 1338 GMT 22 Apr 80

[Text] Bonn--Friedrich Zimmermann, leader of the CSU Bundestag Group, believes Chancellor Schmidt's visit to Moscow planned for sometime this year means he has fallen for the Soviet Union's bait. In an interview in Wednesday's edition of DIE WELT, Zimmermann states: "With its invitation to Helmut Schmidt, Moscow laid out a limed twig and the chancellor promptly landed on it." It is the Soviets' intention to drive a wedge between the Federal Republic and the United States. The fact that Schmidt allows himself to be misused for this and repudiates the NATO counterarming decision is a foretaste of what he himself is prepared to pay for the trip, Zimmermann says.

Zimmermann said in the interview that Schmidt had become an unpredictable factor for the Americans. No interpretation of his latest statements on the question of closing the arms gap could conceal the fact that, if Schmidt's proposals were implemented, 200 Soviet medium-range missiles, which the West could oppose with nothing comparable, would remain. The United States would have to spend billions on developing counterarms without knowing whether their German allies would allow the countermeasures to be deployed. "This is a security risk for German-American relations, for German interests in general, and thus for Berlin in particular."

PRC'S WANG YAODING URGES GREATER IMPORTS FROM CHINA

LD221640 Hamburg DPA in German 1401 GMT 22 Apr 80

[Text] Bonn--The Chinese want the Germans to increase purchases from China. The President of the China Council for the Promotion of International Trade (CCPIT), Wang Yaoding, said today during a visit to the Association of German Industry and Trade (DIHT) in Bonn that trade between the two countries is not a "one-way street."

Wang Yaoding, who has the rank of minister and is very influential in Chinese economic policy, made it plain in his talks with representatives of German industry and trade that in realizing its plans for the industrialization and modernization of the country, China is interested in deepening economic relations with the Federal Republic. However, imports and exports must grow in equally. The criteria for further foreign credits is his country's ability to maintain its repayments.

Representatives of German industry and trade at the meeting also expressed interest in an expansion of economic relations with Beijing. DIHT President Otto Wolff von Amerongen said that the Federal Republic has high expectations regarding the large Chinese reserves of raw materials and energy. The technically highly developed German economy can help to exploit these reserves. Wolff also welcomed the open attitude of the Chinese Government in permitting the use of Western capital.

MINISTER DISAPPOINTED WITH U.S. STAND ON IMF SPECIAL FUND

LD221632 Hamburg DPA in German 1310 GMT 22 Apr 80

[Text] Bonn--Federal Finance Minister Hans Matthoefer made it clear in a talk with journalists in Bonn today that the Federal Government is disappointed that in IMF interim committee consultations this week in Hamburg the special fund enabling conversion of dollar reserves into special drawing rights will probably not be set up because of a lack of readiness on the part of the Americans to accept burdens.

Matthoefer believes that establishing this account, into which surplus dollars can be deposited, is important in strengthening the role of the IMF in foreign exchange activities and offering the oil states a new investment opportunity for their money. He said that the Federal Government approves of the use of IMF gold for providing a guarantee for interest and value, but the United States, which so far has demonstrated no great readiness, also must accept burdens.

BRIEFS

ROAD AGREEMENT WITH YAR--Bonn--An agreement between the Federal Republic and the Yemen Arab Republic was signed in Bonn by State Secretary Guenther van Well of the Foreign Office and Yemen's minister of development, Ali Lutfi ath-Thawr, on maintenance of the road between Sana and Ta'izz. According to a Foreign Office spokesman today, the Federal Republic has so far provided DM150 million for this mountain road project. [Hamburg DPA in German 1030 GMT 16 Apr 80 LD]

ANDREY GROMYKO ARRIVES ON OFFICIAL VISIT 23 APR

LD231156 Paris Domestic Service in French 1100 GMT 23 Apr 80

[Text] Andrey Gromyko arrived in Paris at 1230. The Soviet Union's irremovable [as heard] foreign minister, is paying a 2-day working visit provided for within the framework of regular consultations between France and the Soviet Union. Gromyko will have a series of talks with Jean Francois-Poncet, and tomorrow he will meet Valery Giscard d'Estaing at the Elysee.

Both in Moscow and Paris the French-Soviet dialogue is considered very delicate, principally because of Afghanistan. And this visit by Gromyko to Paris is considered very important.

Jean Francois-Poncet, the foreign minister, intends to put precise questions to Gromyko, in particular what is the meaning now of the limited and temporary action of which Soviet Ambassador Chervonenko has spoken. Jean Francois-Poncet is interviewed in Luxembourg by Ralph Pinto and speaks about the talks:

[Begin Francois-Poncet recording] In fact I have things to say to Gromyko on what happened in Afghanistan which, as you know, we consider unacceptable. I have things to tell him on the measures and gestures which it seems to us desirable for the USSR to take if we want to see a climate of confidence reestablished in the world, which is a precondition for the development and pursuance of detente. [end recording]

Jean Francois-Poncet may also ask Gromyko what is the scope of the economic agreement which has just been signed between Tehran and Moscow. This agreement will enable Iran to obtain supplies from the north--from the Soviet Union--if the sea channels of the south are blocked by draconian Western sanctions.

FRANCOIS-PONCET COMMENTS ON INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENTS

EEC Anti-Iran Measures

LD230926 Paris Domestic Service in French 0600 GMT 23 Apr 80

[Summary] Foreign Minister Jean Francois-Poncet has commented on the measures adopted by the EEC foreign ministers against Iran:

[Begin Francois-Poncet recording] In fact we are giving a warning to Iran to show the extent to which Europe is concerned by the holding of the hostages. It is not a warning directed to the Iranian people or directed toward the Iranian Revolution, which we are not trying to fight or to contradict. It is simply to show how seriously we take the holding of the hostages. I hope that the measures we have taken, and which will apply only if the hostages are not freed, are capable of producing a positive effect. [end recording]

DER SPIEGEL Interview

DW221226 Hamburg DER SPIEGEL in German 21 Apr 80 pp 32-35

[Helmut Sorge and Dieter Wild undated interview with French Foreign Minister Jean Francois-Poncet at the Quai d'Orsay in Paris]

[Text] SPIEGEL: Mr Minister, the European summit, postponed from late March to late April, will be meeting amid the most serious crisis since World War II. Chancellor Schmidt has even said: "Unfortunately I cannot deem as entirely wrong an analogy with the situation of 1914." Do you think the situation is really so dangerous?

Francois-Poncet: I do not want to venture too far forward with historical comparisons. They are always ticklish. But if you do want to make comparisons, then I feel, like the chancellor, that the situation is similar to that of 1914 rather than to the time prior to World War II.

SPIEGEL: And why so?

Francois-Poncet: Because in my opinion there is no premeditated intention to bring about a war. But just like in the period preceding 1914, a process of misunderstandings and errors of interpretation might lead to a confrontation. Nevertheless, I believe that the comparison should not be pushed too far for the simple reason that there are nuclear weapons today.

SPIEGEL: The political communication between the two superpowers seems to have largely collapsed. How could that have happened?

Francois-Poncet: I do not think that the communication between the two superpowers is really interrupted. Yet, there were not as many contacts between them in the past several years as would have been desirable.

SPIEGEL: People in the Federal Republic are excitedly discussing the question of whether the motives of the USSR were predominantly of a defensive or of an offensive nature. What do you think about it?

Francois-Poncet: Probably both are applicable. But surely you cannot consider the dispatch of 100,000 soldiers over the border as a purely defensive action.

SPIEGEL: The British secretary for foreign and Commonwealth affairs, Lord Carrington, has suggested that Afghanistan be neutralized. Do you still see the least chance for the implementation of this plan?

Francois-Poncet: I do not believe that Lord Carrington proposed a "neutralization" of Afghanistan. The term "neutralization" was expressly rejected by the Community of the Nine at their meeting in Rome on 19 February. This would have aroused the impression as though a certain status was to be imposed on Afghanistan from outside, meaning the contrary of what the Nine had in mind and of what they meant when they spoke of a neutral Afghanistan extricated from the play of the powers.

SPIEGEL: What do you think ought to be done now?

Francois-Poncet: We believe that a normal situation will be restored only when the Afghan people can freely decide on their future. To begin with, this requires that the foreign troops be withdrawn. Secondly, it means that the great powers and the neighboring states undertake the necessary commitments so that Afghanistan, a nonaligned Islamic state, will not constitute either a threat or a temptation to anyone.

SPIEGEL: Do you believe that such a solution is still possible?

Francois-Poncet: I do not know. I am convinced that there are no other options from restoring the rights of the Afghan people and international peace. Consequently, it is necessary to adhere to this.

SPIEGEL: Americans and Europeans have failed to consult each other since the beginning of the crisis in the way they should have consulted each other. The Europeans lament the instability of Washington's policy, while the Americans charge the Europeans with simultaneously wanting to be asked for advance and to be led. What do you have to say about this charge by Washington?

Francois-Poncet: We have never asked the Americans to be led by them. Continuous consultations are being held between Washington and Paris, and I am not betraying any secret when I tell you that President Giscard d'Estaing and President Carter have frequent telephone conversations.

SPIEGEL: France especially, however, is considered a peculiar ally in Washington--an ally who is unreliable.

Francois-Poncet: We are the allies of the Americans, and we desire a powerful America. But we renounce neither our free judgment nor independent action.

SPIEGEL: The worldwide tension hit the European Community during a serious internal crisis. England is demanding a reduction of its contribution to the Community's budget by roughly DM4 billion. Among the EC states it is France, above all, which rejects such a significant cut. Could this conflict turn into a catastrophe for the Community?

Francois-Poncet: It is wrong to say that France alone is resisting Great Britain's wishes. The problem of the British contributions concerns all EC member states equally. There is no special French attitude. The reason is quite simple: Unlike other member states, France does not derive any advantages either from the Community's budget or from the common agricultural budget. The contributions which it pays into the Community fund, and the subsidies it receives, are balanced.

SPIEGEL: Do you mean to claim by this that money is not what matters to you?

Francois-Poncet: The current discussions in fact do not deal with money. What is involved is the future of the Community and its rules. What are behind the figures, you must know, are fundamental questions: In 1970 it was decided that the Community ought to have financial sources of its own for the purpose of financing the common policy. At the time they proceeded from subsidies by the states which were fixed annually to constantly flowing financial sources which belong to the Community and which are secure for it once and for all. This was decisive progress. So what is at stake is the question of whether this system can be maintained. France desires this in the interest of the Community and of Europe.

SPIEGEL: At the last European summit in Dublin, France accepted a cut in the British contributions of 520 million accounting units. The Federal Republic seems to be prepared to be even more cooperative toward London. Will France refuse to do likewise?

Francois-Poncet: Even though solutions were envisaged in Dublin, no decision was made. France did not refuse to discuss the special difficulties of certain states, for instance, Great Britain. But the concessions you are talking about must not call into question the principles on which the Community is based.

SPIEGEL: Paris and Bonn, after all, are agreed that a complete compensation for the British payments is out of the question. But suppose Mrs Thatcher holds to her demand. Can a disintegration of the Community still be avoided?

Francois-Poncet: A compensation between the contributions made by a country to the Community and the financial advantages it draws from the Community contradicts the solidarity of the Community and, as I have said already, the idea on which the 1970 decision was based to create its own financial sources.

SPIEGEL: Do we understand you correctly? If London adheres to its demand and if the other countries do not reject such a basic change in the rules of the treaty, you would also not refuse to discuss it?

Francois-Poncet: We would not refuse to discuss it. But it would naturally be clear that such a change cannot be granted to just one individual country. All would have to receive a compensation. But that would be another concept of the Common Market....

SPIEGEL: France itself is pursuing egoistic aims in the Community. Since it is still an agrarian state, it can pay a good portion of its oil bill through agrarian exports--particularly due to the subsidies of the Community. Is it not understood that the British are refusing to support the much too expensive agrarian policy of the Community any longer?

Francois-Poncet: Most of all I want to correct the following: The expenses of the common agrarian policy amount to just 0.62 percent of the gross inland product of the Nine. In a community of states it is not an anomaly that everybody tries to defend his interests by trying to coordinate them with the interests of his partners.

SPIEGEL: Does this not mean pursuing egotistical aims?

Francois-Poncet: The member states without exception are agrarian states. They all want the country to remain properly settled and the soil to be exploited by family enterprises. Such a policy grants the European consumer secure supply, it guarantees the producers their income, and in a difficult economic situation it contributes to employment. It gives Europe "green power," a trump card....

SPIEGEL: ...not rather a burden?

Francois-Poncet: Thanks to this "green power" Europe can help to cope with the food demand of mankind at a time when mankind is multiplying as never before. It is true that France is a great agrarian country in Europe, but it is not the only producer or exporter of agricultural products. In contrast to an opinion being published in Germany, but which is wrong, France does not derive budget advantages from the mechanisms of the common agricultural policy.

SPIEGEL: I beg your pardon?

Francois-Poncet: Although France does not pursue any special financial interests, it is still convinced that a continuation of the common agricultural policy would serve the overall interests of the Community. I would term the common agricultural policy the "basic pact" of the Community. Great Britain agreed to these stipulations when it became a member. It cannot reject them today without calling into question the entire structure of the Community.

SPIEGEL: But what does that mean for the present conflict with Great Britain?

Francois-Poncet: England has increased its production for 7 years, and it has obtained substantial changes from the preference of the Community [gemeinschaftspreaferenz]. Within the framework of the Community it already has a special status facilitating its adaption to the Community.

SPIEGEL: The former French prime minister, Chirac, suggested simply saying to the British: "You do not want to accept the rules of the Community. You want to enter a club without paying the entrance fee. You refuse to observe the rules of the game and you do not want to play fair. So leave the Community." More and more French deputies share this opinion. Do you also tend toward such a radical solution?

Francois-Poncet: The president has outlined the French position. We are prepared to help England in its difficulties. We supported the extension of the Community to nine states, so we can only hope that England will stay in the Community and actively take part in the structuring of Europe.

SPIEGEL: Do you actually find that the present world crisis is the right time for such a debate?

Francois-Poncet: Europe is being threatened. It ought, therefore, to rally together instead of quarreling. I hope that it will overcome its difficulties as has often been done before. The present debate does not stand in a right relationship with regard to the challenges facing us. It just distracts attention from the important problems.

SPIEGEL: The West's economic situation could suddenly deteriorate if the oil states again decrease their production, say as a consequence of a Western boycott against Iran. Federal Chancellor Schmidt on 21 April will submit to the council of ministers a plan for boycott measures against Iran. What position will be taken by France?

Francois-Poncet: The position of France is clear: We have condemned the violation of international law in Tehran. The fact that this violation still continues to exist makes it even more unacceptable. The community of peoples cannot remain passive in view of this. The European Community's Council of Ministers, which will meet on 21 April in Luxembourg, will have to decide what measures will be most effective and suitable to bring about an end to the violation.

SPIEGEL: Does it mean that France alone will do nothing to support the Americans in their conflict with Iran?

Francois-Poncet: We have done much together with the Nine and also alone to help our American friends in this painful situation. They have thanked us for it.

SPIEGEL: How come the Nine still could not agree on a common stance with regard to the Olympic games in Moscow? The English House of Commons decided in favor of a boycott of the games; the Federal Government will suggest to the German National Olympic Committee not to go to Moscow. The French Government still hesitates....

Francois-Poncet: The French Government does not hesitate. It has publicly stated its positions. It believes that this issue, according to the Olympic rules, must be decided by the National Olympic Committee of France. It is up to this committee to decide according to the Olympic principles and primarily according to the principle of universalism.

SPIEGEL: Do we understand you correctly that the French Government does not have in mind making a similar recommendation to the French Olympic Committee?

Francois-Poncet: We will not make such a statement. As regards the states of the European Community, at the moment some of them are outlining their stance irrevocably, which they are entitled to do. There can be no more talk of a common approach.

L'HUMANITE TERMS CARTER POLICIES 'DIKTATS'

[Yves Moreau editorial: "The American Diktat"]

[Text] Diktat--There is another word for Mr Carter's policy. Diktat, even toward his own allies. Not content with admonishing their ambassadors or with sending their heads of state threatening telephone calls--in Paris the Elysee keeps them secret--we now have the U.S. President peremptorily fixing a deadline for his vassals to join in the U.S. crusade against Iran. Mr Carter thus passes from pressure to ultimatum. There is no question of waiting months or even weeks, he explains. Immediate obedience is demanded. And this summons is public. Paris, Bonn, London and Rome television compliantly broadcast it yesterday evening. What is Mr Carter demanding? That the countries of West Europe agree to apply against Iran "a series of economic, diplomatic and even military measures" decided in Washington.

Let us remember that at the latest meeting of the "Nine's" foreign ministers in Lisbon it was Mr Jean Francois-Poncet who became entangled in the U.S. machinery. In fact it was the Giscard minister who took the lead in making his colleagues accept a statement which proclaimed little Europe's "solidarity" with the United States. Bonn was quick to lend its support. On Friday in Hamburg Social Democratic Chancellor Helmut Schmidt was not afraid to claim that Europeans "have much to gain from solidarity with the United States, even if joining in with the economic sanctions for which it is asking does more harm to the EEC countries' foreign trade than to America's." In other words, what do national interests matter: Carter "ueber alles!" Carter above all. Encouraged by Bonn's zeal and Paris' allegiance, the U.S. President no longer had to temper the tone of his impatience. Just how far will France risk being drawn? The freeing of the U.S. Embassy staff in Tehran is clearly only a pretext. Mr Carter knows that by acting differently, in particular by agreeing to the noninterference commitments asked of him by Tehran, he could have obtained the repatriation of his 50 fellow countrymen long ago.

In reality Mr Carter is simply using this affair to turn the tables, and justify measures against a country which suffered for decades under the bloody yoke of the shah's dictatorship imposed on it by imperialism. Iran's liberation has upset Pentagon strategy in that region. That, in truth, is the great crime which Mr Carter is eager to punish. The tension which he has been deliberately provoking is certainly not confined to Iran, however. From the troubles sparked off in Afghanistan to the campaigns launched against Vietnam and Kampuchea, from the nonratification of SALT II to the deployment of new nuclear missiles in West Europe and the organization of large air and naval maneuvers against Cuba, Washington has orchestrated a total, worldwide counteroffensive. It extends to every sphere, including sport. The universality which typifies the Olympic spirit is too favorable to international cooperation and peace for Mr Carter to tolerate. He does not hesitate in using the language of diktat toward the U.S. Olympic Committee. No going to Moscow, otherwise all subsidies will be withdrawn from you. And, yesterday evening, Mr Carter did not hide his desire to extend this ban to all his allies. Is it not high time that Paris gave an unambiguous no to this attempt to substitute the Iron Curtain for Olympians?

In more general terms Mr Carter's imperial pretensions must be urgently curbed. They endanger a nation's freedom of choice and world security.

BRITISH OFFICIAL GLAMOUR DISCUSSES PROBLEMS, DEPARTS

Denktas Statement on Talks

TA221637 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1530 GMT 22 Apr 80

[Text] President Denktas has said British Deputy Foreign Secretary Sir Ian Gilmour brought no plans or suggestions for the solution of the Cyprus problem.

President Denktas made a statement to the press following his meeting with Sir Ian Gilmour today. He said they discussed the Turkish Cypriot community's views on the Cyprus problem and other aspects of the problem.

President Denktas said it was the Greek Cypriot side which prevented the resumption of the intercommunal talks. He added that the Greek Cypriots had destroyed the partnership government by means of their attacks in 1963 and that their recognition as the legitimate government of Cyprus prevented the solution of the problem. President Denktas stated: We talked about these realities. I believe that Sir Ian Gilmour benefited from this meeting, as did we.

President Denktas noted that Sir Ian Gilmour expressed his government's support--as a guarantor state--for the solution of the problem through intercommunal talks.

Denktas replied to a question on the British bases in Cyprus: If the British Government leaves the bases, and we believe it will, then one of these bases must be given to the people in the north. This point is fundamental to the 1960 agreements.

Referring to the Greek Cypriots' request for money in return for the British bases, Denktas said: It is contrary to law, justice, the Constitution and the law and order guaranteed by Britain for only the Greek Cypriots to receive that money. If such money is to be given, it should be given to both communities. Both communities' rights must be recognized. We believe that it is not right to give the money only to the Greek Cypriot side.

President Denktas noted that during the meeting he gave Sir Ian Gilmour a petition signed by the parents of Turkish Cypriot students studying in Britain. The petition asks that the Turkish Cypriot students studying in British colleges or universities be allowed to pay the same fees as British students and students of the EEC countries in Britain.

In his reply to another question, Denktas denied rumors that during his stay in London he held meetings with certain companies having Jewish partners about the reopening of certain hotels in Maras [Varosha]. Denktas said such rumors were being spread for propaganda purposes against the Turkish Cypriot community.

Minister of Foreign Affairs, Defense and Tourism Kenan Atakol, Turkish Cypriot negotiator at the intercommunal talks Umit Onan and his adviser, Necati Munir Ertekun, were also present at the meeting between Denktas and Sir Ian Gilmour. Sir Ian Gilmour was accompanied at the meeting by his private secretary and by the British high commissoner. Sir Ian Gilmour is expected to leave the island tomorrow.

Press Conference

NC221846 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1630 GMT 22 Apr 80

[Text] The lord privy seal, Sir Ian Gilmour, who is on a visit to Cyprus, has declared that the British Government is ready to help in the context of current action aimed at the resumption of theintercommunal talks as well as the Waldheim initiative in this sphere.

Speaking to correspondents during a press conference given today at the home of the UK high commissioner in Nicosia, Sir Ian added that the British Government believes that the Cyprus issue must be solved through dialogue and therefore, he added, there ought to be the minimum or almost no conditions, and the discussions should take place at the negotiating table.

The British official described his visit to Cyprus as constructive and added that he heard many views--some of which clashed with each other, but they had given him, as he put it, food for thought. He said also that he was greatly impressed by the readiness of both sides to resume the the talks and added that this was something that the British Government and everyone welcomed. He continued that after his contacts he is slightly more optimistic and stressedthat with all that he had been told it did not seem to him as if there was a barrier preventing the resumption of the talks.

Asked how the British Government would react in the event that the Turks declared a state in the occupied part of the island, Sir Ian replied: You know the stand of the British Government on the legal aspect of the question. There will be no change in that attitude. I would not like to speculate on what might happen but such an eventuality is unlikely.

In response to another question, he said that his government did not owe any more money to the Cyprus Republic for the services being offered to the bases.

Asked whether he himself regarded Turkey's action in Cyprus as an invasion or not, Sir Ian said that the Turkish Army had arrived, as he put it, in Cyprus and invasion means different things to different people. Intercommunal relations, he continued, are not helped by discussions on controversial, as he said, issues. Intervening at this point the British high commissioner in Cyprus, Mr Rhodes, said that he hoped a settlement of the issue will be found soon and that the presence of foreign troops will not be necessary.

In conclusion Sir Ian said that the UN resolutions are not enough for the solution of the Cyprus issue and that the Western framework that had been proposed in 1978 will not be resubmitted at this state while UN efforts in this respect are continuing.

Government Response to Comments

NC231108 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1030 GMT 23 Apr 80

[Text] Asked about the statement made yesterday by the Lord Privy Seal and British Deputy Foreign Secretary Sir Ian Gilmour on the question of the Turkish invasion in Cyprus, the government spokesman has said:

The theory that the Turkish invasion in Cyprus does not constitute an invasion does not even need comment. Any difficulty in acknowledging this fact causes surprise because it is internationally accepted that Cyprus has been the victim of a Turkish invasion.

As a result of this invasion, 40 percent of the territory of Cyprus has been seized by the Turkish forces and continues to be under occupation, while one third of its population has been expelled from their homes and properties and are refugees in their own homeland.

The spokesman also stressed: The international community has not failed to stigmatize the international crime committed against Cyprus and to demand the termination of the occupation, withdrawal of the Turkish forces and the return of refugees to their homes.

KIPRIANOU BLAMES TURKS FOR LACK OF PROGRESS

NC221536 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1500 GMT 22 Apr 80

[Text] President Kiprianou today repeated that a lack of progress in the Cyprus issue is due entirely to Turkey's intransigence and added that Cyprus expects all countries, particularly those which maintain close relations with Turkey, to exert their influence so that Turkey may give up its intransigent attitude.

Replying to an address by the new Norwegian ambassador in Cyprus, Mr Aars, who had presented his credentials, the president said that the conditions being laid down by the Turkish side for the resumption of the dialogue are totally unacceptable and if these were accepted then they would prejudice the outcome of the talks and mean the partition of Cyprus. The president stressed that the talks must be based on the 19 May agreement which contains all the elements necessary for a just, peaceful and viable solution to the Cyprus issue, and added that any divisive solution would mean disaster and chaos in Cyprus and would be detrimental not only to the people of Cyprus as a whole but also to Cyprus itself, its survival and the region as well. In conclusion the president emphasized that it is time for a solution to the Cyprus issue to be found in the interests of all, particularly of the people of Cyprus as a whole, for justice to be rendered to Cyprus and for the inaleinable rights of its people to be restored.

In his address the Norwegian ambassador expressed hope for the resumption of the intercommunal talks and that a just and lasting settlement acceptable to all the parties concerned will be found. He also voiced his country's particular concern for the human suffering and tragedy in Cyprus. He then praised the friendly relations between the two countries and gave his assurance that the Norwegian Government attaches great importance to their further development. The ceremony was attended by Foreign Minister Rolandhis, Under Secretary to the President Stavrou and the Director of Protocol Mr Loizou.

KARAMANLIS WINS 179 VOTES ON FIRST PRESIDENTIAL BALLOT

AT231157 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1000 GMT 23 Apr 80

[Text] The first vote for the election of the president of the republic took place today in the plenary session of the Chamber of Deputies. The session was attended by 296 deputies, 204 of whom cast votes. Ninety-two deputies from PASOK refused to vote and when the roster was read they declared "I do not vote." After the election, 204 valid ballots were found. Of these ballots, 179 bore the name of the New Democracy candidate, Mr Konstandinos Karamanlis, 14 ballots were blank, 4 ballots bore the name of Mr Yeoryios Milonas, 3 the name of Mr Nikitas Venizelos, 1 the name of Mr Ilias Iliou, 1 the name of Mr Paidhon Vegleris and 1 the name of Mr Leonidhas Kirkos. The deputies of the National Party, Messrs Theotokis and Oikonomopoulos, abstained from the vote. PASOK deputy from Arkadhira, Mr Spiliopoulos, was absent from the vote but in a telegram to the president of the Chamber he stated that he supports the decision of his party's parliamentary group.

Prime Minister Karamanlis left the hall shortly before the vote. After the announcement of the result, President of the Chamber Papaspirou stated that the body will convene next Tuesday 29 April at 1100 for another vote for the election of the president of the republic. According to the Constitution, for the election of the president of the republic the second vote requires the vote of two-thirds of all deputies, that is, 200.

PARTIES, PAPERS ISSUE PREELECTION STATEMENTS ON VOTING

ND, KODISO Statements

AT221723 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1700 GMT 22 Apr 80

[Text] The New Democracy parliamentary group, which met this evening to define its position on tomorrow's voting for the election of a president of the republic, unanimously resolved that Prime Minister Karamanlis be nominated for the position of president of the republic. The parliamentary groups of PASOK and EDIK are also meeting this evening to define their positions.

The Political Bureau of KODISO [Party of Democratic Socialism] met at 1300 [1000 GMT] today and resolved, as mentioned in a statement, to insist on the proposals made last January for cleansing public life and on election of a president of the republic. In its statement KODISO also stressed it would participate in all phases of the election, as it is the duty of all deputies irrespective of the vote they will cast. Respect toward democratic constitutional order dictates that all deputies must actively participate with responsibility in carrying out their duty. Yeoryios Mavros said he will vote against Karamanlis during tomorrow's voting for the election of a president of the republic. Independent Deputy Papathemelis also stated he would not vote in support of a one-party president of the republic.

KKE (Exterior) Statement

AT221522 Athens RIZOSPASTIS in Greek 22 Apr 80 p 1

[Statement issued on 21 April by the presidium of the plenum of the KKE (Exterior) Central Committee: "For a Democratic Solution to the Country's Problems"]

[Text] The plenum of the KKE Central Committee met to discuss the latest political developments, particularly the issue of the presidential election and defined the specific position of the party's parliamentary group during Wednesday's [23 April] meeting of the Chamber of Deputies.

The KKE Central Committee recognizes that the effort to present Karamanlis as "above all parties" is aimed at disorienting the people and is, in reality, aimed at continuation of "New Democracy's"Atlantic, authoritarian and pro-monopoly policy by him in his new position as president of the republic.

The KKE has declared it could consent to the candidacy of a president of the republic who would not use the powers provided by the authoritarian Constitution against the will of the people, who would support a nationally independent and peace-loving policy for the withdrawal from NATO, the abolition of foreign bases and the abolition of the authoritarian limitation of peoples liberties and discrimination against progressive forces--particularly against the KKE. On the basis of this evaluation the Greek Communist Party, bearing in mind the statement of Karamanlis, will vote against him if he submits his candidacy.

The problems created in the election of a president of the republic, the positions adopted by political forces as well as the very statement of Karamanlis clearly demonstrate that the present Chamber of Deputies is unable to guarantee a solution to the issue of the presidency which will respond to the interest of the nation and will reflect the people's will. Even if the present Chamber of Deputies supplies the necessary votes for the election of a president, even if it is able to elect a president from a strictly constitutional point of view, it is basically unsuited for this duty primarily because it does not reflect the people's will--due to the usurping election law--and because the failure of "New Democracy's" policy has further decreased its influence among the people during the period since the last election.

In order to provide a democratic solution to the problems which have arisen and to guarantee the prerequisites for smooth political developments today, it is imperative that impartial elections must be declared under the simple proportional representation system of election which, together with the just representation of the people's wishes, will also strengthen people's participation in political developments.

The KKE believes that only through joint action by the democratic forces, both outside and inside the new Chamber of Deputies, will a candidate be proposed for the election of a president of the republic who would be in the best interest of the people and the country, thus guaranteeing the democratic administration of the country through implementation of a different policy--a policy of national independence, democratization and economic development for the benefit of the people. Being further strengthened in the Chamber of Deputies and among the people, the KKE will become the guarantor of this cooperation and change which our country needs.

The presidium of the plenum of the Central Committee.

I VRADHINI Editorial

[Editorial: "The Time for Decisions"]

[Text] This hour will be inscribed in history, not because we have the election of a president of the republic but rather because this election is related to the person of Karamanlis who has made history.

It is for this very reason that it will be the starting point for better or worse developments.

Everyone wants Karamanlis as president so that all can feel secure. Everyone wants him to be elected so that all can avoid general elections. They want him to be elected president, however, without voting for him.

Many peculiar, thoughtless and contradictory things have happened in Greek political life. There has never been anything like this before.

The opposition parties are concocting their political thinking with hypocrisy that is beyond logical limits and in the end this will knock their feet out from under them.

Is there not a single man amongst them with enough courage to say what they all believe and primarily what the people believe?

The truth is that many of them do say this sotto voice. They do so both within their own parties and within their own parliamentary groups. In fact many have risen up against the prevailing petty party politicing, against the instability of ideas, against the "now I have said, now I have not said" of the speakers, against the "I say one thing to one side and another to the other side." Do those who make such choleric statements in the name of the various parties, however, have the common mind of the common citizen?

If, therefore, the common mind has become so rare among the opposition's benches then A. Papandreou is not wrong--and not only on this matter--when he says that today the Chamber of Deputies, in its present composition, does not reflect the feelings of the electorate. This statement by Papandreou will become a boomerang against his unphilosophical maneuvers.

The leader of the majority opposition, however, is under no delusions. He knows very well that general elections at this very moment would be the most ideal psychological choice for those in the government. He has already concluded in his advance statements that if elections were to be held then the party now in authority would set as its goal: "Karamanlis for president." He knows very well what an effect this has among the people. But what of the parties?

It is a common secret that members of the opposition want to see Karamanlis at the highest position of the republic provided it is not obvious that they have voted for him.

All the parties want the democratic regime protected against every form of imposition. At the same time they know well (and they admit this between themselves or even when they chat with us) that there is no better guarantee for this than Karamanlis in the presidency.

All of them, no matter what their position may be, want the international prestige of Greece protected in the midst of a very troubled world with infectuous international crises, invasions, terror activities, dire competitions between the superpowers and surprises. They do not ignore the fact that any government would be happy to depend upon the invaluable contribution which Karamanlis would offer to the presidency in the promotion of our national policy in the international arena under any trial or tribulation.

Everyone, no matter what party they have declared their allegiance to, knows very well that with Karamanlis as president both the government and the opposition are provided with true guarantees for averting domestic and foreign dangers. There is not one single deputy who has not declared his firm belief--and today's date, 21 April [date the junta took over], brings much to mind--that it is not enough that we have restored democracy but that we must also protect it from every threat and against all erosion.

Since all the parties understand this, then why are they so hypocritical that they even now disdain to think when decisions must be taken?

We will simply ask this: If they refuse to think of the country's interests then why do they not think of their own interest since with Karamanlis in the presidency they are rid of their strongest opponent?

It would be the most abject delusion if they cultivated the false impression that they would be rid of him in any way. The way in which they try to push developments will not only fail to push him out of political affairs but, on the contrary, it will even push him even higher and this is what will hurt them. They shall see.

Giving a political hue to the presidential election is a contribution which, if not finally rejected, will be held against the parties which refuse to take advantage of this election because it was not accompanied by sideline bargaining and bartering. Since it is already evident that such a contribution has already been made and a political hue has been provided, the Karamanlis proposal for the nonpartisan character of the institution has received panhellenic support, which will be proved if elections are hastened.

Our country is on the threshold of developments which will have a definitive influence upon its future and will also affect the fate of democracy. This is not a conclusion reached by party propaganda. It is an objective conclusion which points out the responsibility of all parties to maintain the institution of the presidency in a high position over and above all party interests through the vote of every single deputy, as a representative of the nation, cast in his own conscience and rising to meet an historic challenge in fulfilling his constitutional duty freely--a duty which is inalienable and unaffected by any directive or pressure, whether this comes from questionable leaders or whether it comes from overseas. If, however, the passions of the opposition and the temptations of petty party policy continue until the last minute and if they continue to reject the principle of avoiding a political hue to the presidential institution, then what will happen?

In such an eventuality these parties will find themselves face to face with the startling surprises which the electorate has in store for them, as already graphically proved in polls conducted by opposition newspapers which demonstrate that the number of voters who want Karamanlis as president are double the number of those who do not want him. These polls were conducted by their own people and not even the leader of the majority opposition dared to question them. He did not even ignore them. Instead, he expressed his surprise because these polls were a clear documentation of the disharmony which exists between the line he gives to the presidential issue and the expressed will of a great number of his followers.

(At the same time in an effort to justify his negative position Papandreou refers to another disharmony, that between the Chamber of Deputies and the electorate. At the same time, however, he refers to no specific instance of such disharmony nor does he find any convincing argument to prove his point.)

The Karamanlis statement laid down the principle of the election over and above party interests. In other words he openly and directly declared what the entire nation expects from the office of the president: That he should be removed from and above all parties. He wished that the head of state, would remain above politics from the outset, with the support and active cooperation of the parties. At the same time, however, in a final analysis the Karamanlis proposal--that the members of the parliamentary groups should be permitted to vote according to their own conscience--presuposes that the parties should also take part in the secret voting as provided for by article 32, paragraph 1 of the Constitution.

The question which understandably emerges is this:

Why is it that the leaders of the parties, with obvious nervousness and breathtaking haste, rushed to reject the Karamanlis proposal? It is our opinion that acceptance of his proposal by PASOK would mean the members of his parliamentary group would have to take part in the secret voting.

Why is it that Papandreou considers this so undesirable to the degree that although he strives to appear as "superdemocratic" he has to say, "the deputies have no right to vote according to their conscience but they must vote according to party instructions?"

Everything is fine. Let them receive "instructions" not to vote for Karamanlis. This is the right of their own party. Why, however, should they not exercise this right in accordance to the Constitution and during the secret voting? What is it that frightens Andreas? If there is nothing to be afraid of then why is it that not a single newspaper close to PASOK, not a single authoritative source, has told us that they will not take part in this so critical voting? Let us not give undue dimensions to suspicion. Things will become clear on Wednesday. It is unthinkable that the party's leadership would shelter defeatism under its boasts about party discipline.

Naturally, however, the implementation of the Constitution also demands sobriety, particularly at such moments. It is difficult to understand why the honorable chairman of PASOK should call upon the regulation of the Chamber of Deputies in order to convince us that his deputies must not vote according to their own conscience at a time when Article 60, paragraph 1, of the Constitution specifically states: "The deputies have the unlimited right to express their opinion by voting according to their own conscience."

As for the small parties, what can we say? The KODISO [Party of Democratic Socialism] said it "insists on its positions"--all four deputies--but they fail to understand that as a result of this "insistence" it is likely that they will not be able to regain their positions in the Chamber since they will be cutting themselves off from those who support them.

The stage, in any case, is not yet fully illuminated. Let us not expand into other sectors before Karamanlis addresses his parliamentary group.

AVRIANI Article

AT211600 Athens AVRIANI in Greek 21 Apr 80 p 1

[Editorial: "At Long Last Let Him Decide To Leave"]

[Text] The Karamanlis statement, with which on Saturday he confronted the Greek people with his candidacy as president of the republic, is a provocation against democracy.

It is a provocation because he accompanied his candidacy with the conditions that deputies must abandon their party affiliations and that they must present themselves, in a column of fours, to vote for the president.

The text of his statement, which ends with the warning that only if the Greek people accept his conditions will the regime be "strengthened," is full of egoism and arrogance.

In his statement Karamanlis demands:

Parties should be dissolved for a moment so that he can get the 180 or 200 votes which he needs.

Greeks, both inside and out of the Chamber of Deputies, must recall that, in 1975 Karamanlis could have "sat upon us" as president had he so wished, but that he did not do so because he was lenient with us.

We must not forget that when the Constitution was being voted upon he could have had it "cut to his own measure" (in other words in the same way he "cuts" the election laws) and that we must be grateful because he did not do it.

In conclusion his statement also leaves an innuendo. He warns us that if things do not happen as he wants them he will pack his bags and leave.

There has never been such an exploitation of democracy as we have had these past few days. Only a few hours after the Karamanlis statement, his press organs reiterated with more furor the noxious danger-mongering with which they have so polluted the atmosphere recently: If Karamanlis is not elected president then the regime will be in danger.

The Greek Constitution provides that protection of the regime rests with the Greek people. This fundamental rule is overthrown by the rumors unleashed by "New Democracy" that, unless Karamanlis is elected president, the republic will collapse. It will collapse, however, to make room for whom?

If they refer to the army then they are wrong because 13 whole years have gone by since that sinister--like today--anniversary and because the army officers have changed their mentality and because Greece is not Liberia. If, again, they mean that Rallis' prediction will come true, in other words, that a calamity will take place and that the former king will return in the guise of an "angel of peace" they are once again wrong because the dead cannot be resurrected.

Karamanlis, however, also connects his candidacy with something else: This is a nonpartisan policy. Karamanlis remembered this nonpartisan policy now, when after 6 years of his own administration he has done nothing but abandon the country to an orgy of party politics. If in his capacity as prime minister, with responsible authority, he did not manage to strike at party politics then how will he be able to do so now from the position of the president for which he is fighting so hard?

Karamanlis also hints at something else in his statement: that he may leave, even on Friday--according to the "rumor" circulated by "New Democracy"--unless he is elected as president. "He will drop things and will leave," they whisper.

Naturally due to the way in which he has handled things his failure in the elextion would create for him a question of personal prestige. This, however, does not mean that he can "threaten" the Greek people.

A. Trikoupis and A. Venizelos departed but Greece was not lost. It is a biological rule for nations not to depend upon the life of one single person. The theory of the irreplaceable one is extremely romantic. The cemeteries are full of such irreplaceable ones.

This threat, therefore, ought not to influence the judgement of the deputies next Wednesday. The Greek people, this nation which was wounded by the arrogant Karamanlis statement, believe that the life of a nation cannot depend upon a single person. If Karamanlis wants to leave then let him leave at long last.

OUR RADIO SCORES U.S. PRESSURES ON IRAN ISSUE

TA221200 (Clandestine) Our Radio in Turkish to Turkey 0900 GMT 22 Apr 80

[Unattributed commentary: "The United States Wants To Drag our Country Into the Fire"]

[Text] The United States has recently intensified its pressures on Turkey. The statement issued by the Foreign Ministry reflects the U.S. pressures applied on Turkey. The Foreign Ministry statement is an official admission. On what basis are the U.S. imperialists increasing their pressures on Turkey? On what basis do they want to use Turkey against a neighboring country and against peace in our region? It is clear that the Demirel government has made it possible for the U.S. imperialists to drag our country into the fire for their own interests. The bilateral agreements and the bases serve as the basis for all kinds of U.S. imperialist pressures on Turkey. The United States has obtained the right to use its bases on our soil without notifying the government. On the basis of the so-called bilateral slavery agreements, the U.S. imperialists have the right to interfere in the internal affairs of our country and to engage in direct military intervention.

No patriot doubts that the U.S. imperialists, who continue to level military threats at a time when the atmosphere in our region is tense and who engage in overt pressures to use our country against neighboring Iran will in the future intensify their pressures on our country in a bid to serve their own interests. This is why the U.S. imperialists are awaiting the ratification by parliament of the slavery agreement signed by the Demirel government.

The reactions against the U.S. pressures are increasing in our country. Intimidated by these reactions, Demirel is being forced to say that Turkey will not participate in the economic embargo on Iran and that the bases will not be used against Iran. This attitude by the likes of Demirel, who is closely connected to U.S. imperialism and NATO and who imposes on our country all the IMF pressures, constitutes open hypocrisy. This hypocrisy is further displayed in the Foreign Ministry statement.

Consider these words which appear in the Foreign Ministry statement: An understanding was reached regarding Turkey's relations with Iran. In other words, the Demirel government is pleading with the U.S. bosses: Please have mercy. Domestic reactions are increasing and, furthermore, we are importing oil from Iran. Otherwise, you know that we would comply with all your wishes. We cannot engage in such a move openly. However, we gave you the bases and we will secretly assist you in your move.

Unless the U.S. and NATO bases on our soil are dismantled and unless the bilateral slavery agreements are torn up, the danger of our country being dragged into the fire on behalf of U.S. imperialist interests will continue to exist. Particularly now, the danger has increased. The Turkish Communist Party, the Turkish Labor Party, the Turkish Socialist Workers Party, revolutionary democrats and RPP patriots as well as anti-American forces extending as far as a certain sector of the National Salvation Party--which struggles against this threat and which wages a massive anti-imperialist struggle to insure the dismantling of the bases and the annullment of the bilateral slavery agreements --are aware of the extent of this threat.

The most progressive and patriotic forces in our country should increase their massive anti-imperialist actions to prevent the ratification of the slavery agreement, which Parliament calls the defense cooperation agreement. Using our country as a tool for the aggressive goals of U.S. and NATO imperialism should not be permitted. The death bases on our soil equipped with nuclear warheads should be dismantled. The bilateral slavery agreements should be torn up.

DEMIREL EXPRESSES CONFIDENCE IN REPUBLICAN STATE

TA221826 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 22 Apr 80

[Excerpt] Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel said the Turkish nation has been able to control its future throughout history and will continue to be successful on that issue. He said: Those who believe Turkey is ripe for adventures and who have obscure intentions will regret their deeds. In a statement issued 23 April, on the occasion of National Sovereignty and Children's Day, Demirel said the 60th anniversary of the foundation of the Turkish Grand National Assembly is being commemorated with joy. Noting that the Turkish Grand National Assembly had formed the present Turkish Republican State following the victorious war of independence, Demirel said: The state of the Turkish Republic, which is based on the national will and on martyrs' blood, is our most beloved possession. It is the duty of all future generations to defend it to eternity. Our current difficulties should not give rise to panic, despair or discouragement. The existence of nations and states does not depend on the gravity of their enemies. Those who confuse freedom with treachery, those who plot against the nation's tranquillity and those who wish to replace the Turkish Republic with a communist regime will, sooner or later, repent of their deeds. The national will, the establishment of which we are celebrating today, and national consciousness of the fact that the nation is the master of its own future are the guarantees of our eternal existence.

Demirel said adventures, traitors, hypocrites and their murder networks will not be able to overcome the state and the nation and attempts to sow dissent among the nation will definitely be rendered ineffective. He added that those who try to prevent the great struggle from being waged against ignorance, shortages, underdevelopment, unemployment and poverty will definitely be crushed. Noting that Turkey has problems just like any other country, Demirel said: There is only one way to overcome the current problems. We will do what we did 60 years ago. In other words, we as a nation will wage a full-scale struggle against the domestic and foreign enemies of our nation, our homeland and our state. We will not lose our self-confidence as well as our confidence in our state and our future. We will find light and tranquillity at the end of this path.

ECEVIT WARNS AGAINST CHANGING CONSTITUTION, LOSS OF LIBERTIES

TA221808 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 22 Apr 80

[Text] RPP leader Bulent Ecevit has said the efforts to change the Constitution and the system--efforts that run counter to the principle of national sovereignty and free democracy--must be abandoned and that solutions to the problems must be sought within the legal framework of democracy.

In a congratulatory message he issued on 23 April, on the occasion of National Sovereignty and Children's Day, Ecevit said it was the humanitarian duty of every person and institution to make every effort to enable Turkish children to live and grow up in peace. He added: Teachers, mothers and fathers have great duties in this respect. However, first and foremost, the politicians and political parties must jointly look for ways to eliminate the tensions, anger and conflicts so that domestic tranquillity can be restored in our country as soon as possible. The basic condition for this is for the parties to take a firm stand against all kinds of terrorism and terrorists, regardless of ideologies, to refrain from provocative behavior and to remain loyal to the principles of free democracy with regard to all the issues. The RPP has always been and will always be meticulous about these things.

Ecevit said certain circles, either with ulterior motives or as a result of superficial and erroneous diagnoses, were alleging that Turkey's problems originated from the Constitution and democratic rights and liberties and that they were envisaging radical changes in the Constitution as the solution. The RPP leader stressed that the restriction of democratic rights and liberties would increase the present state of tension and crisis and would damage the principle of national sovereignty. He said: Those who do not agree with the principle of the separation of powers--the inalienable requirement of free democracy--and who want great powers to be concentrated in the hands of those in political power and the central administration are, knowingly or unknowingly, inviting a system of dictatorship. It is impossible for the Turkish nation to accept life under a system other than democracy or to look for solutions within an undemocratic framework.

Ecevit alleged that the TRT has lately been used as a tool for these efforts and that this was a negative development causing great concern.

On the occasion of National Sovereignty and Children's Day, the RPP leader called on the Turkish Grand National Assembly to elect a president as soon as possible by following democratic rules.

Ecevit concluded by saying: I hope all the parties and constitutional institutions act in solidarity among a path that will take our nation to peace and tranquillity, and I wish domestic peace and tranquillity to be restored for the dear Turkish children, youths and entire Turkish nation as soon as possible.

SENATE UNITY GROUP SCORES EFFORTS TO CHANGE CONSTITUTION

TA221732 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 22 Apr 80

[Text] The National Unity Senate group has issued a statement alleging that the present efforts to amend the Constitution are really aimed at eliminating the present constitutional order and replacing it with a system of dictatorship. The statement, which was signed by the head of the group, Fahri Ozdilek, says such efforts violate the Constitution. It notes that the opponents of the 27 May [1960 coup] who have always tried to damage the 1961 Constitution, are not trying to wreck it completely. The statement says systems not based on the principle of separation of powers cannot be considered democracies. It adds: Those who are trying to strip the Constitution of its democratic characteristics do not want the Turkish people to progress. Those who want to change the Constitution cannot represent the entire nation.

INTERIOR MINISTER DENIES REMARKS ON MAY DAY DEMONSTRATIONS

TA221714 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 22 Apr 80

[Text] State Minister and Acting Interior Minister Orhan Eren has said the remarks he made in connection with May Day during his news conference yesterday were published in certain newspapers in a manner that could be misinterpreted. In a statement issued in Istanbul today, Eren said he did not say "we will certainly not allow May Day demonstrations in the martial law areas." He claims that he said: "The only authorities in the martial law areas are the martial law commanders. The commanders carry out the law."

9 KILLED, 16 WOUNDED IN REACTION TO TRAFFIC DEATH IN TARSUS

TA231043 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 23 Apr 80

[Excerpts] Nine persons were killed and 16 persons, 2 of them gendarme commandos, were wounded in incidents in the Tarsus District of Icel last night. A curfew was declared in the district today from 0500 until 1900. According to a statement by Tarsus District Official Husamettin Guven to the TRT, the incident was caused by the death of Naciye Sonmez, a girl who was killed in a traffic accident on the Mersin-Adana highway on Monday. Some 1,000 to 1,500 persons gathered at the scene of the traffic accident last night around 2100, closing the highway to traffic at Girne. Shots were fired from the group at the security force members who tried to intervene. Group members said they were going to dig a trench across the road. Nine persons were killed, seven of them instantly, in the shooting which ensued. Sixteen persons, two of them gendarme commandos, were wounded. Reinforcements were sent to Tarsus from Mersin and Adana following yesterday's incidents. Icel Governor Fahri Ozturk and Mersin Garrison Commander Commodor Fuat Urgur went to the scene of the incident last night. Guven added that 90 persons were detained after the shooting which lasted about 1 hour. It has been announced that calm has been restored in the district following yesterday's incidents.

MINISTER MACGUIGAN NOTES PLAN TO BOYCOTT OLYMPICS

LD222302 Montreal Domestic Service in English 2200 GMT 22 Apr 80

[Text] Here is a report from Ottawa by Brian Gallagher on the announcement that Canada will boycott the summer Olympics in Moscow: The minister for external affairs, Mark Macguigan, told the Commons just a few minutes ago that the government now believes that conditions exist for an effective boycott of the Moscow games. Mr MacGuigan says it is totally inappropriate with Soviet troops still in Afghanistan to hold the games in Moscow, and the government has been working to get support from other members of the Western alliance and from the Third World for a boycott. Mr MacGuigan has just returned, for example, from the Zimbabwe independence ceremony where he canvassed opinion on the boycott and he says Prime Minister Trudeau has also been writing letters to other leaders to marshall support.

[Begin MacGuigan recording] The results of these consultations, coupled with conversations I had with foreign ministers present during the recent independence celebrations in Zimbabwe, have convinced the government that the criteria for an effective boycott are now clearly present. [end recording]

Mr MacGuigan says that asking Canadian athletes to forego the games is difficult but it is also the clearest way to make the condemnation of Soviet actions plain. He says any athletes who do go . Moscow will do so without the moral or the financial support of the government.

The Olympic boycott announcement comes just 1 day before the U.S. secretary of state, Cyrus Vance, arrives in Ottawa for a 1-day visit, and it is bound to take some of the tension off that visit that would otherwise have existed. But the former minister of external affairs, Flora MacDonald, who had announced her own boycott while in office, says that Mr MacGuigan's talk of persuading other countries to join in the boycott is so much bolderdash. It was the other way around, she says, with even the Third World countries asking Canada to join.

Speaking at a news conference, Sa Carneiro admitted the possibility of a stability agreement with the Socialist Party in the event the Democratic Alliance fails to secure an absolute majority in the next parliamentary elections.

CARRINGTON INFORMS IRANIAN ENVOY OF SANCTIONS DECISION

LD231224 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1117 GMT 23 Apr 80

[By Tom McMullan, PA diplomatic correspondent]

[Excerpt] Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington today kept up the pressure as part of the West European effort to secure the release of the American Embassy hostages in Tehran.

He summoned the Iranian charge d'affaires in London, Mr Gholam Ali Afrouz, to inform him of the decision made by the Common Market foreign ministers in Luxembourg yesterday in support of President Carter's efforts to free the hostages.

Lord Carrington warned that the Common Market countries were ready to impose trade sanctions within the next month if the hostages were not released.

He told him that the European countries intended to reduce their diplomatic representation in Tehran. And Iran would be expected to reduce its diplomatic representation in London and other European capitals.

However, it is not clear if this will make much impact in Iran. Its London Embassy has already been operating at a reduced level since the fall of the shah more than a year ago.

Britain's Tehran Embassy is being reduced to a skeleton staff of 5 or 6 out of a total of 22. Most of the British diplomats were flying to London from Iran today.

Britain's ambassador to Iran, Sir John Graham, has already conferred with Lord Carrington since his recall to London yesterday.

FOREIGN MINISTER ULLSTEN ON DISARMAMENT CONFERENCE

LD211527 Stockholm SVENSKA DAGBLADET in Swedish 14 Apr 80 p 4

[TT report: "Disarmament Conference in Stockholm"]

[Text] The European disarmament conference which Sweden has offered to host will probably be held in Stockholm.

This is what Foreign Minister Ola Ullsten told TT. The Swedish initiative has encountered a positive response in the other Scandinavian countries. Ullsten also put forward the idea when he met with foreign ministers in Lisbon recently.

Ullsten's view is that it is most urgent that such a conference be arranged against the background of growing rearmament in Europe.

"This rearmament is not happening for Europe's sake. Relations between the European nations have rarely been more relaxed than they are today. Rearmament is taking place, instead, as a result of the fact that the great powers can envisage Europe as a battlefield. There is good reason for the European nations to react against this," Ola Ullsten said.

FOREIGN POLICY COUNCIL AGAINST PARTICIPATION IN IRAN BOYCOTT

AU250852 Vienna Domestic Service in German 0500 GMT 25 Apr 80

[Text] In the Foreign Policy Council the two big Austrian political parties yesterday expressed the opinion that Austria should not participate in foreign boycotts against Iran but that on the other hand the sanctions should not be counteracted by any expansion of Austria's economic relations with Iran. Moreover, it was declared that Austria continues to condemn the taking of hostages at the U.S. Embassy in Tehran as a criminal act. According to People's Party [OeVP] Chairman Mock the OeVP has proposed that the three neutrals--Sweden, Switzerland and Austria--jointly undertake steps to bring about the release of the hostages.

IRANIAN, KURDISH STUDENTS OCCUPY IRANIAN EMBASSY

AU250954 Vienna ARBEITER-ZEITUNG in German 25 Apr 80 p 1

[Excerpt] About 60 Iranian and Kurdish students began a sit-down strike in the Iranian Embassy in Vienna on Thursday [24 April] at 1000 hours local time. According to a representative of the demonstrators, with their action they intend to protest against the latest incidents at the Iranian universities and against the attacks of the Iranian Armed Forces against Kurdish towns. The sit-down strike is to last until this afternoon.

The demonstrators include representatives of six opposition groups. The majority are leftist Iranians and Kurds who earlier also staged demonstrations against the shah's regime.

'SPECIAL RELATIONS' WITH POLAND NOTED; BABIUCH VISIT IN JUNE

AU241250 Vienna DIE PRESSE in German 24 Apr 80 p 2

[Special DIE PRESSE Report by "P.M.": "Special Relations With Poland; Premier To Come to Vienna"]

[Text] Vienna--Austrian-Polish relations are gradually developing into a special relationship. This is evident in all fields. Thus Foreign Minister Pahr will be going to Warsaw--directly from the coronation ceremonies for Beatrix of the Netherlands--on 1 May, for a 3-day visit. And new Polish Premier Babiuch's first visit abroad will take him to Vienna in June.

But at a lower level as well it is evident that the two states attach particular importance to very close relations despite the different social systems. On Wednesday [23 April] Pahr stressed at the farewell reception for Ambassador Jedynak that Warsaw's attitude was a clear indication of this: After Jedynak's predecessor in Vienna, Karski, was appointed foreign trade minister, Jedynak himself will also "go up the ladder" after 1 and 1/2 years of office in Austria--the diplomat will take over a department with the Ministry of Heavy Industry and Agricultural Machinery that is of special significance for relations with Austria. Jedynak has already established contacts in Austria that will come in useful for him in his future activity.

"At a time like the present when detente has reached the lowest point and when the supporters of the cold war are triumphing," Pahr declared at the reception for Jedynak, it is particularly important "despite existing problems to place common interests in the foreground." Warsaw seems to take a strong interest in this: The next ambassador at least was a Cabinet member before his assignment to Vienna. The appointment will probably be acknowledged at next week's Austrian Cabinet meeting.

DEFICIT IN TRADE WITH ARAB STATES REPORTED

[Summary] After a trade surplus of about 1.5 billion schillings in 1977 and 1978, Austria recorded a trade deficit of 3.43 billion schillings last year in its trade with the countries of the Arab region including the Middle East. Austria's exports to that region expanded by 22.6 percent to 9.76 billion schillings but that did not help with regard to the trade deficit since Austria's imports from that area increased more than twofold to 13.19 billion schillings because of higher oil prices.

Austria's biggest foreign trade partner in that region is Iraq--the second-largest market outside Europe for domestic exporters. The traditionally negative balance rose from 1.4 billion schillings in 1978 to 4.5 billion in 1979 largely because Austria imported only about 23 percent of its oil supplies from Iraq in 1978. But by 1979 that figure had risen to nearly 50 percent. Exports to Iraq have increased by about 50 percent to 1.8 billion schillings.

Trade with Libya was considerably expanded last year. Austria still has a trade deficit with Libya due to its oil purchases. Libya's exports to Austria, however, jumped to 1.2 billion schillings.

Austria's exports to Saudi Arabia fell by about 20 percent to 1.2 billion schillings in 1979 because of the completion of several large projects. Exports, however, are expected to rise after the start of Saudi Arabia's third 5-year plan on 15 May of this year.

Algeria ranks fourth in this listing with exports totaling 1.07 billion schillings and imports totaling 1.27 billion schillings. Next follows Tunisia with exports totaling 878 million schillings, imports totaling 44.2 million schillings; and Egypt, which imported goods worth about 780 million schillings from Austria in 1979. Syria purchased Austrian goods valued at about 721 million schillings. Lebanon imported goods totaling approximately 587 million schillings. The United Arab Emirates imported goods totaling 323 million schillings. Jordan imported goods totaling 270 million schillings. Next come the Yemen Arab Republic, Morocco, Sudan, Qatar, Bahrain, Oman, Somalia, Djibouti, the PDRY and Mauritania.

POLISH JOURNALISTS DELEGATION--A delegation of the Polish Press Club for International Affairs, led by its chairman, Chief Editor Marian Podkowinski, is currently paying a 3-day visit to Vienna at the invitation of the Austrian Federal Press Service. The group includes representatives of Polish daily and weekly newspapers, news agencies, radio and television. The delegates were received for informative talks by President Kirchschlaeger and Chancellor Kreisky on 23 April. In the afternoon they met representatives of the Austrian Chamber of Commerce, and in the evening they attended a Polish Embassy reception. [Vienna WIENER ZEITUNG in German 24 Apr 80 p 2 AU]

GOVERNMENT 'TAKEN BY SURPRISE' BY U.S. HOSTAGE RESCUE BID

LD251114 Hamburg DPA in German 1038 GMT 25 Apr 80

[Excerpts] Bonn--The Federal Government was completely taken by surprise by the American operation to free the Tehran hostages, an operation which failed last night in Iran. Government Spokesman Klaus Boelling told journalists in Bonn this morning that Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and the entire government had only learned about the abortive commando operation through news agency reports. Immediately after the first report, Schmidt held a meeting with his closest colleagues and Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher.

According to Boelling, the Federal Government assumes that it would have been informed by Washington if U.S. units stationed in the Federal Republic had been involved in the operation. The government spokesman noted that all activities connected with the U.S. hostages in Tehran fell within the sole competence of the U.S. administration.

Schmidt, who has repeatedly advised against military measures in the Iran crisis in the past, is said to have been taken aback by the reports about the American attempt to free the hostages. There were indications from the Federal Government that Bonn had expected to be officially informed by Washington through diplomatic channels about the American operation in Iran--at least at the same time as the public was informed.

Boelling linked the element of surprise in Bonn not only to the timing of the rescue operation but to the incident as a whole.

Boelling refused to judge or comment on the United State's commando raid at the press conference on the grounds that the Federal Government must first have knowledge of all the important factors before making a judgement.

LAMBSDORFF: STRAITS OF HORMUZ CLOSING WOULD BE 'CATASTROPHE'

LD241210 Hamburg DPA in German 1142 GMT 24 Apr 80

[Text] Hamburg--In the opinion of Federal Economics Minister Otto Graf Lambsdorff, the closure of the Strait of Hormuz at the entrance to the Persian Gulf would be a "catastrophe." In an interview for the latest edition of WIRTSCHAFTSWOCHE, published in Duesseldorf, Lambsdorff said: "I assume, particularly after my talks in countries bordering the Persian Gulf, that this would also be seen by the moderate oil-producing countries as an attack on their interests and would be responded to accordingly."

In the interview Lambsdorff reiterated the view that if Bonn supports economic measures it is not so much because of the effect of economic sanctions but because of the Federal Republic's relations with the United States. "One of the most fundamental considerations in connection with economic sanctions, which the economics minister of a country dependent on exports who is a stubborn defender of free international trade cannot exactly welcome with cheers, is whether by such measures we can prevent worse intervention and more serious actions by the United States, at least for the time being," Lambsdorff said.

PRESS VIEWS EUROPEAN COMMUNITY'S LUXEMBOURG DECISION

FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU

DW241130 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU in German 24 Apr 80 p 3

[Correspondent Erich Hauser commentary: "An Act of Strength of the Nine"]

[Text] What the foreign ministers of the nine European Community states have decided to do regarding Tehran must suffice for American needs for solidarity for the present. Washington indeed seems satisfied. The final result of the Luxembourg discussions was an extraordinary act of strength for the European Community.

This is the first time the Nine have shown active foreign policy involvement in a crisis taking place outside Europe. This has never happened before. In connection with the Middle East conflict and the African crises, activity had been limited to resolutions and diplomatic demarches. For the first time the European Community states are showing a readiness to run risks regarding an OPEC state. And so far they have always been charged, for example by Israel, with subordinating their foreign policy to their dependence on oil.

Part of the risk is that at least some Islamic oil countries could declare their solidarity with Tehran and curtail or completely discontinue their supplies to the Community. But this loss in an emergency can be offset by consumption limitations and oil supplies through the International Energy Agency. It is also part of the risk that Iran could move into economic dependence on East bloc states. But the clerics among the Iranian rulers cannot be interested in this, and the present secular rulers in Tehran know that dependence on Moscow makes one even less free than dependence on Western capitalism.

The Luxembourg decisions demonstrate that relations with the U.S. protective power weigh more after all for the governments of the European Community than all reservations and risks. In this respect it is also an indirect warning to Moscow. It is doubtful whether the governments of the European Community would have demonstrated their solidarity with the United States in a similar way if the Soviets had not invaded Afghanistan. The fact that the Federal Government was able to overcome the reluctance of some partners strengthens Bonn's weight in Washington as well as in Moscow. The action of the European Community achieves additional value because Japan--in a similar position of constraint with regard to the protective partner, the United States--has oriented itself with the action of the European Community and because the other West European states, at least in part as treaty partners of the Community, are being pulled along.

If the final result of Luxembourg is not completely in line with the ideas of Bonn, it is rather a gain than a loss. Some immediate measures against Tehran are being implemented; but the deadline of mid-May in connection with the real economic sanctions means passing the buck to the Iranian rulers with regard to a decision. They can heal the breach of international law in time by releasing the hostages after the election of the new Iranian parliament, and thus also save economic relations with Western Europe, which in the long run are desirable for Iran.

It is open whether this delay will prompt U.S. President Carter, despite his election troubles, to refrain from taking military action against Iran. He must realize that his foreign policy has put an extreme strain on the ties between Western Europe and the United States. The Federal Government experienced again in Luxembourg how narrow the leeway of some other European Community governments is because of domestic political circumstances. An anti-American and anti-German resentment is growing in the social democratic parties of the Benelux countries.

The foreign policy act of strength in Luxembourg demonstrates what has been known all the time: that under external pressure, the Nine rally closer together. But fundamentally among the Nine, the feeling of "we", the awareness of belonging together and also the mutual understanding for different historic experiences is still lacking.

The decisions of the Nine should also not be overrated. It is unlikely that the American hostages will now be released in Tehran. The actual common solidarity test will come later once the economic sanctions have been implemented and oil supplies become more scarce.

HANDELSBLATT

DW241100 Duesseldorf HANDELSBLATT in German 24 Apr 80 p 2

[Klaus C. Engelen dispatch: "No Scapegoats"]

[Text] New York--Granted, the two-stage plan of Western solidarity against Iran adopted by the foreign ministers of the European Community in Luxembourg falls considerably short of meeting Americans wishes. Yet the responsible people in the U.S. capital are realistic enough to view the Luxembourg compromise against the background of far divergent economic interests of the Western partners which can be reduced to a common denominator only with difficulty and through laborious consultations.

Even if the official Washington reaction sounds diplomatic to European and Japanese ears, there should not be any doubt about one point in the relationship of the Americans with the Japanese and the Europeans following the beginning made in Luxembourg: The crisis in the Atlantic alliance, possibly the most serious crisis in the postwar period, continues to smoulder. Political observers on the Potomac agree that even a full shift of the EC foreign ministers to the latest, intensified U.S. boycott strategy against Iran would have caused little if any fundamental improvement of the Atlantic climate which heralds stormy weather.

Insiders warn that the latest eruptions of displeasure on the part of the Carter administration over the lack of help by the Western alliance partners in the test of strength with the violators of international law in Iran are but the tip of the iceberg. Profound differences in views about the "proper" Western retaliation strategy against the Soviets after their invasion of Afghanistan, tensions within the alliance over the European responsibilities in defending oil supplies in the politically and militarily jeopardized Middle East region, as well as the lack of confidence in Jimmy Carter's leadership capability and disillusionment about his zigzag policy during the past few years are analyzed as the causes of the alliance crisis in banner headlines of U.S. news magazines.

Crises in the Atlantic alliance are not new. Historians will perhaps provide a better assessment of the latest worsening in the U.S.-European relations later. Even though sanctions have been envisaged only as the second stage of a joint solidarity program, Luxembourg perhaps shows the way toward more Western unity and greater Iranian insight. After the announcement of possible military actions--and a review of the Iranian situation in mid-May--only a few weeks are left in which an unpredictable extension of the crisis over the Tehran hostages can be prevented. If the internal troubles in Iran intensify, the U.S. leadership might arrive even sooner at the conviction that Washington can no longer rely on just political-economic instruments of pressure.

While Washington's ultimatum to the Iranian leadership is in force, a particularly critical and difficult phase is forthcoming in the relations of the United States with its Western partners. Irreparable damage to the West would ensue if Carter's imaginative election strategists set up the Europeans and Japanese--apart from the ayatollah--as scapegoats in the presidential campaign that is heating up. Such painting in black and white could be more dangerous for the alliance than the militant students in the U.S. Embassy.

W. BERLIN FAVORS SOLIDARITY WITH U.S.

Mayor's Call

LD241327 Hamburg DPA in German 1216 GMT 24 Apr 80

[Text] Berlin--Berlin's governing mayor, Dietrich Stobbe, (SPD), stressed his demand today to the House of Representatives for "practical solidarity" on the part of the European allies with the United States in the present international crisis. In a statement on his talks held recently in Washington with President Jimmy Carter and Secretary of State Cyrus Vance, Stobbe stressed that the Europeans will also have to bear the burdens which might arise out of this solidarity. Stobbe conceded that there are divided views about the effectiveness of Washington's recent sanctions against Iran. The disagreements on this, however, must recede. The United States has granted Europe, and especially Berlin, protection and aid in every hour of the postwar period. "We will not, we must not, forget this," Stobbe stated. At the same time he warned against a crisis in the trust between the peoples on both sides of the Atlantic being allowed to develop in addition to the "complicated crises" in the Middle East. One should not turn a deaf ear to requests which "we may one day have to make again ourselves."

Stobbe said that Berlin must issue a warning when peace is endangered because no place in Europe is more dependent on the course of international developments than this city. The Berliners want the "constellations" which have made the defusing and control of conflicts possible for their city and for Europe to remain intact. It is only now, in a period of worldwide uncertainty, that many people have come to understand what degree of stability it has been possible to achieve for Berlin.

Stobbe stressed that the talks underway between the two German states have a special function in the present phase. They show that the policy of a balance of interests in Central Europe is continuing to function and they also indicate the determination not to allow the dialogue to break down even in a difficult situation.

Representatives Urge Support

LD241508 Hamburg DPA in German 1400 GMT 24 Apr 80

[Excerpt] In a unanimously adopted resolution the Berlin House of Representatives advocated "vigorously demonstrated solidarity" with the United States by the partners in the Western alliance. The resolution states that the Berliners in the western part of the city are conscious of the fact that they owe their life in freedom to the credible guarantee of this freedom by the United States and the other protecting powers. The House of Representatives regards the united efforts and measures of the United States and the West European states to restrict and resolve the crisis which has arisen in the Middle East as an expression of common interests.

DETERIORATION OF GERMAN-U.S. RELATIONS EXAMINED

DW231230 Bonn DIE WELT in German 22 Apr 80 p 5

[Hans Ruehl article: "German and Americans Do not Have Their Heart In It Any More"]

[Text] He who has observed German-American relations for years, knows what it means when official government authorities report more and more often that "everything is in the best of order": the rhetorical overkill actually signals that once again the transatlantic structure is crackling. Official relations between the governments in Bonn and Washington are presently as bad as never before since the end of World War II. The unfortunate visit of the chancellor to the United States, which at first was sold quite skillfully, the demonstratively cordial greeting given to his challenger by the American administration, the transatlantic tug-of-war about the Olympic boycott and the toilsome solidarity efforts by the German Government in matters of Iran have eliminated the last doubts that official German-American relations are at present about as low as zero.

There are sufficient reasons for it--dammed up reasons and new ones, acceptable ones and not understandable ones, short-term reasons and others which will have an effect in the long run. They have all depicted many times and they continue to be described. Current reportage of the daily press is on their tracks. Yet this reportage will always have to remain incomplete if one fails to realize what basic changes in German-American relations are hidden behind current events. So far these are not completed developments but first beginnings. However, they all point to the same direction: The dialogue via the Atlantic will become even more difficult in the future. In other words, the transatlantic estrangement has already begun.

The generation of the former American "war horses" is slowly dying out, a generation from the times of acute military danger and who had developed emotional ties to the young German democracy. They are being replaced by persons who have intelligence and the good will to cooperate, but lack the personal experience that isolationism is not a guarantee for peace and that the world can only be as free as America.

This new generation of American politicians and government officials sees the alliance with Europe much more soberly than their predecessors. One can already recognize that it will not hesitate to draw up an interim balance sheet of the alliance and to look at the result more closely. The demands addressed to the Europeans will continue to be made in a polite tone, but they will be represented with clear pressure and a description of possible consequences. The protective guarantee of the United States will become more expensive in the future--financially and politically.

On the German side also the ranks of those politicians become thinner who have experienced with awareness the United States as the liberator from a terrible dictatorship, as a generous helper in material misery and as a loyal friend in the days of danger for the young democracy, and who on their part have developed emotional links with the United States. They are being replaced by a generation of people who are after all 50 (Apel, Lambsdorff, Kiep, Biedenkopf, Woerner), who have studied or worked in the United States and who are united with the new world with many ties. But after them the prospects become dim.

While in the ranks of the CDU a young generation of politicians is gradually filling the back benches. This generation has grown up in well-being, freedom, and peace, and is greatly uninterested in foreign politics. [paragraph continues]

Great numbers of young SPD and FDP politicians are appearing who are not prepared to see the world as it is. For those who have been trained in anti-Americanism in the course of the Vietnam war, the Soviet Union is a state like any other state. Military facts are simply being ignored, let alone that the military and political options of the potential adversary are seen.

With regard to foreign and security policies, this young generation of the present government parties long ago embarked on the march back before the time of the Godesberg program, a time when the SPD was still demonstrating against ties with the West and against rearmament. Whoever has listened attentively to the statements of these young politicians on such issues as the neutron bomb and the modernization of NATO's nuclear medium-range potential knows that for them the times of "security policy compromises", which begun in 1959, have come to an end and that the option of a neutral Federal Republic can again be seriously put on the agenda.

But the personnel problem appears not only on the political level. Also in the press and in publications on both sides of the Atlantic a generation is beginning to retire whose historical experience made many journalists missionaries of close connections between the world power United States and resurrected Germany. Some few chief editors of the medium generation have been taking care of German-American relations, or they have used top-level personnel for it, but times are gone when the great national representatives of the press were simultaneously the trustees of close transatlantic connections. The priority that has been given in the past 10 years to domestic and social policies on this side of the Atlantic and on the other has also left its imprint. The field is dominated by the foreign correspondent who can make comprehensive reports, sober commentaries and who can be used everywhere. Meticulous books are being kept on mutual misunderstandings and common successes--but no heart blood is being shed any more.

Below the public level, where contacts between both sides of the Atlantic have not changed quantitatively but where they have clearly deteriorated qualitatively--and probably will continue to deteriorate--continually wider and deeper transatlantic cooperation is taking place in the sphere of business relations. But that is a very much specialized "dialogue" limited to "business" in the broadcast sense--but in any case a dialogue where both sides want to keep politics out. It seems that a homogeneous class of transatlantic salesmen has come about so that one can speak of a society with two languages, a society, however, whose common standards are not immaterial but material values.

Ties are not being created, if at all, then only connections. One's partner is by chance more likely to reside in another country, and if conditions are better, he can be exchanged at any time. A pragmatism which is far from politics and which is neutral toward values belongs to the system. One does not act out of convictions, but one carries out favorable options. One does not acquire friends, one seeks business partners. All in all: German-American relations have been highly personified, but simultaneously totally depoliticized--a mutually favorable opportunity, even a necessary instrument of mutual dependences, but politically there are limits to the strains that can be borne. In hard times, however, one needs friends who are also prepared to render assistence by making uneconomical decisions. As a complement to deep emotional ties between the political elites, these one dimensional economic relations between German and American businessmen are of great value, but as a substitute they are completely insufficient.

A glance at the training of the elites shows that an improvement of transatlantic relations cannot be expected to come from that side. In U.S. schools and colleges the anti-Vietnam generation is slowly nearing top positions. [paragraph continues]

Connected with the traditional ethnocentrism of the Americans, which is clearly reflected in school books, an isolationist mixture is coming about which is continuously enriched by current difficulties with the allies, and which can very quickly lead to listlessness, intolerance and eventually to a retreat to "fortress America."

In the Federal Republic the student revolt of the sixties filled the universities with smartly politicizing but professionaly very underqualified college teachers. For most of them the United States has long ceased to have the character of a political model. This generation of incidental college teachers no longer induces or guides any student to take a whiff of the air at U.S. institutes of higher learning. In the past several years the inclination of German students to study abroad has dropped to a third of what it was. Foreign scholarships are being offered wholesale, academic Germany is becoming provincialized.

Yet this is not all. The upward surge of the greens to form a political party which is permeated with young, educated people to an above average extent indicates the beginning of a cultural revolution. It seems as though the era of post-materialism has begun. There are comparable developments in the United States. Since the post-materialist movements in both countries are seriously interested in only one problem, the protection of the environment, and otherwise preach withdrawal into a small community, into private happiness, there is a lack of any understanding for an international beginning for the preservation of common interests.

On the level of the population, too, dramatic developments are beginning to take shape in the United States and the Federal Republic. After the United States had been considered the strongest military power for 30 years, the majority on this side and beyond the Atlantic are in the majority who consider the Soviet Union currently the dominant world power. Unless all indications are deceptive, the American people will insist on a strengthening of their own military forces.

In the Federal Republic of Germany, in contrast, such a development is at least doubtful. Granted, with determined leadership a strong contribution toward the strengthening of the military position would be possible in this country as well, but if this leadership is not exercised, the long shadow of the increasing Soviet military might will also be cast on the minds of the German people. This means no more and no less than that the generally human characteristic feature of tending toward the strongest may bring about a democratic change in the basis for doing business of the Atlantic alliance.

If we view the current policy of the German Government against this background we will fail to see any indication by and large of even a vague intention to correct the military imbalance. It was not without reason that it took the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan to cause the German defense minister to make up his mind to increase the defense budget by the promised 3 percent.

It is perhaps the most consequential development of the past few years that different scales of priorities regarding basic national values have emerged between the Federal Republic, on the one hand, and the United States, on the other. It was the raison d'etre of the Atlantic alliance to define freedom as the supreme political basic value. Every third person knew that NATO would defend itself against an aggression with military means, meaning that for the sake of the freedom of a member it was prepared to break the postulate concerning the preservation of peace. Meanwhile, utterances by the government parties which place peace above freedom almost come naturally.

The consequences are clear. They begin with the blurring of the differences between the internal and external enemies in freedom. They continue in the efforts toward subordinating defense capability to arms control despite precarious military power ratios. For the time being they find their conclusion in a policy of becoming friendly with the very one who could well violate peace and derive advantages for himself that way. The clocks run differently in the United States. In the national policy of all parties there the priority of freedom is uncontested. Without it there would no longer be any U.S. guarantee for Western Europe.

A deep cleft is opening between those wanting peace in freedom--and being prepared to pay a high price for it--and those who seek cheap peace at any cost and who will get a peace in fear and terror for it. There cannot be any working military alliance between a German "peace society" which would surrender in the event of an aggression and an American "freedom society" which would fight for its values.

What can be done to halt this development or at least to keep the damage within limits?

It is necessary to try to equalize the lack of experience in dealing with the problems of the other party through an exchange of elites. It is imperative that options be created for jointly gaining experience in which friendship and understanding for the interests of the other might grow. Nobody can be satisfied with an alliance which is exclusively based on rational calculation. New, emotional ties must be sought. Man does not live by bread alone--and the transatlantic alliance will probably not survive on the basis of sober realization of the political necessities.

The partners in the transatlantic dialogue must tell the truth again, not only to their adversaries but also to each other. The interest in the domestic and social policies of the other must not be misunderstood to be an intrusion into the internal affairs, but must be valued as the sympathy of a partner whose present and future destiny is being shared.

The NATO states must not just standardize their weapons systems, their tactical concepts and their strategic doctrines. First of all and above all the goals and prospects for social development must be standardized. In this process it must become clear that at least the Eurocommunists cannot be the ideal defenders of Western democracy against Soviet imperialism.

The threat must be made visible again, not where it does not or no longer exist nor in dimensions which are not justified. Yet this also means that the new economic dimensions of the threat be perceived at long last and taken seriously and that the political adversary be called by his proper name also where he merely abets or dispatches proxies. Today security cannot be defined either regionally or in one dimension militarily. Lenin once said that the way to Berlin leads via the Cape of Good Hope. This phrase should be remembered occasionally.

It must be made clear again to the peoples of the Atlantic Alliance, which currently outdo each other in demands on their national products, that security policy ranks a natural priority in the catalogue of national tasks. The greatest achievement of a government continues to be keeping its citizens free and alive.

Against the background of an new quality of threat it is necessary for the individual member states of the Atlantic alliance to do more thinking about their individual roles. The alliance, to be sure, will remain a predominantly military alliance led by the strongest military power. Yet the European NATO states must be aware that for many years the United States has not only borne the nuclear risk and the main financial burden, but has also largely footed the moral bill of the alliance. In the future it will be impossible to let the United States alone do all the unpleasant chores. At present security can no longer be had free of moral charge. The Atlantic alliance will survive only if there is a division of the moral burdens among the partners in the future.

WILLY BRANDT VIEWS EAST-WEST RELATIONS

LD241459 Hamburg DPA in German 1307 GMT 24 Apr 80

[Text] SPD Chairman Willy Brandt does not consider that the international crises over Afghanistan, Iran and the Middle East pose an acute danger of war, but he thinks that they do constitute a permanent threat for the immediate future. In an interview for the WESTFAELISCHE RUNDSCHAU (Friday edition) Brandt said that he is extremely concerned because the developments of the last few months have given rise to fears "that something may get out of control and have consequences which none of the leaders of the big states really want." His second fear is that an additional danger would arise in the eighties as a result of further increases in the arms race.

Brandt supports in principle a trip by Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt to the Soviet Union, to which Schmidt has been invited at the beginning of June. Brandt reiterated his view that a situation exists "in which one does not tear down bridges or break off contacts or fail to take advantage of an opportunity for talks." Brandt accused the CDU/CSU candidate for chancellor, Franz-Josef Strauss, who recently stated his own readiness to go to Moscow but who advised the chancellor against visiting the Soviet Union, of an ambivalent attitude.

The interview was prereleased to DPA today.

POLISH DEPUTY PREMIER ARRIVES IN BONN ON VISIT

[Excerpt] Bonn--Tadeusz Wrzaszczyk, Polish deputy premier, arrived in Bonn today for a visit. This evening he had an exchange of opinions with Otto Graf Lambsdorff, Federal economics minister. Tomorrow the two ministers will open the Polish National Exhibition "Poland 80--Country, People, Economy" in Dusseldorf and take part in a panel discussion with representatives from the two countries' economic sectors.

LATE REPORT: SCHMIDT WARNS AGAINST HASTY JUDGMENT OF RESCUE BID

LD251532 Hamburg DPA in German 1436 GMT 25 Apr 80

[Text] Bonn--Speaking to the SPD Executive today, Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt refrained from an assessment of the abortive U.S. attempt to free the hostages in Tehran and warned against over-hasty judgments because of the lack of information available at present.

It is reported that the chancellor expressed his understanding for the fact that the United States was taking steps because of the deep emotions of the American people in their concern for human lives. Schmidt compared these emotions with the anxiety of the German public over the Schleyer kidnapping case and the taking of hostages in the hijacked Lufthansa plane "Landshut."

REACTIONS TO U.S. RESCUE ATTEMPT REPORTED

LD251340 Paris Domestic Service in French 1100 GMT 25 Apr 80

[Excerpts] In the middle of the night in Washington, that is to say this morning in Paris, the White House announced that an operation started in Iran to try to rescue the hostages has failed and that it had to be stopped. A little while later it was learned that two airplanes, or one airplane and a helicopter, it is not yet known which, collided, and a little later this accident became the official White House version. No other information, among the very many reports and the numerous contradictory dispatches which have come to us, allows us to give a more official, or at any rate more precise, character to the events of this night. Well, (Denis Poncet) in Washington, there was a blackout this morning. Is there anything new now, while we wait for the speech that President Jimmy Carter is to make in an hour?

[Poncet] In less than an hour from now, President Carter will make a speech direct on television to the U.S. population and will then perhaps explain why the operation failed, and especially why it was attempted at a time when most of the U.S. military experts were opposed to it. (?It is worth knowing) that even before the accident, the White House had decided to cancel the operation after (?the failure) of equipment, and [words indistinct] is supposed to have collided. At least, this is what is affirmed by the Illinois Senator Charles Percy. In fact, the details are not known. Tonight (?sources) in the White House, in the State Department, and the Pentagon, all the state leaders, most of whom at least did not foresee the operation, have assembled, and their working session is continuing. For the moment Washington is still in a state of shock. The news this morning here [words indistinct] one can imagine that this (?exploit) will be politically costly for Jimmy Carter.

[Announcer] This operation was carried out in the greatest secrecy. The Quai d'Orsay made it known this morning that it had not been informed of the night's events.

The Elysee, as the Quai d'Orsay, says it was not informed of this failed operation. On the other hand, in the National Assembly this morning, Maxime Gremetz, in the name of the Communist group, has solemnly protested.

[Begin Gremetz recording] Mr President, news of extreme gravity has just reached us. Last night Mr Carter decided on a military operation against Iran. In the name of the communist group, I raise a solemn protest against this act of piracy (?committed) by the United States. The government cannot look on in silence on such an adventurist provocation. [Passage indistinct] ambiguity this policy of the gunboat. It can only make all people worried and [word indistinct] cooperation and friendship between peoples in conformity with article 58 of the law, I ask the assembly to pronounce in a vote on the suspension of the (?session), enabling the minister of foreign affairs to come and explain the position of the government. GROMYKO TALKS WITH LEADERS CONTINUE

[Text] Mr Andrey Gromyko, the Soviet foreign minister, is having lunch with Valery Giscard d'Estaing. Yesterday events in Afghanistan occupied the 3 and 1/2 hours of talks between Andrey Gromyko and Mr Jean Francois-Poncet, the French foreign minister. Completely laconic and very diplomatic communiques give no indication of whether the Soviet point of view has developed or of what the state of French-Soviet relation is a the moment.

This morning before this working lunch Valery Giscard d'Estaing had 1 hour and 20 minutes of talks with the Soviet minister, and there is no doubt that the Afghanistan issue was touched again.

Demonstration by Dissidents, Sympathizers

LD241233 Paris Domestic Service in French 1200 GMT 24 Apr 80

[Text] After 1 hour and 20 minutes of discussions with the president of the republic, the Soviet Minister of Foreign Affairs Andrey Gromyko considered the talks useful from all points of view. Mr Gromyko did not elaborate further but it is thought that East-West tension following the Afghanistan affair was discussed.

It should be noted that during this meeting between the head of state and Mr Gromyko, a demonstration of Soviet dissidents and French sympathizers was contained by police in the approaches to the Elysee: The demonstration numbered a total of only about 12 people and among them was the mathematician Leonid Plyushch and the former General Grigorenko. Bernard-Henri Levy and Professor Yankelevich were also there. They were calling for the release of political prisoners detained in the USSR.

Gromyko Comments on Talks

LD241522 Paris Domestic Service in French 1500 GMT 24 Apr 80

[Text] The USSR is determined to continue "relaxation," that is what Soviet Foreign Minister Andrey Gromyko has just said at the end of the luncheon he had at the Elysee. For the second time today Mr Gromyko has described the talks he had with the president of the republic as constructive and useful. We would like to believe, he added, that the talks will contribute to the development of relations between Paris and Moscow, relations which are not only in our joint interest but also in the interest of the whole world. We must overcome internationsl tensions, concluded Mr Gromyko. As for us, we work to this effect but everything does not depend on us. [words indistinct]

Further Remarks

NC241648 Paris AFP in English 1644 GMT 24 Apr 80

[By Claudine Canetti]

[Excerpts] Paris, April 24 (AFP)--Soviet Foreign Minister Andrey Gromyko today had what he later described as a "constructive and useful" meeting with President Valery Giscard d'Estaing, but the remark did not dispel the feeling of unease that has surrounded Mr Gromyko's "working visit" since he arrived here yesterday. It is Mr Gromyko's first Western visit since the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan.

"We should like to believe," he told reporters after meeting with Mr Giscard d'Estaing, "that these meetings will contribute to the development of continuing Franco-Soviet relations, which in our view should answer not only the interests of France and the Soviet Union but also those of the whole world.

"The Soviet Union is firm over the pursuit of detente and for overcoming difficulties that have developed in the international situation. We are working in that direction, but as you know, everything does not depend on us. It is our hope that France will work in the same direction."

This afternoon Mr Gromyko began a second round of talks with Foreign Minister Jean Francois-Poncet. On the agenda were problems concerning cooperation and security in Europe, including disarmament, and bilateral relations.

Statements by Presidential Spokesman

NC242224 Paris AFP in English 2204 GMT 24 Apr 80

[Excerpts] Paris, April 24 (AFP)--Talks today between French President Valery Giscard d'Estaing and Soviet Minister Andrey Gromyko here appear to indicate that "no initiative in the near future" should be expected from Moscow concerning a pullout of its forces from Afghanistan, a presidential spokesman said.

Even though Mr Gromyko depicted his meeting with the French president as "constructive and useful," Moscow's and Paris's positions on Afghanistan were described as totally divergent by informed French sources, both (?as concerns) the origins of the crisis and its scope and possible consequences.

Mr Giscard d'Estaing told his visitor that "the re-establishment of a climate of confidence requires an initiative to be taken leading to evacuation of Soviet forces from Afghanistan, so that that country, sheltered from foreign interference, may itself decide on its own [words indistinct] its policy of non-alignment," the presidential spokesman reported. It was then that the spokesman said no such Soviet initiative seemed to be in the offing.

According to the French Foreign Ministry, the question of the Moscow Olympics did not come up between the two foreign ministers, who, however, discussed the scheduled Madrid Conference on Cooperation and Security in Europe, the Middle East and Southeast Asia, with special stress on Kampuchea.

Also discussed was the state of bilateral relations, seen here as "satisfactory". On the French side, the atmosphere of the talks with Mr Gromyko was described as one of "seriousness and great frankness" that yielded unspecified "indications" suggesting "the usefulness for France to pursue the dialogue with the Soviet Union."

LE FIGARO: TIGHTEN LINKS WITH U.S. TO COMBAT SOVIETS

LD250833 Paris LE FIGARO in French 23 Apr 80 pp 1, 3

[Max Clos article: "What To Talk About?"]

[Text] Mr Gromyko arrives in Paris today. What is he going to talk about? About detente. Is this the real topic, when Soviet forces have been occupying Afghanistan for nearly 4 months and Moscow has manifestly shown no intention of withdrawing them?

The European governments have termed the Soviet military intervention "unacceptable." What have they employed to end this "unacceptable" situation? Speeches and communiques. Why? Because Europe lacks the means for concrete and effective action. Economic sanctions are dubbed "ineffective." A measure as modest as the boycott of the Olympic games is considered "derisory." Conclusion: The Afghan affair is already entered in the profit and loss column in parentheses. Above all let us not discuss it--like those family affairs which people of good breeding modestly pretend to ignore.

The worry is that, meanwhile, the world is blindly approaching a serious crisis and perhaps an armed conflict.

For 1 year the Soviet Union has been scoring points in various sectors of the world: Africa, the Far East, the Near East. The West appears to be submitting, without seeing that, for the Soviets, detente is simply one way, less expensive than others, of attaining a final aim so clearly displayed that no one can truly ignore it: the worldwide triumph of socialism.

Without seeing that negotiations with the communist bloc must begin with an exercise in decoding, since words do not have the same meaning on both sides of the Iran Curtain. Example: The Soviet forces have intervened in and are occupying Afghanistan. Wrong: For Moscow they have "liberated" that country and, by their presence, they are assuring the "protection of the people's forces."

In the face of communism, Europe does not exist. But it does not know this and devotes much time to justifying its shortcomings by reference to established fact and circumstantial argument. The established fact: We have neither the economic nor the military resources to resist the Soviets. Circumstantial argument: U.S. policy is erratic, President Carter is untrustworthy, he has not consulted his allies and, in any event, the important thing is not to align with Washington.

All this is true, for the most part; but what conclusion do we draw? Just one: Above all, do nothing which may displease Moscow.

If the response is negative there is no further problem. If--as we believe--it is unarguably positive, it will be high time to draw a few lessons from it.

It is correct that Europe does not have the resources to cope alone. In Luxembourg the Nine have had great difficulty in formulating the appearance of a joint policy on Iran. In Brussels lamb alone is inducing them to tear themselves apart.

Well? Well, if we believe that the danger exists, if we admit that we are incapable of coping alone, if we do not want to submit to the law of the strongest, what other solution is there but to tighten our links with the United States and--on an equal footing--to establish with it a timetable of measures?

Because ultimately, if the choice is between the American alliance and submission to the Soviets, how could we hesitate for long?

Of course, we could also continue singing: "Everything is fine, Madame la Marquise," to the point of catastrophe.

SAFEGUARDING INDEPENDENCE REQUIRES 'AMERICAN SOLIDARITY'

LD241201 Paris FRANCE-SOIR in French 20-21 Apr 80 pp 1, 7

[Benoit Rayski editorial: "The Real Deterrent"]

[Text] The alarming results of an opinion poll have just been published in the United States. This opinion poll was carried out by the Gallup Institute and published by the Washington POST. It shows that only 24 percent of the French people (compared with 70 percent of the British and 61 percent of the German people) believe in the need for American support in the event of Soviet aggression.

At first sight, this figure can give satisfaction to a legitimate feeling of national pride: The French people believe that France, France on its own, can face up to a huge Soviet Union without relying on U.S. support.

However, a moment of reflection will be sufficient to make you realize that, even though this attitude may show a certain courage--or a certain recklessness--it mainly shows an astonishing blindness coupled with a no less astonishing lethargy.

True, everything can be explained. Since France has a nuclear strike force--an indispensable precondition of its independence which has been said only too often to be sufficient by itself definitely to deter the USSR from an attack against our territory--why should the French, who are peace-loving people, not be willing to believe that they can sleep peacefully under the protection of their own shield alone?

Since France, or at any rate many of its political leaders, whether belonging to the majority or to the opposition, has been continually asserting for many years that it is and wants to be independent, if necessary and sometimes especially of the United States, why should the French people, who are rightly attached to their national identity, not believe that the American alliance was more of an encumbrance than a necessity?

Determination

And, finally, since France has long harshly criticized the two superpowers--the Soviet Union and the United States--to such an extent that sometimes, fortunately seldom, you might have believed that it was adopting an impartial attitude toward them, how could the French people not be influenced by all this to the point of imagining, obviously mistakenly, that they would be able to continue cultivating their garden unaffected by any American-Soviet conflict?

It is absolutely essential to correct these feelings and these views. Not in order to please the Americans but, in fact, to preserve France's independence. Not to arouse apocalyptic war hysteria but indeed to prevent war.

In fact, the Gallup poll makes clear that France lacks the only deterrent that counts and without which any missiles--French missiles in this case--are merely useless gadgets: that of minds, of psychological determination, of political clear-sightedness.

There can be no confrontation or even balanced dialogue with the USSR unless the French people firmly believe that their strike force must be supported by that of the United States.

However, there is everything to fear from the Soviet Union if it reaches the conclusion--and there have been opinion polls which show that it could be right--that the French people have no intention of appealing to American solidarity.

It is also to be feared that the United States, which is a nation like any other nation, that is, neither better nor worse, could one day decide to leave the French shores where it is being told that it is not needed.

Does this mean that, overcome with fear in the face of the Soviet Union, we should seek refuge under the American stars and stripes? Certainly not, this would be neither dignified nor useful.

What we should do is simply let the Soviets--and also all those French people who are either ignorant of the fact or have forgotten it--know that we are the United States' allies and friends--an indispensable condition for insuring that the United States is our ally and friend. This is the real deterrent.

GOVERNMENT EXPLORING SOVIET READINESS TO SOLVE AFGHAN CRISIS

AU250935 Rome ANSA in English 0830 GMT 25 Apr 80

[Text] Rome, April 25 (ANSA)--The Italian Government is currently exploring the possibilities of a "Soviet readiness" to the resolve the crisis resulting from Moscow's intervention in Afghanistan, according to Italian diplomatic chief Emilio Colombo. Speaking to the Foreign Affairs Commission of the Rome lower house on the 1980 budget yesterday, Colombo also outlined EEC moves on the Iranian hostages crisis. According to Colombo, the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan was "unacceptable" and "must be modified."

"In the current phase," he said, "diplomatic channels must be kept at work continually to actively promote indispensable probes and contacts."

"The government is exploring the possibilities of a Soviet readiness to resolve the crisis," he stressed, also noting that the EEC proposal for a neutral Afghanistan was currently being illustrated by EEC diplomats in the capitals of Third World and non-aligned countries.

"It is the Nine's conviction that the Third World Countries should play a particularly significant role", Colombo said. In this context, he reported that Italy attaches "great political value" to the support for the EEC proposal voiced by the Kuala Lumpur session of the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN) and the interest shown by Third World governments and organizations.

Colombo added that great importance was attached here to the Madrid follow-up of the Helsinki Conference on European Security and Cooperation. According to the Italian diplomatic chief, the outcome of the meeting will depend largely on the behavior of some of the participants, above all the Soviet Union. It is largely up to them if, during the next few months, it is possible to establish the climate of confidence required to achieve concrete results, he said. For Italy, he added, respect for human rights are an essential factor in East-West detente.

On the Iranian hostage crisis, Colombo said the decisions taken by the EEC foreign ministers in Luxembourg on April 21 primarily took account of two factors:

The Nine's "re-affirmed solidarity" with the United States.

Their realization that the Iranian Government is not in a position to provide "precise assurances" on the timing and means for the hostages' release.

According to Colombo, despite the Nine's decision to reduce their diplomatic staff in Iran, the EEC ambassadors had been instructed to return to Tehran to brief on the Iranian authorities on the decisions which had been taken. At the same time, they were to follow developments in the situation with "particular reference to efforts to improve the hostages' conditions while awaiting their release," he reported. Italy's, and the EEC's hope at the present time can be no other than that their appeals will be heard by the Iranian authorities," Colombo added.

COLOMBO STATES DECISION ON OLYMPICS UP TO NATIONAL COMMITTEE

AU250945 Rome ANSA in English 0840 GMT 25 Apr 80

[Text] Rome, April 25 (ANSA)--Italian Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo has confirmed here the Rome Government's view that it is up to the national olympic committees to decide whether or not to take part in the Moscow Olympics this summer.

Addressing the lower house Foreign Affairs Commission here yesterday, Colombo said that Italy, like numerous other West European countries, recognizes that the Olympic committees should take an autonomous decision on the question. But he also said that the committees' decision should not exclude consideration of the international situation. "In recognizing the autonomy of the national Olympic committees," he said, "the European countries agree on the principle that the Soviet Union is responsible for the lack of the conditions and spirit in which the games must be held."

By the same token, he pointed out, it was up to the Soviet Union to enable a return to a situation "which permits everyone to take part."

AU240927 Rome ANSA in English 0840 GMT 24 Apr 80

[Text] Rome, April 24 (ANSA)--A mission sent by the Palestinian National Council has arrived here for contacts with Italian political forces with a view to stepping up pressure on the Rome Government to recognize the Palestinian Liberation Organization. The Palestinian National Council is the "parliament" that represents various political and military groups under the umbrella "PLO" organization.

The delegation which arrived here Wednesday is made up of Khalid al-Hasan, Ibrahim Sus, Muhammad Khalifah and (Falua Abu Kadra).

On Wednesday they met with Socialist, Republican and Proletarian Democrat M.P.'s. Today they will meet with representatives from Italy's two largest parties: the Christian Democrats and the Communists.

The mission arrived in Rome from Brussels where in days past a much larger group of Palestinian leaders met with the various commission of the European Parliament. This delegation then split up, with the various groups going to Rome, London, Paris and Bonn.

Italian Socialists guaranteed their full support to the Palestinian people's fight for liberty and self-determination and for recognition of the PLO as this people's legitimate representative.

L'UNITA ASSESSES HISTORICAL PERSPECTIVE OF CCP-PCI CONTACTS

LD241323 Rome L'UNITA in Italian 20 Apr 80 pp 1, 19

[Alfredo Reichlin editorial: "Thinking Also About Young People and 'Failed Myths'"]

[Text] It is too early to assess the political results of Berlinguer's visit to China. But many things strike us already. Our impression is one of an event whose significance cannot be gauged solely by the yardstick of political diplomacy. Who are the travelers who have arrived in Beijing? What do they represent? And how do Mao's successors view them? In short: What kind of unprecedented problems do they pose for each other?

It is not a matter of great charismatic leaders or states meeting each other; we are not impressed by the symbolism, the "turning point," the "coup de theatre." The reports, the gestures and the words--even though they are so heedful of etiquette and so carefully weighed in accordance with the rules of diplomacy--reveal something else: The awareness that the problems which are on the agenda and are being discussed are important and crucial, but they are not all the problems. They evoke others. Those observers who devote all their attention to what words are said or are not said about the USSR are mistaken. This is not the real significance of the visit to China, whatever the actual balance sheet, which will only be drawn up at its conclusion. It is something else.

There is a part of Europe which is not that of the old ruling classes and is at last independently seeking (that is, as a historically and culturally part of the European workers movement) to come face to face with what China means, not as a pawn in a power game or even as a new market to be exploited, but historically. That is--in practice--with the enormous and irreplacable role which it is destined to play in a world which is heading toward momentous changes, such as, for instance, the doubling of its population in 20 years' time.

Hence the real danger of catastrophe and war, if this world is not controlled. But by whom and how? In accordance with what guiding ideas and what views of the historic movement? Does anybody believe that the answer can come from the rapacious thinking of the multinationals or from explosions of racial or religious fanaticism, headed by some charismatic leader?

New Scale of Problems

Before the rift, some 20 years ago, when communist delegations met normally in Beijing or elsewhere, the problems were different. The change lies here: Not only and not so much in what difference there is within the communist movement but in the change in the world scene and in the new and gigantic scale of the problems. And it is this, far more than the polemics with the USSR, which explains the welcome received by Berlinguer, the unprecedented importance attached to the event and the unusual enthusiasm of an entire leadership group. There is far more in all this--we believe--than a politico-diplomatic operation. Perhaps--here is the subject of our reflection--there is an awareness that we are not only a communist party or one of the many groups of Western visitors which come and go in China. We are a certain way of thinking, a certain Western Marxism which as far back as the Yalta Memorandum was viewing the problem of China as a problem not of ideological struggle but of the reinterpretation of reality and of understanding the changes in the world and thus the real contradictions which lay behind those conflicts. For this reason Togliatti turned the problem of excommunication into one of giving a positive and innovatory answer to the unresolved contradictions, adding, however, that the key to such an answer also lay here in Europe, in the West, in the European working class's ability to reopen the paths of a revolution at the apogee of capitalist development. [paragraph continues]

Only in this way, by beginning to change the structural relationship between Europe and the Third World, could the workers' movement place its international strategy on a realistic basis again and recover a receptive audience among the oppressed peoples.

A Constructive Process

It is really not a matter of rifts or changes of camp. What does breaking mean? And whom should we excommunicate? A country, a reality, such as the USSR, whose historic role will have to be debated again far more seriously? If this is the dialogue which is starting in Beijing, we are witnessing the beginning of a constructive process, which, even though amidst polemics and misunderstandings, could lead toward a new structure for all the forces of peace and progress.

There is much talk about the crisis of Marxism and socialism, about the need to seek a new rationality and about the collapse of all myths. We too are talking about it. But we wonder whether it is not events such as these (together with the other important fact of the return in Europe to a joint quest between communists and socialists--for the first time in 20 years--for a third path as an answer to the crisis of the state and of capitalist civilization itself) that form the material basis for a new rationalism. This is new, of course, because so too are the historical events of which the crises of the old myths and the old ideological constructions are merely a consequence--largely inevitable, moreover. And the fact that there is so much discussion within Western culture of innovation without in fact managing to come to terms with it, is grave and is exerting a negative influence. We wonder whether this is happening because it is being dismissed as an agglomeration of meaningless indications and factors, of fragments of truth and life instead of interpreting the world on the basis of its reality and therefore its increasingly close interconnections. In this way one conceals it from oneself and from the new generations: This is what we are concerned about and this is why we are hazarding these reflections. There is an insufficient awareness of the fundamental phenomenon of our time which, after all, is not the collapse of old myths, but something quite different: An objective and awesome process of interaction on a world level among the economic, financial and political mechanisms and among the ideological systems which operate in various regions. When has a Muslim cleric ever exerted such influence on the United States? And when has the fate of billions of people depended so much on the decisions of a few multinationals? So what? So the world is changing. Of course; it is true that it is becoming more complicated. But the question is this: Is the significance, the structure and the specificity of the changes such that it is becoming increasingly futile to consider plans for change--or increasingly necessary and possible?

I repeat: I do not know what the political and diplomatic results of the visit to China will be. But, irrespective of this, something has already happened which strikes us forcefully. This is the unprejudiced dialogue between two fundamental histories and cultures with a view to initiating the building of a new world order. It would be hasty to see in this proof (one's mind goes back to the crisis among the young) that we are not witnessing the end of all hope and every truth, but the fact that at last the need for socialism is reemerging without preconceptions from the things, the real and explosive contradictions which the capitalist system can no longer govern? Therefore, it is a matter of humanizing history, not negating it. [paragraph continues]

Once again everything centers on the struggle for peace. And this change will not take place unless the horizon is extended in this way. Unless the left manages to connect the motivations of the West with those of the endless masses of people who want to determine their own destiny--on pain of complete ungovernability and therefore disaster and barbarism.

There is food for thought in the fact that the man who addressed the students at Beijing University, following the storm of the Cultural Revolution, spoke the language of politics and history, of the specific analysis of the specific situation and not of theology, sometimes disguised as Marxism or of the extremist and "sublime" act of a false and self-consuming revolutionarism. This should say something to a leftwing world (including ourselves) which should now rouse itself, think big again and rediscover faith and impetus not in myths but in the ability to reinterpret the world--the real world, not its appearances and forms--with new eyes.

L'UNITA COMMENTS ON ZAGLADIN INTERVIEW ON COMMUNIST POLEMICS

LD231547 Rome L'UNITA in Italian 20 Apr 80 p 20

[Text] The edition of the weekly EPOCA which will appear on the newsstands tomorrow publishes an interview with Comrade Vadim Zagladin, first deputy chief of the CPSU Central Committee International Section.

The interview covers a large number of the present problems in international politics, but centers on the problems behind certain polemics among communist parties.

When asked to issue a verdict on the Italian Communists' decision not to attend the Paris meeting promoted by the PCF and Polish United Workers Party, having put forward in the most general manner the reasons which led to the CPSU to attend the meeting (the peace struggle) and having said he is certain "That the Paris meeting will provide a further confirmation of the communist parties' active role in the struggle for peace and disarmament," Zagladin states verbatim that "the Soviet communists would be sorry if the Paris meeting were not attended by the representatives of the party of Gramsci and Togliatti, who did so much to unmask imperialist militarism and for the struggle against the dangers of war prompted by its actions."

There is reason to wonder what point there is in talking this way. Everyone knows the arguments and concerns which led the PCI (and a not inconsiderable number of other communist parties) not to participate in the Paris meeting, considering it inopportune at this moment precisely with a view to an effective struggle for disarmament and detente.

Our judgments and arguments can be refuted, confuted and criticized. But they must not be ignored, merely implying that the PCI does not regard peace and disarmament as its fundamental task. We will not follow Zagladin along this path. We will not ascribe unknown intentions to those who have proposed an initiative in forms and with contents of which we do not approve. We will continue to put forward our arguments, in the belief that the debate can only exist and be useful to everyone if it proceeds from each side's real positions.

The same considerations apply to Zagladin's verdict on the Afghan situation. It is true that he begins by stating that "every communist party, being independent and autonomous, determines its own stance on any issue by itself, in accordance with its principled positions and the extent to which it is acquainted with and understands the problems." But, having said this, the entire answer to the reason for the conflict over the military intervention in Afghanistan boils down to the following over-simplified reasoning: The Afghans summoned us to defend them from the outside U.S. aggression; the CPSU, "as a revolutionary party, considers it to be its duty to help the cause of the revolution...and to defend it from the attacks of reactionary and imperialist forces." The position of those who disagreed with this is, "To say the least"--however legitimate--this is something which "does not help the Afghan revolution and, in general, the struggle against the forces of war and imperialism in Asia."

Obviously these are not the real elements of the issue. Our party has raised considerations of principle and fact with which we must come to terms. The errors of extremism and even putschism committed by the Afghan leaders and their advisers, to the extent of losing all mass support, are a fact; it is also a fact that under such conditions no outside intervention can salvage a revolution. If anything, it might jeopardize any chance of it succeeding for an entire historical era. It is a fact that reactions to the Soviet military intervention among the very countries of Asia, Africa and Latin America have weakened and split the nonaligned movement itself, which has certainly not strengthened the people's struggle against imperialism. Therefore, in short, one could say that the principle of every country's sovereignty coincides with the principle that in order for revolutions to be such they must be carried out by the people and must rest on the consensus of the masses.

At another juncture in the interview Zagladin, pointing out that there are no relations between the CPSU and the CCP, asserted that the responsibility for the split lies with the Chinese but did not, however, accentuate the polemic. The Soviet leader simply states that "the CPSU can never accept" the conditions which the CCP sets as a precondition for reestablishing relations between the parties, namely "the abandonment... of all decisions establishing the condemnation of the personality cult, the desire never again to permit anything similar and the CPSU's opinion on fundamental issues such as the need for and possibility of peaceful coexistence and the need for detente, the growth in the possibility of a peaceful transition from capitalism to socialism, particularly using parliamentary forms of struggle as well as extraparliamentary ones."

In connection with a possible resumption of the Soviet-U.S. dialogue Zagladin's answers were extremely harsh, as was his general tone with respect to the United States: "The question should not be put to us...ask Washington for the answer." The detente process, Zagladin stressed, "has been slowed up" by the actions of the United States and NATO, which "are not restricted at all to the decisions on Euromissiles."

Was he optimistic or pessimistic with regard to Cuba's mediation for a solution to the Afghan problem? "The efforts undertaken by the Cuban Government," he said, "can only prompt a feeling of satisfaction. As for their possible results, they do not depend solely on the good will of Cuba and Afghanistan, which is obvious, but also on the good will of the other parties concerned, starting with Pakistan."

In answer to a question concerning the Soviet leaders' verdict on Eurocommunism, Zagladin gave the following diplomatic reply: "As far as I can see, the problems of 'Eurocommunism' are of great interest to the bourgeois press in Italy and many other countries. We read with interest its most varying comments in this connection."

SHIPS BRUSH WITH SOVIET FRIGATE, UNKNOWN SUBMARINE

[Ritzaus bureau report: "Soviet Frigate Rams Danish Minelayer"]

[Text] The Danish minelayer Fyen, one of the navy's largest ships, was rammed on Friday by a Soviet frigate in the Baltic off Bornholm. According to Defense Command the Fyen is at present observing a large Warsaw Pact exercise in the Baltic, and the Russians presumably grew tired of the Danish Naval vessel on Friday. The Russian frigate therefore began to harass the Fyen, with the result that it rammed the ship across its bows. This resulted in small material damage. The collision between the two ships took place a little way north of Gdansk on the Polish Baltic coast.

According to Naval Operational Command in Aarhus, a Soviet frigate of the 960-ton Mirka class, much smaller than the Danish frigates, sailed alongside the Fyen. For a while the two ships sailed side by side, with an ever-decreasing distance between them. The collision happened when the frigate suddenly altered course across the Fyen's bow, and the minelayer had no chance to take evasive action.

A fishing boat from Bornholm had to cut its trawl on Friday afternoon while fishing in the Baltic, when it caught a submarine in its net, Naval Operations Command in Aarhus reports. The trawler, the R189 from Ronne, owned by Poul Dich of Nexo, was 14 miles east southeast of Nexo when the submarine entered its trawl and dragged it at a speed of 6 knots; the ship therefore cut its trawl. There was no question of any great danger at any time, the navy said. Present information shows that the submarine was neither Danish nor West German.

PLANS FOR SANCTIONS AGAINST IRAN ANNOUNCED

NC241842 Paris AFP in English 1837 GMT 24 Apr 80

[Excerpt] Oslo, April 24 (AFP)--Norway, in a stand apparently stronger than that taken by the European Economic Community, said today it will break economic relations with Iran if all the U.S. hostages held in Tehran are not freed by May 17. Members of the EEC have threatened to impose economic sanctions on Iran as quickly as possible after May 17 if the 53 hostages held since November 4 are not released by then. But the Norwegian Government's decision, reached today and announced tonight, appeared to go further in setting May 17, in effect, as the date its sanctions will take hold.

GILMOUR COMMENTS IN COMMONS ON RESCUE ATTEMPT

LD251056 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1017 GMT 25 Apr 80

[By PA parliamentary staff]

[Text] Britain was not consulted in advance of the Americans' abortive attempt to rescue the 50 hostages held in Tehran, Deputy Foreign Secretary Sir Ian Gilmour told the Commons in answer to an emergency question today. But "we were informed of the possibility of rescue," he added.

A sombre House of Commons heard Sir Ian say it was not "a suitable moment" to criticise the U.S. leadership.

Of the unsuccessful rescue attempt, he said: "It appears to have been an unlucky technical fault."

Sir Ian told MP's "we were not involved," and later, "I don't condemn the action."

Sir Ian confirmed reports from Washington. He said: "The mission had to be abandoned because of an equipment failure."

He said eight American crew members were killed and others were injured when two U.S. aircraft collided over an airfield in Iran.

"The Americans involved in the operation have now been airlifted from Iran," Sir Ian added.

GOVERNMENT PROTESTS BRITISH OFFICIAL GILMOUR'S STATEMENTS

NC241117 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1030 GMT 24 Apr 80

[Text] The Government of the Republic of Cyprus has made representations to Britain protesting the latest statements made by the Lord Privy Seal and British Deputy Foreign Secretary Sir Ian Gilmour, on the Cyprus issue.

According to an official statement, following a decision by the Council of Ministers, Foreign Minister Rolandhis today summoned British High Commissioner Rhodes and made representations, protesting Sir Ian Gilmour's statements on the Turkish invasion in Cyprus, the occupation of territory in Cyprus by the Turkish troops and the withdrawal of Turkish troops. Mr Rolandhis expressed the Cyprus Government's bitterness and disappointment over the statements by Sir Ian Gilmour. Furthermore, Mr Rolandhis asked the British Government for an explanation of the statements that have offended the feelings of the Cypriot people; for almost 6 years they have had to sustain the repercussions of a foreign invasion and occupation--in contravention of the UN resolutions--without any effective measures being taken for the implementation of the principles and rules of international law.

With regard to the financial aspect of the British bases issue, Mr Rolandhis has said to the British high commissioner that the Cyprus Government demands a significant amount, details of which are included in a memorandum to be presented soon. The minister has also stressed: Sir Ian Gilmour's statement on this matter is not acceptable to the ment in the light of the provisions of the treaty of establishment. Mr Rhodes has said he will convey what the foreign minister had told him to his government.

Denktas Comment

TA241150 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1115 GMT 24 Apr 80

[Text] President Denktas has repeated that Turkey had intervened in Cyprus in accordance with her international commitments and created the basis for the establishment of a partnership government in Cyprus by the two national communities of the island. He was commenting on the Greek Cypriot reaction to statements which had been made by the British Deputy Foreign Secretary Sir Ian Gilmour, at a press conference before his departure for London at the end of a 5-day visit to Cyprus.

He said that the Greek Cypriots should give up attacking anyone who had not said, contrary to their wish, that Turkey had invaded Cyprus. President Denktas said that it was a natural right of the Turkish Cypriot community to take the necessary measures for the security of life and property of its members in a bizonal federation. He stressed that attempts to describe as an invasion the Turkish action of saving the Turkish Cypriot community from annihilation were the best example of Greek Cypriot bad faith, intransigence and anti-Turkish feelings. He said he wanted to believe that the Greek Cypriot community was mature enough to evaluate this realistically.

ERKMEN SAYS IRAN WILL NOT RECEIVE AID IN BREAKING EMBARGO

TA241657 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 24 Apr 80

[Text] Foreign Ministr Hayrettin Erkmen, who participated in the Turkish-EEC joint parliamentary committee meetings held in Luxembourg, has returned to Turkey. Replying to reporters questions at Esenboga Airport, Erkmen said that in the event Western countries definitely impose an economic embargo on Iran, Turkey will not be used as an instrument for exporting goods to Iran. Erkmen said; Our relations with Iran will continue. However, Turkey will on no account fill the place of anyone else. In reply to a question on Turkey's views regarding the economic embargo which the United States will impose on Iran, Erkmen said: Turkey believes that this step by the United States is based on a concrete situation, and that so long as this situation continues, the problem cannot be solved. While expressing this view, Turkey has taken into consideration its special status, its historic and spiritual ties with Iranians and with the Iranian people. Replying to a journalist who recalled reports to the effect that in the event of a definite embargo by the West against Iran, Iran would secure its needs via Turkey, Erkmen said: Turkish-Iranian relations are special due to the two countries' proximity as well as to the close ties between the two nations. We will not do what others do not do. If other countries decide not to sell goods to Iran and try to export their goods via Turkey, we will not be an instrument in this. We will maintain our relations with Iran. However, Turkey will on no account replace anyone else.

Erkmen later gave information on the Turkish-EEC joint parliamentary committee meetings. Noting that Turkish-EEC relations were reviewed during the meetings, Erkmen added that Turkey's wish for full membership in the Community was favorably received by the EEC parliamentarians on the committee. He noted that a recommendation adopted on the issue will be submitted to the Turkish Grand National Assembly and the parliaments of the EEC member countries. He said that during his stay in Luxembourg he had the opportunity to hold bilateral talks with the current chairman of the Community's ministerial council, the Italian deputy foreign minister and the foreign minister of Luxembourg. He added that he had also been briefed on the council's recent meeting. Erkmen said that on his way back he stopped in Bonn at the invitation of FRG Foreign Minister Genscher. He added that they exchanged views on Turkish-FRG relations and international developments. He concluded by saying that the date for Turkey's application for full membership in the EEC will be determined at the joint parliamentary committee meeting to be held in Ankara at the end of May.

NATO SPOKESMAN NOTES LACK OF CONSULTATION IN RESCUE ATTEMPT

LD251440 Paris Domestic Service in French 1200 GMT 25 Apr 80

[Excerpts] We now take a look at reactions to the hostage rescue attempt which are going on.

NATO General Secretary Joseph Luns, foresees a very strong Iranian reaction. He thinks the U.S. raid has complicated the situation. Still on the matter of NATO, it has to be noted that the allies of the United States were not informed of what they were preparing. There was no consultation whatsoever, said the NATO spokesman. Only London, apparently, was informed of the possibility of a U.S. operation. This is what a British Foreign Ministry spokesman has just said, and he added: A distinction has to be made between a rescue attempt and a military action against Iran. Everyone knows that the United States has shown the greatest moderation during the past months. The Foreign Ministry also said: it is not the right moment to criticize the U.S. leadership.

OFFICIALS EXPRESS SURPRISE AT IRAN RESCUE ATTEMPT

NC251117 Paris AFP in English 1110 GMT 25 Apr 80

[Text] Brussels, April 25 (AFP)--The abortive United States operation in Iran sowed consternation among European Economic Community (EEC) officials here today because the U.S. failed to consult first with its West European allies. Some EEC officials said they were disappointed and bitter. They expected the abortive hostage rescue bid would be a leading topic at the EEC summit in Luxembourg on Sunday and Monday.

One senior official said: "The EEC reluctantly agreed to a programme of sanctions against Iran, believing them to be useless and harmful vis-a-vis Tehran. It agreed to them in order to back up the Americans and dissuade them from intervening militarily in Iran."

A Danish source expressed "great surprise" that the U.S. did not warn its West European allies before embarking on this military operation.

A Belgian source also showed surprise, especially in the light of last Tuesday's EEC decision on sanctions.

PRIME MINISTER COMMENTS ON EUROPEAN VISITS, EEC

LD242210 Lisbon in Portuguese to Europe 1930 GMT 24 Apr 80

[Text] Prime Minister Sa Carneiro returned to Lisbon today from a European tour that took him to Strasbourg, Luxembourg and Copenhagen. Speaking to journalists upon his arrival at Lisbon Airport, the prime minister said:

[Begin recording] During these past 3 days I have been first in Strasbourg, where at the invitation of the chairman of the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe I delivered a speech to the Council. Then, accompanied by the minister of foreign affairs and the secretary of state for integration in Europe, I traveled to Luxembourg and finally to Copenhagen. It was yet another tour of some capitals of EEC member countries which the government believed was necessary to make in order to stress the interest of our country and our government in a speedy accession to the common market, to convey our view on the problems connected with this matter and on the development of the accession timetable which was agreed upon a few months ago by the Portuguese foreign minister and the EEC authorities in Brussels, a timetable which was subsequently confirmed by EEC President Roy Jenkins here in Lisbon. In addition to this, we had the opportunity to personally propose to the prime ministers and ministers of foreign affairs of the countries in question our plans for joint action in this sphere. These kinds of intensive personal contacts are in fact necessary and advantageous to speed up our accession to the EEC and better defend Portugals' interests.

Apart from this matter, which was the main purpose of our visits to Luxembourg and Denmark, we also naturally dealt with issues pertaining to the strengthening of bilateral relations, since there were no particular problems to be settled with either of those two countries, and also jointly assessed the worrisome international situation obtaining at the moment, as well as the measures taken by the EEC foreign ministers. We are highly pleased with the positive results of our visits and with the support given to our country by both Luxembourg and Denmark with regard to a speedy accession to the Common Market. In this connection we also noted that no substantial problems have been raised by either country with regard to the present negotiations. They are therefore in a position to support and defend our cause with more ease than some other EEC countries which have specific problems--or rather, which have specific sectors which may raise a few problems regarding the transition period or certain adjustment schemes. In both countries we met with the respective heads of state, prime ministers and foreign ministers with whom we had long working sessions.

NEWSPAPERS NOTE 'RIFT' IN CONSTITUTIONAL COMMITTEE

LD241214 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 0600 GMT 24 Apr 80

[Text] The Lisbon Daily O DIA and the weeklies TEMPO and even EXPRESSO, although with a question mark, reported today that the constitutional committee has declared as unconstitutional a decree-law demarcating the public and private sectors of the economy which was redrafted by the government and sent to the president of the republic for promulgation. The newspapers said that the committee's ruling this time has caused a rift in the 9-member committee, whose chairman is Lt Col Melo Antunes. At least three of the four judges who are the appointed members of the constitutional committee have tendered their resignation, arguing that political reasons prevailed over legal ~~ones~~ in the ruling that the legislation is unconstitutional. Their view is said to be shared by a fourth constitutional expert, (Figueiredo) Dias. The five committee members who voted in favor of the ruling were Melo Antunes, Jorge Miranda, (Nuncio) Almeida, Jorge Campinos, and (Amancio) Ferreira, the newspapers said.

Denial by Antunes

LD241426 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 1200 GMT 24 Apr 80

[Text] Lt Col Melo Antunes, chairman of the constitutional committee, categorically denied that any members of the constitutional committee had resigned over the ruling by the committee that the redrafted decree-law demarcating the public and private sectors of the economy was unconstitutional. Lt Col Melo Antunes was interviewed by our reporter Cardoso Pinto a short while ago. The newspapers O DIA and TEMPO reported this morning that at least three of the committee members had resigned over the criteria on which the ruling was based.

UK, FRANCE, FRG AGREE ON BUILDING NEW FIGHTER PROTOTYPE

LD241325 Paris LE MONDE in French 13-14 Apr 80 p 16

[Unattributed report: "Agreement Between European Manufacturers on Construction of a New Fighter Plane"]

[Text] The Marcel Diassault (France) Messerschmidtt-Boelkow-Blohm (FRG) and British Aerospace (Britain) companies have just agreed in principle on the construction of a fighter plane designed to replace the German Air Force Phantoms and F-10s and the Royal Air Force and French Air Force Jaguars in the nineties. The agreement, which was reached between the three companies at the end of March, is the result of a series of technical working meetings held in the Paris region over 6-7 weeks.

This agreement follows plans to revive the European arms coproduction which the three countries' governments want. Moreover, it is hoped that industrial circles will take a final decision in 1981 since this major deal would relate to the manufacture of around 700 planes.

While some agreement emerged during the meetings on the machine's general characteristics--a single-seater, twin-jet plane with delta wings capable of flying at mach 2--a number of details still have to be decided, and interests diverge somewhat on these points. For instance, as far as the plane's mission is concerned, the Germans are seeking a plane to win air superiority with a wide radius of action, while the French would like a tactical support plane for the battlefield and behind the battlefield and the British would like a relatively multirole plane.

Similarly, the three companies will have to agree on an engine for the plane. The British and, to a lesser degree, the Germans are apparently in favor of the RB-199 jet which the Tornado has, while the French are ardent supporters of their National Aircraft Engine Design and Construction Company's M-88 which, according to them, has a better performance--8 tons thrust as against 7.5 tons--than its British rival. In addition, it is at present planned for only 30 percent of the weapons systems required for the different countries' needs to be joint, and some people think that this is not enough.

Whatever happens, the three European manufacturers have decided to build 2 experimental prototypes and 10 pre-series prototypes in order to develop the plane's design. The first flight would not take place before 1984.

REPORTAGE ON IMF MEETINGS, CONSULTATIONS IN HAMBURG

Cooperation on Propping Up Yen

OW251301 Tokyo KYODO in English 1125 GMT 25 Apr 80

[Text] Hamburg, April 25, KYODO--Japanese Finance Minister Noboru Takeshita and his West German counterpart Hans Matthoefer Friday confirmed that the financial and monetary authorities of the two countries would continue to cooperate to prevent the exchange value of the Japanese yen from depreciating too much.

The mutual confirmation resulted from their talks here Friday morning on the future of a four-party agreement reached and announced last March 2 by the monetary authorities of the U.S., West Germany, Switzerland and Japan on the defense of the yen. According to the agreement, monetary authorities in the U.S., West Germany and Switzerland have occasionally intervened in the exchange markets of their countries to help prop up the yen. The Takeshita-Matthoefer meeting took place just before the opening of a new session of the International Monetary Fund's interim committee in Bern Friday afternoon.

No Accord on 'Substitution Account'

OW250436 Tokyo KYODO in English 0257 GMT 25 Apr 80

[Text] Hamburg, April 25, KYODO--Finance ministers from 10 major industrial countries failed Thursday to reach a final agreement on the establishment of the substitution account, a new mechanism designed to stabilize their foreign exchange markets. At a meeting held here prior to Friday's session of the interim committee of the International Monetary Fund (IMF), the ministers from Japan, the United States, West Germany and seven other leading industrial countries exchanged views on the issue. They agreed on the basic need to set up the substitution account but failed to iron out the differences on technical problems involved, such as how the account should be operated.

[Words indistinct] at this autumn's annual joint meeting of the IMF and the World Bank in Washington. There had been hopes that the establishment of the account, designed to absorb surplus dollars held by central banks outside the United States for exchange market stabilization, might be agreed at the interim committee meeting for formal presentation to the IMF-World Bank joint meeting.

Japanese Finance Minister Noboru Takeshita told the meeting of the finance ministers that Japan advocates early establishment of the account. But the ministers failed to agree on the establishment, chiefly because of a difference of views between the United States and European nations, conference sources said. The United States appears to have lost interest in the substitution account idea following a recent appreciation of the U.S. dollar, the sources said.

Turkish Minister's Meetings

TA250700 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 0430 GMT 25 Apr 80

[Text] Finance Minister Ismet Sezgin, who is in Hamburg for the committee meetings of the IMF and the World Bank, held separate meetings with FRG Finance Minister Hans Matthoefer and OECD Secretary General Emile van Lennep. Our correspondent in Hamburg reports that the economic and financial issues between Turkey and the FRG as well as the issue of the postponement of debts were discussed at the meetings.

Meanwhile, in an interview with the Voice of Germany, Finance Minister Sezgin said that the recent economic measures are beginning to yield their results in Turkey. He noted that, following the measures, Turkey's export revenues were rising and import demands beginning to be met.

Sezgin Bilateral Contacts Continue

TA260816 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 0430 GMT 26 Apr 80

[Excerpts] Finance Minister Ismet Sezgin, who is in Hamburg to attend the IMF and World Bank committee meetings, is continuing his bilateral contacts with the finance ministers of various countries. In a statement after his meetings with the finance ministers of France, Austria, Belgium and Yugoslavia, Sezgin said that he was happy to have found the opportunity to meet with his counterparts while attending the committee meetings at which international economic problems were discussed. Sezgin said: During my contacts I mainly dwelt upon the second phase of the economic support extended to Turkey at the OECD meeting in Paris, namely the postponement of debts. We have agreed upon the rapid conclusion of efforts in this direction.

French Economic Minister Monory, in a statement, said that he will help FRG Finance Minister Matthoefer in his efforts to eliminate Turkish economic problems. Monory is expected to arrive in Turkey next month to hold talks on the issue.

LEADERS MEET TO DISCUSS IRAN, BUDGET, AGRICULTURE

Giscard Arrival Remarks

LD271450 Paris Domestic Service in French 1400 GMT 27 Apr 80

[Text] The Community of the Nine began its meeting at the European center of Kirchberg in Luxembourg an hour ago. On the agenda are all the questions of the Common Market and also the Iranian crisis. On the subject, President Giscard d'Estaing said in a statement to journalists on his arrival at Luxembourg Airport not long ago that France is determined to continue its efforts, as is the whole of the European Community, in solidarity with the United States to obtain the liberation of the Tehran hostages. President Giscard d'Estaing said that the taking of hostages was a violation of human rights and of international law.

The president of the republic also spoke about the Community's internal problems, in particular the fixing of the European agricultural prices and then the British contribution to the Community budget. President Giscard d'Estaing said that all these problems must be resolved simultaneously. It is not conceivable, the head of state said, that the problem of the agricultural prices, which should have already been settled, should be deferred.

Working Breakfast

LD281040 Paris Domestic Service in French 1000 GMT 28 Apr 80

[Text] Valery Giscard d'Estaing, Helmut Schmidt and Margaret Thatcher, accompanied by their foreign ministers, had breakfast together at the French Embassy in Luxembourg this morning. The breakfast lasted 1 hour and 20 minutes and was no doubt an opportunity for taking stock before the second session of the summit of heads of state and government. It is probable that during this working breakfast mainly agricultural problems were discussed. The ministers of agriculture worked on the questions until 0300 this morning and a compromise on prices was accepted by eight ministers out of the nine, Great Britain holding back its reply pending the settlement of the problem of its Community budget contribution.

The summit later continued at the European center and it may end early in the afternoon with the publication of a statement on Iran, Afghanistan and the Middle East. In connection with Iran, it is already known that the Nine have reaffirmed their absolute solidarity with the United States, wishing nevertheless that harmony between the Western partners be developed.

DELEGATION DEPARTS CYPRUS, LEADER MAKES STATEMENT

NC271140 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1030 GMT 27 Apr 80

[Text] The mixed delegation of the EEC Executive Committee and the European Investment Bank left Cyprus today. The delegation had held investigatory talks with the Cyprus Government.

In a statement at Larnaca Airport, the head of the EEC delegation, Mr Duchateau, said that after this visit he has a better picture of the Cyprus problem. He added that Cyprus needs Europe and, in particular, the Common Market in various sectors. He said: In the political sector we have to play a role of supporting Cyprus' unity. Also in the economic sector we have a significant mission: to help the country prosper. He also said that in the future Cyprus will be a good friend of the Community.

Finally, Mr Duchateau said that on his return to Brussels he, together with Cyprus' representative to the EEC, will support the Cyprus issue. He expressed hope that now it is possible to achieve great progress in the Cyprus issue.

KREISKY CRITICAL OF U.S. ATTEMPT TO RESCUE HOSTAGES

LD261732 Hamburg DPA in German 1606 GMT 26 Apr 80

[Text] Vienna--Without mentioning U.S. President Jimmy Carter by name, Austrian Chancellor Bruno Kreisky has criticized the failed U.S. mission to rescue the hostages in Tehran.

At a meeting of Socialists in Vienna today, Kreisky said that he expected "nothing at all" from military muscle-flexing in Iran. He believed that such action was quite impossible on account of the great distances and the special circumstances. In his speech, Kreisky voiced his opinion that there was "discord" in Iran between the politicians that had come to power following the elections and other groupings which surrounded Ayatollah Khomeyni.

PAHR VIEWS OLYMPICS BOYCOTT, RELATIONS WITH U.S.

AU251353 Vienna DIE PRESSE in German 25 Apr 80 pp 1-2

[Andreas Unterberger report on interview with Foreign Minister Willibald Pahr in Vienna--no date given]

[Excerpt] Vienna--Austria will leave unanswered the American request not to send any participants to the Moscow Olympic games. This was stated by Foreign Minister Pahr in a talk with DIE PRESSE. He said that he was for a strict separation between sports and politics, and that the question of participating in the Olympics was exclusively up to the sports organizations. As regards the Afghanistan problem, Pahr said that even a partial withdrawal of the Soviet forces would already constitute a possibility for a solution satisfactory to all sides.

The Austrian foreign minister explains this position by arguing that "a certain amount of Soviet forces have been in Afghanistan for quite some time." In this context Pahr draws attention to the Austrian-Cuban contacts. The foreign minister has gained the impression that Havana is not unconditionally supporting Soviet interests in Afghanistan: "Cuba is chairman of the nonaligned states, and it has been evident, particularly in the recent past, that it attaches great importance to being recognized in this capacity. And we believe that precisely because of Cuba's uncontested close relationship with the USSR, it is in a position to know earlier and more easily than others what possibilities exist for solving the Afghanistan problem."

Pahr stresses the Austrian position that the task of the nonaligned countries "to bring about a conciliation between the blocs" also serves Austria's interests. The foreign minister sees the essential difference between neutral and nonaligned countries in their "basic ideological attitude."

There have been some disagreements between Vienna and Washington primarily, but not exclusively, in connection with the Afghanistan question. Pahr is now talking of "very good relations" with the United States, to which he refers as a "friendly state." Nevertheless, he is taking a very clear stand on the various problems.

Asked about the American ban on travel to Iran for U.S. citizens, the minister says that this is certainly "an indication of an approach that is not in line with our ideas about human rights and freedom of movement. We in Austria have a very liberal attitude and in Austria such a measure would be inconceivable, and incompatible with our basic rights."

The minister also reported that--in contrast to the "Iran note" where a negative reply was given, Austria has not given any answer at all to the American move urging a boycott of the Olympics. "And indeed I do not see any reason why we should give an answer to that," for this is a matter which in Austria has to be decided by the sports organizations. In reply to the remark that the Americans did make representations regarding that matter, just as they did regarding the Iranian problem, Pahr declares: "Well, I cannot prevent them from doing such things."

At any rate, there will be no recommendations of advice for the Olympic committee. "To us, this is primarily a question concerning sports, not politics. The point is that we reject such a mixing of sports with politics." Thus, in the government's opinion, sports has nothing to do with politics? "It should not have anything to do with it," Pahr corrects himself. And what if the athletes start some boycott on their own initiative? "All that will be respected by us. That is up to them." And, with regard to the United States, the foreign minister remarks: "Particularly among friends there must be understanding for the fact that they cannot always proceed in exactly the same manner."

PAPERS OPPOSE PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDACY OF NORBERT BURGER

AU251440 [Editorial Report] Most Vienna dailies in German on 25 April prominently report that Norbert Burger, chairman of the Austrian National-Democratic Party [NDP] and candidate of the "Committee for the Election of a National German-Austrian for the 1980 Presidential Elections" has submitted to the Interior Ministry a nomination proposal with 2,384 signatures and has paid the required guarantee deposit of 50,000 schillings. According to ARBEITER-ZEITUNG, the Interior Ministry has not yet approved the nomination because an investigation is still pending on the grounds that several of Burger's backers admitted that they were paid for their signatures. A final decision is to be made by the main election board at the Interior Ministry on 29 April.

According to ARBEITER-ZEITUNG, Burger, at a Vienna press conference, admitted that some persons were paid for their signatures but claimed that even without these he had enough other signatures to back his nomination. He sharply attacked Freedom Party [FPOe] presidential candidate Gredler calling him a "traitor" who should have been "sentenced to death" by the German authorities on account of his having joined a resistance group toward the end of World War II. Burger stressed his support of capital punishment and his readiness to "personally act as hangman" if no one else volunteered.

This attitude is sharply attacked by the semi-official WIENER ZEITUNG in a commentary "Burger Ready To Become Hangman," and by ARBEITER-ZEITUNG in a commentary "No Hangman As Candidate." The latter accuses Burger of spreading pure neofascism and of glorifying Nazi atrocities, and emphatically warns that if Burger were allowed to run as a candidate in the presidential elections, it would enable him to spread his neofascist and neo-Nazi propaganda on an unprecedented scale. "The triumph that he would obtain by merely a few hundred votes on election day would be cheap while the damage caused by a neonazi propaganda wave would be enormous," the paper warns and expresses the hope that the main election board will not accept Burger's candidacy.

The Communist VOLKSSTIMME frontpages a statement by Austrian Communist Party Chairman Franz Muhri charging that Burger's candidacy conflicts with the Austrian Constitution and the Austrian State Treaty, and appealing to all democrats and antifascists to participate in a joint antifascist demonstration in Vienna on 26 April.

OFFICIALS, PRESS COMMENT ON U.S. RESCUE ATTEMPT IN IRAN

Warns Against Criticism

LD251900 Hamburg DPA in German 1802 GMT 25 Apr 80

[Excerpt] Saarbruecken--Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt has indirectly warned against criticizing the Americans for the failed attempt at liberating the hostages in Tehran. At an SPD election campaign meeting in Saarbruecken tonight, Schmidt recalled the German release of the hostages in the Somali capital, Mogadishu, in the fall of 1977 and emphasized: "We had an awful lot of luck during that campaign." To that had to be added that the campaign had taken place in a country which had not been anti-Federal Republic. The chancellor continued: "It is not up to us to sit in judgment over others" who "in a more difficult situation" had considered the lives of their people.

In reply to a question from the 3000-strong audience, the chancellor confirmed that he had not been informed beforehand about Washington's commando enterprise. The advice which the Germans as equal partners in the Western alliance would give was "to safeguard with all moral power and political commonsense peace in the world and in Europe" as well as "to preserve the unity of the one German nation."

Schmidt Assures Carter of Support

LD271232 Hamburg DPA in German 1106 GMT 27 Apr 80

[Text] Bonn--Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt has assured U.S. President Jimmy Carter that the Federal Government is determined to continue, at the side of the United States, to look for a solution to the hostage issue in Iran. Still on Friday, the day of the failed American mission to rescue the hostages in Tehran, the chancellor sent a cable to Carter which stated, i.a.: "Anyone who has ever shared responsibility for the lives of hostages will be able to appreciate your feelings in this difficult hour." The text of the telegram was published by the Federal Press Office in Bonn on Sunday.

The chancellor spoke of his "deep sympathy." The news that the unlawful hostage taking had cost eight lives filled him with dismay and sorrow.

Genscher Appeals for Peace

LD261111 Hamburg DPA in German 1019 GMT 26 Apr 80

[Text] Munich--Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher has appealed to all states of the world and to those responsible in Tehran to go resolutely along the path toward a peaceful solution to the Tehran hostage drama which U.S. President Jimmy Carter outlined in his television address. Genscher, who was speaking at the Bavarian FDP party congress in Munich, expressly included the Soviet Union in this appeal. He said that the willingness of UN Secretary General Kurt Waldheim to mediate again also deserved the support of all those conscious of their responsibility.

With reference to the discussion now in progress about the correctness and advisability of the attempt to free the hostages, Genscher said: "Anyone who remains silent about the taking of hostages in Tehran and who occupies a small country like Afghanistan with his troops, is not in a good position to put on airs and act as arbiter now." He expressed his sympathy for the relatives of the American soldiers who lost their lives and for the "entire American nation." "We are predictable in our policy, in our reliability toward our friends, who have also stood by us in difficult times."

The present generation has the truly historic task of working with all their strength to see to it that "our children and grandchildren are spared the horrors of war, which we had to go through in World War II." With reference to proposals that the Bundeswehr be sent to the Persian Gulf, Genscher said, to the applause of the delegates: "We have had enough once and for all of deploying German soldiers outside our country."

Carstens Urges Unity

LD252150 Hamburg DPA in German 2014 GMT 25 Apr 80

[Text] Stuttgart--Federal President Karl Carstens in Stuttgart tonight has warned against dramatizing the world situation. At the "foyer meeting point" of STUTTGARTER NACHRICHTEN, Carstens said he was convinced that "the escalation to an acute danger of war" would not occur in the Iran and Afghanistan conflicts. He did not believe that the situation was that dramatic.

The federal president directed an urgent appeal to the partners of the Atlantic Alliance to increase their level of accord within the Alliance. Carstens asked the German (political) parties to more strongly emphasize the "basic measure of agreement" in view of the current crisis.

Bahr Remarks

LD251722 Hamburg DPA in German 1627 GMT 25 Apr 80

[Text] [no dateline received] SPD Federal Manager Egon Bahr told ARD television after the SPD Executive Committee meeting that the federal chancellor was "greatly worried." The chancellor's level-headedness and reserve were deserving of support not only from the whole of the SPD, but far beyond.

Concerning the question of Bonn not having been informed about the attempt to free the hostages, Bahr said that he would regard it as a mistake if one were to coordinate such an operation or wanted consultations beforehand. But the responsibility would have to be shouldered by the one who, in the final analysis, took the sole decision. If the campaign had been successful, then President Carter would have been the hero of the hour.

Kohl Calls for Solidarity

LD251756 Hamburg DPA in German 1725 GMT 25 Apr 80

[Text] Saarlouis/Saar--In his first public comment on the failed attempt to liberate the hostages in Iran, Helmut Kohl, national chairman of the CDU, has appealed to the "civilized world" for solidarity with the United States. If the West at this time fails to stand by the United States and proclaim its sympathy and solidarity with it, then "things would end badly," Kohl emphasized on Friday at a CDU election campaign rally in Saarlouis.

Kohl said he was "deeply shocked" by the latest reports from Iran. "Things are pretty bad in this world if a power such as the United States is compelled to carry out such military campaigns in order to safeguard the lives and security of its embassy staff," the CDU politician said. Kohl regards as a "return to barbarity" the fact that the rulers in Iran have imprisoned U.S. Embassy members in order to blackmail the United States.

'Helplessness, Bewilderment' in Bonn

[Report by Bonn correspondent Karl Feldmeyer: "Bonn Reacts Helplessly, in Bewilderment, Repercussions on the Alliance?"]

[Text] Bonn, 25 Apr--"What would you do as a father of a family in such a situation?" This question circulating among colleagues contains everything that characterized the helplessness and alarm in the atmosphere at the political center of the Federal Republic. Although one is condemned in Bonn to do nothing following the unsuccessful attempt by the Americans to free their hostages, and although one must wait and watch developments, it was this issue that dominated people and their conversations following the announcement of the unsuccessful mission shortly after 0800.

The federal press conference has not been so full that one could hardly find a place since the spectacular appearance of Soviet Foreign Minister Gromyko in November. The answers by the government spokesman have hardly ever been so helpless and taciturn. Basically this parsimonious information was practically not necessary. A glance at the pale and deadly serious face of Government Spokesman Boelling described the situation sufficiently. He looked--as one says in the navy when somebody comes under enemy fire--"very old"; his spirit was close to zero.

The tenor of the questions he was asked signalled the assessment of the event by the public: One question was "had the soldiers who went into action near Tehran come from an American garrison in the Federal Republic?"--the question did not express the hope, for instance, that the Americans had used such passive German help.

More clear and depressing was the first assessment by security experts and officers in private talks. The depression of those who made frank statements in discussions was not aimed only at the problem, but why exactly at that time? Some people said that since the U.S. had waited for such a long time and had missed the chance to issue a direct reaction, it would have been better if only for political reasons to wait for the convocation of the Iranian parliament and to at least inform the Allies--the Allies whose solidarity is so highly valued by Washington, for understandable reasons.

But taking action is almost considered as being worse. When the President decided to take military action, it ought to have been prepared in such a way that it would not need to be called off unsuccessfully due to "technical breakdown of equipment"--as the information from Washington read early this morning. The bewilderment is increased by the fact that no replacements were at hand so that the risky attempt ended so faultily and tragically--after eight people were killed. In addition, there is the apprehension that election policy considerations could possibly have brought prohibited and impermissible influence to bear on the action. There is the fear that all this will not have a positive influence on the cohesion of the alliance. The question could even come up as to the predictability of the leading Western power which is required for those who depend on the predictability of American policy. And the fact that, in addition to the admission that further developments are unpredictable the question about what the aftereffects will be is answered with the remark that one hopes the hostage-takers will exercise reason, demonstrates how matters were viewed this Friday in Bonn.

No Need for 'Stone Throwing'

[Commentary signed Rm.: "No Throwing of Stones Now"]

[Text] The American attempt to free the 53 Tehran hostages in a coup de main certainly did not fail only because of a technical breakdown. Anybody who plans such an enterprise must provide for sufficient reserves. For every man who falls, for every peace of material that breaks down there must be sufficient replacements at hand. There seems to have been a shortage in this respect.

But even if the Americans had prepared the commando mission correctly, it is doubtful whether it would have been successful. It seems an almost insoluble task to get out some 50 people who are watched by heavily armed guards in a building which is surrounded and which is located in the center of Tehran. Not only the military units that would appear would have to be fought, but one would also have to defend oneself against the fanatic masses of the people. Eventually those liberated would have to be taken alive, not merely out of Tehran in easily vulnerable helicopters, but out of Iran; and all this without the slightest support on the scene. The question arises of why Carter agreed to an attempt that showed so little promise. But nobody should be overly hasty to throw stones at him. For half a year the personnel of the U.S. Embassy in Tehran have been held and threatened with death by a gang of criminals who have the backing of the state power. All the pleading, the attempts to mediate, the protests of the United Nations and of the UN countries and all the concessions by Washington have not helped at all. The many hopeful statements by the Iranian Government have never been followed up with actions. The Allies have joined the American sanctions against Iran only hesitantly. So pressure on the President to free the hostages by armed force is increasing in America. In addition, there are international political reasons: The continuing crime with regard to the hostages in Tehran is driving Iran and America against each other. This complicates matters for the West with regard to taking measures against further Soviet acquisition of land in the Middle East. It could, therefore, seem advisable to the President to try to exploit far-fetched possibilities. Morality and international law are on his side.

But the failure will be detrimental to America and its President in the world. Carter does not need reproaches or embarrassed silences from the Allies but understanding and help. Friendships stand their test during misfortune.

Other Options Assessed

[Werner Holzer editorial: "The Compulsion to Act"]

[Text] Nobody will say that the American President has been lucky in his political actions. The failure to free the hostages through an American commando mission, which was obviously planned for a long time, belongs in this context. Had it reached a successful conclusion, a heavy burden would have been lifted, not only from the shoulders of Jimmy Carter, but probably also from the Iranian Government whose authority vis-a-vis the hostage-takers is not strong enough to end the crisis through a release of the hostages. The whole world would have been released from a burden.

It seems that the United States did not inform anybody beforehand about its intentions. The Allied governments, which are being put under considerable pressure by Washington to demonstrate solidarity with the United States not merely with words but also with action, are not happy about this.

But something else also must be clearly said: The world power, the United States, has demonstrated unusual patience for almost half a year over the hostage drama. It is so patient that some Western critics of the American President seem to have forgotten that the United States itself has become a victim of an unforgivable breach of international law. Even though one cannot be forced to agree with this or that statement or action of the American President, it remains a fact that it was not American divisions that invaded Afghanistan.

Keeping this in mind is not only required by political fairness, but also by reason. Particularly in international politics one must not deviate from the principles that the initiators are responsible for the damage and not the victims. When the Soviet news agency TASS terms the unsuccessful liberation attempt a "provocation," this indicates how miserable the climate between the two world powers has become. It is not certain at all how peacefully the Soviet Union would react if it were provoked somewhere in the world like the United States has been.

It is a completely different matter how one views the American plans and demands made in connection with the hostage drama and the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. The urgent advice from the Federal Government in Bonn and probably from all European governments to the American ally to continue to remain patient in connection with Tehran, does not originate from European fickleness.

If one assumes that saving the American hostages will be given priority as before, every step indeed must be most carefully examined with regard to the consequences it will have. Since every military liberation action entails the danger of threatening the lives of the hostages, the former patience of Jimmy Carter was therefore an act of humanity and reason. For a politician running for reelection, his action in connection with the hostage issue has certainly been unusual so far. After all, he is under pressure from a public which is arguing more and more angrily and irrationally. But in dealing with a country such as Iran, which is in the middle of basic changes and which moves continually on the brink of chaos, other nonmilitary measures are also a two-edged sword. The announcement of American and the threat of European economic sanctions have so far not improved the fate of the hostages at all, and they could very easily weaken the political position of the entire West in this country. It may be that such measures need to be taken anyway, not out of blind solidarity with the United States, but because one has to try everything to punish the breach of international law. But then one also needs to be aware of the consequences.

It can be seen even now that Iran will simply react with an about-face to the existing or impending Western economic sanctions. In other words, in the future it will engage in more business with the Soviet Union and its allies, despite the fact that not merely the West was on good terms with the overthrown shah, but that also the communist governments played up to him strongly. The dangerous thing about this situation is simply the following: Every attempt to help the hostages can have the opposite effect, while simultaneously heating up the double crisis in this area.

New U.S. 'Unpredictability'

[Friedhelm Kemna article: "Indivisible Risk"]

[Text] The failure of the almost incredible commando enterprise has more than one dangerous dimension because the course of the double crisis over Iran and Afghanistan now contains a new explosive factor of unpredictability. The President in Washington broke through the "logic" of escalation on which Europe, although reluctantly, has begun setting its stakes.

But the fearful disappointment revealed in the first few commentaries from Europe has a fragile moral basis. Those who have stressed so often that it is up to America to bear the main burden and make decisions in the hostage conflict should not complain about the fact and the way President Carter claimed this right to make the decision and take action. The European governments who so demonstratively think they are far away from the place of action should have been able to imagine that, as Carter said, a plan on the enterprise was drawn up soon after the taking of the hostages and that this action had to be expected at some time.

At this point an uncomfortable and, as it were, demonstrative aspect is the assumption that the United States has lost confidence in the joint front of action with the Europeans and no longer even believes in the effect of sanctions.

At any rate, risks and chances will probably have to be assessed differently than prior to that Friday. Because a policy of gradual sanctions can be expected to call forth even more inflexibility on the part of the hostage-taking state, the need and the necessity for a military blockade, which Carter wanted to avoid through this stroke which has been unsuccessful, could soon come about.

But one must warn against cheap condemnation of the Americans and their venture. All comparisons with operations that bear good-sounding names only because they were successful, in actuality are lame. The consequence of this day must not be the turning away from America's President who must so bitterly pay for maybe the most important decision he has made in this crisis.

As before there is no alternative to Europe's being at the side of the Americans. Every attempt to maintain under the depression of these days a "safe distance" from a President of the United States who is hard to predict, must lead one politically astray; and this would eventually lead to catastrophe. One ought to particularly let the Soviet Union feel this and even more so now, since the failure of the liberation action, so that there will be no misunderstandings which would endanger peace much more than the commando mission did.

GERMAN SPORTS FEDERATION SUPPORTS OLYMPICS BOYCOTT

LD261117 Hamburg DPA in German 0835 GMT 26 Apr 80

[Excerpts] Frankfurt--The Presidium of the German Sports Federation [DSB] has recommended that the National Olympic Committee of Germany decide in favor of a boycott of the Moscow Olympic games. This is the substance of a statement published by the DSB last night after a meeting of its Presidium in Frankfurt.

The text of the statement is as follows: "The German Bundestag and the Federal Government have appealed to the National Olympic Committee of Germany not to send any teams or individual sportsmen to the summer Olympic games in Moscow and Tallinn. This appeal is addressed to sports as a whole and, thus, to the political responsibility of the German Sports Federation as well. The DSB Presidium supports the appeal and reaffirms that sports cannot be seen in isolation from international political developments. The Presidium asks the National Olympic Committee of Germany to reach a decision which is in keeping with the joint responsibility and which does not jeopardize the partnership between sports and the state that has been strengthened over many years."

POLISH DEPUTY PREMIER DISCUSSES BILATERAL ECONOMIC RELATIONS

Talks With Lambsdorff

LD251530 Hamburg DPA in German 0901 GMT 25 Apr 80

[Excerpts] Bonn--The Federal Republic and the People's Republic of Poland are apparently still interested in continuing their good relations. Federal Economics Minister Otto Graf Lambsdorff assured Polish Deputy Premier Tadeusz Wrzaszczyk in a talk on Thursday evening of Bonn's interest in maintaining cooperation with Warsaw. A similar view was expressed by Wrzaszczyk who is in the Federal Republic for the opening of the Polish national exhibition, "Poland 80."

During his talks with Lambsdorff, Wrzaszczyk also expressed Poland's interest in a longer-term cooperation agreement. Lambsdorff asked Wrzaszczyk to submit specific ideas on this subject in the course of the next few months. According to the Economics Ministry, Poland's interest in additional deliveries of coal to the Federal Republic was also made clear during the talks. In this connection Lambsdorff pointed out that the Federal Republic is currently drawing up legislation for additional coal imports.

Meeting With Schmidt

LD251532 Hamburg DPA in German 1230 GMT 25 Apr 80

[Excerpts] Bonn--Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and Federal Economics Minister Otto Graf Lambsdorff had more than 2 hours of talks with Polish Deputy Premier Tadeusz Wrzaszczyk in Bonn on Friday, during which the state of bilateral relations and international questions were discussed at length. The other main topic discussed was economic relations between the two countries.

At the opening of the "Poland 80" exhibition in Duesseldorf, Federal Economics Minister Otto Graf Lambsdorff underlined the buoyancy of German-Polish relations even in the present international situation. "Despite or rather because of the crisis which was developed in one sector of East-West relations, this exhibition and continuing good relations between our two countries are not only necessary but also desirable," the minister said.

The governments of both countries are aware of the fact that they must make their international influence felt so that the basis for cooperation does not slip away from under their feet. "The word peace in both countries does not have sentimental associations but recalls bitter experience." In the event of a new conflict in Europe, Poland and the Federal Republic would be the ones to suffer most.

Lambsdorff assessed present relations with Poland as "very positive on the whole." Since the German-Polish agreement of 1970 more than 200,000 Germans have been able to leave Poland. Bonn assumes that the emigration of Germans from Poland will continue to take place as satisfactorily in the future. Economic relations have also developed positively in recent years. The minister expressed confidence that the present problems in economic relations between the two countries could be eliminated in the next 2-3 years. He assured Poland on Bonn's support in the efforts for more cooperation and in finding a market for goods in the Federal Republic.

COSSIGA, SCHMIDT HOLD TALKS ON EC SUMMIT, OTHER ISSUES

LD261708 Hamburg DPA in German 1556 GMT 26 Apr 80

[Text] Hamburg--Francesco Cossiga, Italian prime minister and president of the EC Council of Ministers, met Chancellor Helmut Schmidt in Hamburg today for a 2 and 1/2 hour talk.

Cossiga, who left Hamburg again in the afternoon, discussed with the chancellor the forthcoming EC summit in Brussels starting tomorrow. Apart from the British-French conflict about agricultural policy and the British budgetary requirements, it is thought that the world situation following the failed rescue attempt of the U.S. hostages in Iran may have been discussed. Neither the chancellor nor Cossiga made statements after the meeting, which took place at Hamburg Senate's guesthouse.

BRANDT, MEXICAN PARTY OFFICIAL HOLD DISCUSSIONS

LD252116 Hamburg DPA in German 1706 GMT 25 Apr 80

[Text] Bonn--SPD Chairman Willy Brandt and Gustavo Carvajal Moreno, head of the Mexican state party, as presidents of the Socialist International and the Standing Conference of Latin American Political Parties, respectively, today in Bonn spoke out in favor of more intensive contacts between these two organizations. During an extensive exchange of views between the two politicians it also became clear that increased efforts were required to put into practice the principles of noninterference and the right to self-determination. Carvajal Moreno was also received by Chancellor Helmut Schmidt.

Before journalists, the Mexican politician underlined, the great economic and political significance which is attached to the impending visit to Bonn by Mexican President Lopez Portillo. The technological, trade and industrial exchanges between the Federal Republic and Mexico will doubtlessly be strengthened by it. Carvajal Moreno expressed the hope that investment opportunities for West German industry in his country, which has had the longest period of economic stability of all Latin American countries, could be investigated.

PARTIES EXPRESS VIEWS ON U.S. ACTION IN IRAN

Mitterrand Expresses Sympathy

LD262300 Paris Domestic Service in French 1700 GMT 26 Apr 80

[Summary] The national convention of the Socialist Party [PS] is meeting in Paris today. This afternoon Francois Mitterrand and Michel Rocard spoke. On the matter of foreign policy the meeting showed unanimity. "This has been particularly clear in connection with the Iranian affair where there is, one can say it, consensus within the Socialist Party regarding the position expressed by Francois Mitterrand: [Begin Mitterrand recording] I believe that when, for whatever reason, a foreign country seizes my fellow citizens, my compatriots--if it was a matter involving French people I would act this way. My duty is such that, with whatever means I have at my disposal, I would release them.

"My criticism would be firmer regarding the behavior of the United States toward the countries of the European Common Market. This is not so much because of the fact that the United States--I have mentioned it before--failed to warn our heads of state. It is rather for having compromised them, in a word, by having immediately changed plans and acted in self-defense without taking into account the undertaking just entered into and the support just received. Yes, thus compromising foreign countries, playing with them. [end recording]"

Michel Rocard followed in a similar vein: [begin Rocard recording] "I believe it is right that on this occasion our first secretary has expressed a message of understanding toward the American people, because it is true that the tragedy is painful. We must let the young Islamic republic know that it will not have a place in the international community as long as it violates its rules, and that the hostages must be released.

"But our long fight as Socialists against the shah's dictatorship gives us the right to say to the Americans (?clearly) that the Iranian people's thirst for revenge can be explained, even if it takes unacceptable forms. One must, alas, know how to wait until a respectable public authority comes into being in Iran. A policy of sanctions--apart from its very great technical difficulty, we have seen it right now, which already condemns it--can have only three consequences: first, threat to the life of the hostages--after all, the nervous tension, everything now depends on Iran; second, make difficult the rebirth of a respected public authority in Iran; and third, push Iran toward the Soviet bloc. This is contrary to what ought to be done. Sometimes courage is needed to admit that there are problems which for the time being cannot be solved. [end recording]"

PCF, Other Socialist Criticism

LD261534 Paris Domestic Service in French 1200 GMT 26 Apr 80

[Excerpt] [Passage indistinct] The PCF Central Committee considers the U.S. expedition into Iran as an extremely serious action. The president of the republic and the government must make their unequivocable condemnations of this dangerous policy heard loud and clear. This is in the interest of peace and of France's dignity, the Secretariat of the PCF Central Committee says.

This American operation was also discussed this morning at the opening of the national convention of the Socialist Party. Alain Joannes reports:

The cancellation of the plan in its initial phase, owing to "equipment failure" hows that the operation, although highly dangerous, had been very badly organized if not improvised. The collision which followed the order to withdraw, killing eight people in an Iranian desert, adds an element of panic to this chaos. Moreover there is cause to wonder why the White House thought it necessary to announce all this immediately, since all the participants, including the dead and injured, had been successfully flown out and since the Iranians, judging from their initial reactions, did not suspect anything.

Aside from the fact that the Americans are not the Israelis, an Entebbe-type operation to free the Tehran hostages had long been deemed impracticable by almost all the experts. An operation in the heart of Tehran presented too many risks both for the hostages and for the civilian population and evacuation seemed almost impossible. However, according to insistent rumors in Tehran, it seems that U.S. commandos had been gradually and secretly infiltrated into Iran, ready to converge on the embassy when the time came. Friday's events support this hypothesis and suggest that the failure would have taken on even more tragic proportions if the assault by these commandos on the Islamic militants have been improvised to the same extent. Some sections of the U.S. public will certainly criticize the President--the hostages' families are already doing so--for having taken ill-considered risks with the lives of the captives. The Congress leaders, worried to see the White House being reduced to military solutions alone, had in the past few days already asked to be consulted before any decision was taken. According to several leaks, Mr Carter's staff was itself widely divided during a meeting held at the White House.

Nonetheless, a distinction must be drawn between the envisaged direct operations, for example, to impose a blockade on Iran, and Friday's "pinpoint" action aimed solely at freeing the hostages. Despite its failure, this attempt could lead some of the public, aware of the President's humanitarian motives, to make allowances for him. In the affair of the Mayaguez cargo ship in May 1975 President Ford succeeded in portraying the recovery of 40 U.S. sailors held by the Khmer Rouge as a victory even though the operation had cost as many lives among the Marines. Some 5 years earlier Mr Nixon had launched a commando raid on a North Vietnamese camp in the hope of finding U.S. prisoners there who were in fact being held elsewhere. This failure did not really cause him any trouble at home because efforts made to save fellow citizens in trouble are considered entirely justified in any circumstances by the Americans.

Abroad, however, the credibility of the United States will once again be damaged. The image of a vacillating and ill-fated President will be strengthened by an episode which some people will be bound to portray in analogy with the failure to disembark Cuban exiles at the beginning of the Kennedy presidency--as a "lame Bay of Pigs." What are we to think of the efficiency of a military machine, on which the security of a good half of the world depends, which is not capable of landing two planes in a desert before the enemy even appeared on the scene? What will remain of the "Carter doctrine" which claims to protect Western interests throughout the Gulf region?

GROMYKO TALKS WITH LEADERS DOMINATED BY AFGHANISTAN

LD280957 Paris LE MONDE in French 26 Apr 80 p 7

[M.D. report: "Franco-Soviet Talks Continue, Notably on a Return to Nonalignment by Afghanistan"]

[Text] The talks which Soviet Foreign Minister Gromyko had in Paris on Wednesday and Thursday, 23-24 April confirmed the "fundamental differences of analysis" between France and the USSR on the situation in Afghanistan. [paragraph continues]

The Socialist Party has not taken an official stand on the American operation in Iran which explains the caution displayed by Jospin's report on this affair. One has only heard a condemnation in principle of barely specified military operations. On the other hand, Charles Hernu, another member of the Socialist Party majority, did not beat around the bush:

[Begin Hernu recording] If one is punched and one punches back immediately, one is carrying out an act of legitimate defense. However, when one is punched and one punches back 2-3 days later, whether one likes it or not, one appears as an aggressor. From this point of view, what has just happened in Iran is serious I think because I am afraid President Carter might be led to carry out another operation of this kind owing to the mood prevailing in the United States and, because he cannot fail with this second operation, there is a danger that he might raise the threshold risk to the point of provoking a reaction from the Soviet Union. [end recording]

This is a personal and heated stand but seems to be fairly widely shared by most of the delegates present at the convention, including Rocard's men. Jean-Pierre Cot, for example, has just said, I quote, "the pitiful American escapade into Iran" and his analysis was silently approved by Charles Hernu. Jean-Pierre Chevenement is now developing the same anti-American theses and reactions. One cannot find one Socialist this morning being lenient toward President Carter.

RPR's Pons Comment

LD262302 Paris Domestic Service in French 2000 GMT 26 Apr 80

[Excerpt] Another statement on the U.S. action in Iran came from the secretary general of the Rally for the Republic [RPR], Bernard Pons. To him the Iranian affair is an extremely grave and dangerous event:

[Begin Pons recording] I believe that it is an extremely grave event--extremely dangerous to world peace. But I believe that the main responsibility in this affair falls not on America but on those who from the very start invaded the embassy, took the diplomats hostage and were the first to resort to an act of war. It is entirely regrettable to want to substitute the army for diplomacy, and one must hope that diplomacy can continue for a long time. But from the moment when diplomacy no longer exists, then anything can happen. [end recording]

LE MONDE: RESCUE FAILURE DAMAGES U.S. CREDIBILITY

LD261041 Paris LE MONDE in French 26 Apr 80 p 1

[Editorial: "Bad Luck"]

[Text] The new defeat suffered by President Carter with his operation to rescue the hostages in Tehran seems to be such a complete and overwhelming failure that it is difficult to know what aspect to highlight. [paragraph continues]

The dialogue was nonetheless considered "useful" by the two sides and will continue, discussing in particular French and European ideas on a nonaligned Afghanistan. After talks lasting 2 and 1/2 hours with the president of the republic--in private for 90 minutes and then during Thursday's working lunch--Elysee spokesman Bloc stated in reply to a question that, in the present situation, France does not expect "prompt initiatives" by the USSR leading to the withdrawal of Soviet forces from Afghanistan.

"Taking account of the indications given, France considers it useful to continue dialogue with the Soviet Union," Mr Blot continued. "The talks provided an opportunity for a detailed exchange of views on the international situation. These talks took place in a responsible and extremely frank atmosphere. France is still attached to the principle of dialogue with the Soviet Union, and this dialogue will be continued at the appropriate levels. Restoring the climate of confidence necessary to the pursuit of detente presupposes an initiative being taken which leads to the withdrawal of Soviet troops from Afghanistan, so that that country can determine its own future free from foreign interference and confirm its nonaligned policy."

On Thursday afternoon, after the second series of talks between Mr Gromyko and his French counterpart Francois-Poncet, the Quai d'Orsay spokesman indicated that the dialogue had been characterized by "continuity, clarity and frankness" but had highlighted "fundamental differences of analysis."

On leaving the Elysee, Mr Gromyko stated that the talks had been "constructive and useful." He added: "We would like to think that these talks will make a contribution to the development of consistent Franco-Soviet relations which, in our opinion, should not only correspond to the interests of France and the Soviet Union but also the interests of the entire world. The USSR stands firm in the pursuit of detente and in ensuring that the difficulties which have arisen in the development of the international situation are overcome. For our part we are working to this end but, as everybody knows, it does not just depend on us. We express the hope that France will work to the same end."

Most of the talks, both at the Elysee and at the Quai d'Orsay, were devoted to Afghanistan. Mr Gromyko repeated the Soviet argument that the USSR only intervened in Afghanistan to help the Kambul government to repel outside interference. He apparently gave no new details. Mr Giscard d'Estaing and Mr Francois-Poncet replied that in their view, there is an authentic people's resistance movement in Afghanistan which the USSR would be wrong to underestimate. The French minister apparently said that the Soviet explanations contained "unacceptable" contradictions. For instance, it is illogical to maintain that the agitation is only the result of the actions of a few gangs of criminals without popular support and yet that the USSR is forced to keep a very powerful army in Afghanistan to combat them.

Three Ideas From Mr Giscard d'Estaing

The French side also stressed that the Afghanistan affair is not a purely local crisis but affects the whole of detente. The president of the Republic recalled what, in his view, constitute the three elements of a solution which he listed on television on 26 February: 1--withdrawal of Soviet troops; 2--the Afghans' right to decide their own future; 3--guarantee of security for Afghanistan's neighbors and of Afghanistan's nonalignment with either of the two superpowers. It does not seem that the president of the republic expressly mentioned the proposal put forward by the European Nine for a "neutral Afghanistan," but what he proposed is merely the application of this principle. The French side stressed that Mr Gromyko showed some interest, since these proposals "were the subject of a careful examination which will be pursued."

Preparations for the Madrid CSCE conference next fall were mentioned but Mr Giscard d'Estaing stressed in particular that for this conference to be useful it was vital for tension to end and hence for the Afghan problem to be resolved.

The situations in the Middle East and in Southeast Asia were also examined. With reference to Kampuchea Mr Francois-Poncet recalled the need for a political solution implying the withdrawal of Vietnamese troops. Mr Gromyko recalled that the Vietnamese troops were only in Kampuchea to help get rid of the "Pol Pot gangs."

The Olympic games do not seem to have been mentioned. Indeed, for the two governments it is officially purely a sporting matter.

GRAIN EXPORTS TO USSR DESPITE EMBARGO ALLEGED

LD250839 [Editorial Report] Paris FRANCE-SOIR in French on 19 April 1980 carries on page 4 an 800-word Yves Dantin report claiming that French wheat is being exported to the USSR despite the EEC embargo on such exports. EEC export permits for grain now have to carry the name of the importing country, and no permits are being granted for export to the USSR.

Yves Dantin says however that: "It was decided that permits granted before January and hence not naming the importing country would remain valid. This has given rise to a blatant anomaly: While France did not export wheat to the USSR before the embargo, since the embargo was imposed exports already shipped or planned amount to almost 500,000 tons.

"Jean-Baptiste Doumeng, managing director of the Interagra company which specializes in trade with the East--the man nicknamed 'The Red Millionaire' because he is very rich and a convinced communist, is apparently behind this operation, which has the great advantage of being entirely in keeping with French and European laws while at the same time getting round the embargo."

FORCES IN CHAD TO BE WITHDRAWN

NC271656 Paris AFP in English 1651 GMT 27Apr 80

[Text] Paris, April 27 (AFP)--France is to start withdrawing its forces based in the central African state of Chad, now in its fifth week of a bitter civil war, it was announced here today.

A statement from the presidential palace said that "since French military forces in Chad have completed their protective mission the French Government has decided to put into effect is decision to withdraw these forces."

"The withdrawal is being carried out according to arrangements agreed by the Chadian Government of National Union and takes into account the preoccupations of the Chadian Government," the statement said.

An estimated 1,200 French troops are currently stationed at an air base just outside the Chadian capital Ndjamena.

ADMIRAL INTERVIEWED ON NAVAL PRESENCE IN INDIAN OCEAN

LD261825 Paris Domestic Service in French 1700 GMT 26 Apr 80

[Text] French forces are stationed in La Reunion, in Mayotte and in Djibouti. Totaling 8,000 men on land and at sea, this force is not negligible. The chief of the French forces for the whole of the Indian Ocean zone is Admiral Jean-Paul Orosco. He spoke about this force not long ago:

[Begin recording] In relation to the fleets which the largest countries--and the two superpowers in particular--maintain, the French presence is far from negligible. At certain times we have more ships than the Russians or the Americans.

We have decided to concentrate a large part of our naval forces in the Indian Ocean. We cruise a lot in this ocean. We visit all the countries nearby and there we can see that--given the presence of the two great powers who are unavoidably in a position of duelling at any moment and who can therefore be disquieting to the countries of the zone--France's presence cannot be a cause for concern because of the fact that it does not have the means to become imperialist. But France is there with a significant force and a rather reassuring one. France's presence contributes in a not discountable way to the maintenance of a certain peace in the Indian Ocean. This at least is the impression of a certain number of the littoral countries.

[Question by unidentified correspondent] And a certain kind of nonalignment?

[Answer] A kind of nonalignment, in fact. [end recording]

OFFICIALS, PRESS COMMENT ON U.S. RESCUE MISSION

Foreign Ministry Communique

AU251548 Rome ANSA in English 1515 GMT 25 Apr 80

[Text] Rome April 25 (ANSA)--The Italian Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo, as soon as he heard of the aborted U.S. attempt to free the American hostages in Tehran, contacted the Italian Embassy in Washington and the U.S. Ambassador in Rome Richard Gardner, for further details, a Farnesina communique said here today. Meanwhile, the Italian Foreign Ministry contacted other European capitals for a first exchange of views on the dramatic developments.

The Italian Embassy in Tehran reported that it had not been informed of plans for today's rescue attempt. The Foreign Ministry communique stressed that, in any case, Italy was opposed to resorting to force to obtain the release of the hostages.

Initial Reactions

AU252004 Rome ANSA in English 1930 GMT 25 Apr 80

[Text] Rome, April 25 (ANSA)--Italian Foreign Ministry sources confirmed here this evening that Italian diplomats are continuing to keep a close eye on the situation as it develops after the failed American attempt to free by military means the hostages in the embassy in Tehran. The sources said that Italian diplomatic chief Emilio Colombo had a long telephone conversation with Prime Minister Francesco Cossiga who is currently on a lightning tour of EEC capitals. Meanwhile, first reactions from Italian politicians and spokesmen started flowing in.

Senate Speaker Amintore Fanfani, a Christian Democrat, warned that there are "boilers scattered in crucial parts of the world that have been on the verge of overheating for at least a decade". He (?blamed) Moscow and Washington for failing to explain to Ayatollah Khomeyni in clear terms from the start of the hostage crisis that the action at the American Embassy was "inadmissible and intolerable". Fanfani also urged the two superpowers to hold a second Yalta conference "before chaos... (even though) this hypothesis cannot attract any supporter of the independence of the peoples". [word indistinct] can do much if it does a bit more, not least within NATO", he added. "We must feel (?ourselves) increasingly as protagonists rather than guests".

Republican Party Secretary Giovanni Spadolini, whose party forms part of Cossiga's three-way government partnership, pointed out that the American operation had been ordered when the EEC was doing "everything possible, even the impossible", to promote a political solution of the hostage crisis. Spadolini also forecast that the operation would merely make it more difficult to release the hostages. "You need patience, infinite patience", he said.

A leadership member of the Socialist Party also called on the government to refuse to support moves like those adopted by the EEC for diplomatic and economic sanctions against Iran. The Socialist leftwinger Nevol Querci said they could have "irreparable consequences" and urged a parliamentary debate on the situation.

The Italian Communist Party tabled a parliamentary question calling for an urgent debate on Iran in the light of the most recent developments. The question also urged the government to reconsider the line decided by the EEC foreign ministers as regards economic sanctions against Iran.

Party Leaders' Remarks

LD262002 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 1700 GMT 26 Apr 80

[Excerpts] The developments in the international crisis following the abortive U.S. raid on Iran are the main topic of comments by Italian political leaders:

The solidarity of Italy with the Washington administration was confirmed by Donat-Cattin, deputy secretary of the Christian Democratic Party.

Zanone, secretary of the Liberal Party, expressed hope for closer political cooperation between the Western countries and rejected any idea of European neutrality.

The restoration of friendly relations with Iran, stated Minister of Foreign Trade Manca, is of vital interest, particularly for Italy which has in that country--in which more than 1,500 Italians are working--economic interests of great importance.

Longo, secretary of the Social-Democratic Party, sharply criticized Carter, saying that it is necessary to subject the relations between Europe and the United States to a global reexamination. He described the note from the Italian Foreign Ministry as insufficient and partial.

A world peace conference, organized by Europe, is proposed by Cariglia of the Social Democratic Party in the editorial of tomorrow's issue of the party newspaper, L'HUMANITA.

The Radicals have called for a parliamentary debate on Monday on the international crisis.

In the view of Pozzo of the Social Movement, the failure of the mission plays into the hands of the Soviet policy of aggression in a framework of weak Western unity.

Unqualified disapproval of Carter's actions was expressed by the Societies of Christian Workers.

On his way home from China and North Korea, Berlinguer, secretary of the Communist Party, will arrive in Rome tomorrow. During a stopover in Hong Kong he expressed the fear that the abortive U.S. raid on Iran may bring about the destabilization of South Asia, but added that [words indistinct] make Tehran seek Moscow's protection. Berlinguer again condemned Soviet intervention in Afghanistan, stating that Moscow is pursuing a policy of force which threatens world peace.

Concern over and condemnation of the U.S. raid was expressed by the Liberal International, which met in Rome under the chairmanship of Foreign Minister of Luxembourg Gaston Thorn, who stated that the aim must be patience by the Americans in the Iran affair.

Solidarity with Iran was expressed by the Proletarian Democracy in what it described as the anti-imperialist struggle waged by the Iranian people.

Additional Party Comment

AU262000 Rome ANSA in English 1940 GMT 26 Apr 80

[Text] Rome, April 26 (ANSA)--Contrasting reactions ran through Italy today to the aborted U.S. incursion in Iran to rescue the hostages in the American Embassy in Tehran. While some severely censured the move, others voiced understanding for Carter's decision to take the drastic step.

Social Democrat Party (PSDI) Secretary Pietro Longo said that "Carter's move must be considered a rescue operation and not an act of war since the only act of war that has been carried out so far is that of the fanatic Iranians, protected by their government, who seized the representatives of the American diplomatic corps, violating the basic rules on which international law is based".

Christian Democrat Party (DC) Secretary Flaminio Piccoli said that whatever one's judgment on the dramatic and failed American effort, there remains the iniquitous fact of the imprisonment and constant death threat of Iran against the American diplomats. This, together with the Soviet aggression in Afghanistan, is at the origin of an international situation full of risks. "Even in these moments of grave concern, we cannot forget that the Atlantic Alliance, with its American leadership, has saved and guaranteed peace for more than thirty years".

Liberal Party (PLI) Secretary Valerio Zanone said that what is necessary today is a close and systematic political cooperation among Western nations facing multiple challenges to their security".

Foreign Trade Minister Enrico Manca (Socialist) voiced "strong apprehension for the worsening international situation" and appreciation for the "responsible and firm" [word indistinct] of Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo on the issue.

Republican Party (PRI) Secretary Giovanni Spadolini said that in the last several weeks his party has fought for a line of "rigorous solidarity" with the United States both in economic sanctions against Iran as well as in opposing taking part in the Moscow summer Olympics. "The aborted American effort has made even more tense the international scene. This requires a greater effort on the part of European countries to achieve, through coordinated political methods, the double objective of saving the hostages and re-establishing international law which has been violated. Solidarity between Europe and the United States is the fulcrum not only of Italy's foreign policy but of all of Europe's", Spadolini concluded.

Coalition, PCI Comments

AU280855 Rome ANSA in English 0800 GMT 28 Apr 80

[Text] ANSA--Rome, April 28--While it was predictable that Italian political parties would react differently to the abortive U.S. blitz in Iran, the conflicting opinions among the partners of the government coalition only one week after Parliament's vote of confidence, has caught the political world by surprise.

The failure of the U.S. incursion in Iran Friday to rescue the American hostages in the Tehran embassy has been judged quite differently by two of the partners of the government of Premier Francesco Cossiga, which partners the premier's own Christian Democrats (DC), the Socialists (PSI) and Republicans (PRI).

The Socialists categorically condemned the attempt, while the Republicans censured the government's attitude and particularly a communique issued Friday by the Italian Foreign Ministry (the foreign minister is Christian Democrat Emilio Colombo) which was highly critical of the White House-ordered mission.

The two positions were further reiterated Sunday in speeches by "PSI" Secretary Bettino Craxi and by "PRI" Chairman Bruno Visentini.

According to Craxi, it was an error to abandon a line of prudence and patience. With respect to Italian solidarity with the United States, Craxi said that "this must not mean a mute and acritical acceptance of American decisions and initiatives but must make itself felt in a useful contribution to a solution of the hostage problem and in playing down the situation".

Visentini on the other hand said that the "Italian Government's position immediately after the American raid was extremely ambiguous. We cannot stay in the government on positions of this kind. In order to save the coalition we cannot give up fundamental choices for the country". Visentini added that the "real issue" of the new government is how the Socialists' position in international and economic fields will "hold".

"PRI" Secretary Giovanni Spadolini was more cautious. He said that the government parties have a joint interest, "back Italy's every effort in a European framework to achieve a political solution of the problem... There cannot and must not be dissent on these points".

"DC" Secretary Flaminio Piccoli reiterated his party's solidarity with the United States and lashed out against the Communist Party (PCI). He stressed the difference between the attitude of Italian Communist leaders, "cautious reservation on the (Soviet) invasion of Afghanistan last December and stepped up repression against Soviet intellectuals, and the harsh attacks against the United States in the last few days". Piccoli polemically asked "where has the communist trip to find its identity, at least in international policy, ended up?"

"PCI" leadership member Giorgio Napolitano had a more complex analysis of the current situation. "What we do not need in a moment such as this is unilateral propagandistic judgements. What we need is objectivity and courage in criticizing actions of force from whatever direction they originate and in contrasting the alarming developments in President Carter's policies [words indistinct].

Secretary Pietro Longo was also critical of the Italian Government. Longo observed that, with respect to the American incursion, only the "PSI" and "PCI" praised the Foreign Ministry communique. "Not bad for a government which proclaims itself self-sufficient". Longo queried what support and what consensus permits this self sufficiency. "The Republicans and the DC secretary do not agree with Cossiga and Colombo. So where is this self sufficiency? The present government has only the support of the PCI, PSI and DC left. [as received] This is the objective reality which cannot be denied."

Press Reaction

AU260935 Rome ANSA in English 0845 GMT 26 Apr 80

[Text] Rome, April 25 (ANSA)--The aborted attempt of an American task force to rescue the American hostages at the embassy in Tehran Thursday night, which has further heightened the international crisis, has become the focal issue of Italian politics, pushing aside domestic issues.

Meanwhile, Premier Francesco Cossiga continues today his lightning tour of European capitals in preparation of the European Economic Community (EEC) summit he will chair tomorrow and Monday in Luxembourg. Cossiga was in Paris and London yesterday, and will have further rounds of talk with "EEC" leaders in Brussels, Hamburg and Luxembourg today.

Various M.P.'s have filed questions in Parliament on the international crisis asking what steps the government intends to take to assure an effective political coordination within the EEC and with the United States.

In an editorial appearing in today's issue, the Christian Democrat (DC) party daily "IL POPULO" poses the question of whether it is possible to invert "the logic of rupture, of clash and of challenge". The paper stressed that the problem concerns primarily the United States and Iran but also involves the increasingly large political, strategic and economic areas of both Europe and the entire Asiatic Continent. The paper also said that everyone must make a solid commitment to save the vital principles of civil coexistence.

IRANIANS POSTPONE TRADE LEADERS' TRIP DUE TO U.S. ATTEMPT

AU280902 Rome ANSA in English 0825 GMT 28 Apr 80

[Text] Rome, April 28 (ANSA)--The planned visit to Iran of the secretaries of Italy's three confederated unions has been postponed. The Iranian Embassy in Rome announced Sunday that the visit planned by Luciano Lama (CGIL) [Italian General Confederation of Labor], Pierre Carniti (CISL) [Italian Confederation of Labor Unions] and Giorgio Benvenuto (UIL) [Italian Union of Labor] has been postponed because of the abortive U.S. incursion in Iran. The three secretaries were slated to meet in Tehran with President Bani-Sadr and with the fifty hostages in the American Embassy. The Iranian Embassy press secretary said that the date of the visit had not been set yet but was to have taken place at the end of April or early May.

BERLINGUER ARRIVES FROM PRC, DPRK; COMMENTS ON U.S. RAID

LD272114 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 1700 GMT 27 Apr 80

[Text] The Italian Communist Party [PCI] delegation led by Enrico Berlinguer is back in Rome from its 2-week journey to China and North Korea. Berlinguer declared himself extremely satisfied with the results of his meetings with the Chinese leaders. Concerning the failed American blitz in Iran, Berlinguer stated that it was an absurd military adventure which could have had very dangerous consequences for world peace.

Remarks on Trip, Iran

AU280858 Rome ANSA in English 0815 GMT 28 Apr 80

[Text] Rome, April 28 (ANSA)--Italian Communist Party (PCI) Secretary Enrico Berlinguer stressed on his return here Sunday from a visit to China and North Korea his "satisfaction over the encounters with Chinese and Korean comrades". He said that in North Korea the Italian and North Korean communist parties confirmed their convergence of positions and initiatives on the primary international issues and in the workers' movement. He singled out the basis for this convergence in the joint conviction with the development of international action in every direction. As for the resumption of relations with the Chinese Communist Party, Berlinguer said, it is not only important in itself but also for the manner and moment in which it was carried out.

Speaking at a press conference on his return Sunday the "PCI" leader said that his talks with Chinese leaders "proved that (our) differences, which were explained frankly also in public, do not prevent development of a useful dialogue, an effort for mutual understanding, a search for agreement and cooperation. "This is particularly important at a time when the entire world feels the dangers menacing peace.

"Many think that the problem can be solved through acts of force, pressure, threats and absurd military adventures such as the recent United States effort in Iranian territory. But reality shows that no one is so strong as to have or to think he has such technological superiority that he can ignore the will of every people and of every nation to be independent, to advance towards progress and to act as a protagonist in international life".

Berlinguer asserted that this is the reason why the "PCI" believes that this is the moment to trust in the superiority of politics, of dialogue and of negotiations to find solutions to tensions and conflicts and to offset threats which could lead to catastrophe and to create a system of cooperation and peaceful coexistence in the world.

One of the recurring points in Berlinguer's press conference was the abortive U.S. incursion in Iran Friday to rescue the fifty American hostages in the embassy in Tehran.

Berlinguer said that it was an "absurd military adventure which could have had every dangerous consequences on world peace" and reiterated that the most serious danger to world peace derives from a growing contrast between the two super powers.

The "PCI" secretary said that his party believes in a gradual elimination of the blocs and that this can come about through a decrease in international tension and development of cooperation.

INVESTIGATION INTO MORO CASE TO BE REOPENED

AU280908 Rome ANSA in English 0825 GMT 28 Apr 80

[Text] Rome, April 28 (ANSA)--The judicial investigation into the May 1978 slaying of Aldo Moro and the murder of his five-man bodyguard will be re-opened.

Magistrates investigating the Moro affair have come into possession of new information supplied by Patrizio Peci, the former head of the Turin column of the Red Brigades urban guerrilla organization, who has been cooperating with police since his arrest on February 19.

The investigation had reached its final stage when the public prosecutor filed his charges over a month ago-but the new information in the magistrates' hands convinced them to re-open the case.

Peci, who was questioned Saturday as a defendant in the Moro kidnapping, denied he took part in the ambush on March 16, 1978, in Rome. Peci said that the exclusive [as received] Mario Moretti (believed to be one of the Brigades' leaders) and Prospero Gallinari and Raffaele Fiore, both in prison, took part in the kidnapping and slaying of the five bodyguards. This is the first time that Fiore's name has been linked with the Moro case.

Peci also said that Franceo Piperno, Lanfranco Pace and Orests Scalzone, all in prison on charges linked to the Moro case, are leaders of the Red Brigades. The latter three are all members of the Worker's Autonomy Group which has always denied links with the Red Brigades.

LA VANGUARDIA ON OREJA, FRANCOIS-PONCET 12 APR DISCUSSIONS

LD231539 Barcelona LA VANGUARDIA in Spanish 13 Apr 80 p 5

[Unattributed report: "Francois-Poncet, Oreja Examine International Situation"]

[Text] Marcelino Oreja and Jean Francois-Poncet held an exchange of views on topics of mutual interest yesterday, taking advantage of the French foreign minister's brief stopover in Madrid while returning from Lisbon, where he attended the meeting of the Council of Europe's ministerial committee.

Madrid, 12 April--French Foreign Minister Jean Francois-Poncet arrived at Madrid Airport in the early hours of this morning on a working visit. On his arrival he was received by French Ambassador to Spain Mergerie and Spanish Ambassador to Paris Solano, as well as by senior Spanish Foreign Ministry officials.

At 1130 Oreja and Francois-Poncet began a working meeting at the Santa Cruz Palace which lasted about 2 hours. The respective ambassadors were present at the meeting, and several senior Foreign Ministry officials also took party.

Spanish Foreign Ministry sources told LA VANGUARDIA that "an important review of all international political topics affecting the two countries was conducted. The matters broached include the stance to be adopted on the Iran crisis, the holding of the Moscow Olympic games, the Madrid CSCE conference and the Sahara conflict." The EFE news agency states that the Afghanistan crisis in particular was reviewed within the broad examination of the international situation. In addition to the usual appraisals of bilateral topics, political cooperation between the EEC and Spain was discussed.

At the conclusion of the meeting--at about 1300--Oreja Aquirre held a luncheon for his French counterpart at his private residence, which was also attended by Spanish Minister Calvo Sotelo, the ambassadors, Under Secretary Puig de la Bellacasa and Directors General for Foreign Policy Duffour and Duran.

The topic of Spain's entry into the EEC was examined in depth during the meeting between the French minister and the Spanish Minister for Relations With the EC Calvo Sotelo, which was held in the afternoon.

This meeting is part of the periodic contacts which the Spanish minister holds with the representatives of the EEC member states within the context of the Spanish-EC negotiations. The last meeting between Calvo Sotelo and Francois-Poncet took place in Paris on 30 January.

Francois-Poncet left Madrid for Paris late in the afternoon.

DEPUTY PREMIER ABRIL EXPLAINS IMPENDING CABINET RESHUFFLE

LD241031 Barcelona LA VANGUARDIA in Spanish 13 Apr 80 p 9

[Jose Luis Martinez report: "Cabinet Reshuffle To Strengthen Autonomies"]

[Excerpt] Madrid, 12 April--LE FIGARO newspaper group held a dinner with Deputy Premier Abril Martorell last night, at which aspects of the current political situation were broached. [paragraph continues]

Abril began the conversation by making it clear that no political plans were formulated during the days of relaxation which he spent with Suarez in Mallorca during Easter week, that they were days of reflection to set their ideas in order and mainly days of relaxation.

Autonomy Agreement With PSOE

The deputy premier maintained that it is necessary to initiate talks with the Spanish Socialist Workers Party in order to jointly work out a "framework agreement" on autonomies which will make possible an effective and coherent implementation of Section VIII of the Constitution. However, he expressed belief that it is currently difficult to initiate a dialogue of this nature with the Socialist Party because of its current stances with respect to the government, but it will be possible in a few weeks' time.

Abril also stated that the meeting between [Prime Minister] Suarez and [Basque Premier] Garaicoechea should not be held at present, in view of the atmosphere of expectation which is being created in various sectors. Only Garaicoechea, he explained, is pressing for this meeting, but not Suarez. He then argued that it is undesirable for an image of negotiations between two sovereign powers to be disseminated.

Within a few weeks there will be a slight Cabinet reshuffle, which Abril Martorell described as a rational change. The reshuffle will be aimed, in particular, at strengthening an autonomy strategy, with greater dedication in people and resources to resolving this problem. In any event, this reshuffle depends on Garrigues' current medical condition--the creation of a new portfolio, a slight reshuffling or merging [corriniento] of others. The real change, Abril added, will come when he himself leaves the government--an event which he will celebrate with champagne, he joked.

The deputy premier modestly praised his economic ministerial team and intimated that they will all retain their posts, especially Bustelo and Garcia Diez.

He stated that he has advised Prime Minister Suarez not to speak on television in the near future since there is a danger of falling into a trap, as a result of the expectation which has been created with respect to this statement by the prime minister. On the other hand, the deputy premier as a personal friend of Suarez--an aspect which hemade clear on several occasions during the dinner--has suggested to him that he appear in public more frequently, but in order to talk about specific topics--for instance, on the occasion of future appointments of civil governors.

Need for Economic Debate

Abril disclosed that he has sought a debate on the country's economic situation in the Cortes--a step which would have been more natural for the opposition, in his opinion. He made a brief analysis of the Spanish economy, describing it once more as worrisome. According to experts, the crisis in Europe could continue for 15-20 years and, if no solutions are found at that time, there will be a catastrophe. He wants the debate which he is proposing, to make people realize the critical economic situation.

DENMARK

BEFORE RESCUE BID, IRAN SEEN AS HAVING 'CHANCE TO YIELD'

LD280815 Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Danish 23 Apr 80 p 10

[Editorial: "The European Reply"]

[Excerpts] Europe yesterday replied to President Carter's request for sanctions against Iran with a little of everything, but only little by little. In principle Europe shows total solidarity with the United States on the unconditional demand for the immediate release of the American hostages, who are now in their 6th month of detention in Tehran, contrary to all international law and diplomatic convention. In practice Europe wants to first run through the phase of political pressure which the United States already has behind it, before taking more definite steps toward a break with Iran.

Europe's reply to President Carter is a promise of full solidarity now in principle, but the actual extent of this solidarity and a date when it can be expected will be decided later by Europe. It is probably not the resounding declaration of confidence that the President had led the American public to expect. But it is a real piece of alliance politics which he should be able to use to argue for another scrap of patience in American policy. It could help him to accept yet another initiative on negotiations and to endure until the deadline the Iranians have given themselves by postponing a decision on the hostages until their full parliament is elected.

We must have no illusions that the parliament of the Islamic revolution, when it meets, will have an opinion that is greatly different from that of the ayatollah. But by setting the European sanction machinery in motion on a time switch which allows the Iranian leaders time to come to terms with the situation in their own country, the EEC foreign ministers have provided the men of good will, who must still exist in Iran, with the way out that was closed in the sense of confrontation with the United States in the last few weeks. It is an old political rule always to give an opponent the chance to yield before striking, and it is a good thing that Europe is able to follow it.

FOREIGN MINISTER MAKES STATEMENT ON U.S. RESCUE ATTEMPT

LD251804 Stockholm Domestic Service in Sweden 1600 GMT 25 Apr 80

[Excerpt] Ola Ullsten has expressed the view of the Swedish Government that the fact that United States has now been compelled to use military means to rescue the hostages indicates the inability of the Iranian leaders to put an end to the occupation of the embassy. They have thus created an explosive political situation. Ola Ullsten stresses in his statement that a peaceful settlement must, however, be reached.

NEW ENVOY TELLS BANI-SADR HOLDING OF HOSTAGES 'UNACCEPTABLE'

Ambassador Bundy was to have met the American diplomats who are at the Iranian Foreign Ministry today, but this meeting has been postponed.

COMMUNIST WILL NOT ATTEND CP'S PARIS MEETING

LD240855 Stockholm DAGENS NYHETER in Swedish 21 Apr 80 p 9

[TIDNINGARNAS TELEGRAMBYRA report: "Left Party-Communists Stays Away From Paris Meeting: We Must Mention Afghanistan"]

[Text] The Swedish Left Party-Communists will not take part in the meeting of European communist parties in Paris at the end of April. This was decided by the party Central Committee on Sunday as expected.

The theme of the Paris meeting will be disarmament and peace. The question of Afghanistan is not on the agenda. "It would be impossible to avoid mentioning Afghanistan at a peace conference," Left Party-Communists leader Lars Werner said. "If we went to Paris we would feel bound to raise the question. Then the split among communists in Europe would be obvious.

"In this situation we have decided not to take part in the conference. We consider that a conference on peace and disarmament should have as broad a base as possible. It is a question which concerns all progressive forces, not just communists," Werner said.

"I would like to stress that the Left Party-Communists have excellent relations with both the French and Italian communist parties," Lars Werner said at a press conference in Stockholm on Sunday.

DECISION ON TAKING CUBAN REFUGEES WILL TAKE 'SOME TIME'

LD231129 Stockholm SVENSKA DAGBLADET in Swedish 17 Apr 80 pp 1, 6

[Omar Magnegard report: "Cuban Refugees: Peru Asks Sweden for Help"]

[Excerpts] Peru's Stockholm Ambassador Carlos Gamarra Vargas has called on Foreign Ministry political chief Lennart Eckerberg and requested that Sweden accept some of the more than 10,000 Cubans who have been occupying Peru's Embassy in Havana for 10 days, SVENSKA DAGBLADET has heard.

Cubans have even gone directly to our ambassador in Havana, Anders Handstrom, in the last few days and asked if it is possible to be granted asylum and come to Sweden.

During his visit to Lennart Eckerberg, Ambassador Gamarra Vargas pleaded for Sweden to "show solidarity" and give Peru "moral support" in the difficult refugee situation.

As far as Sweden is concerned the question of the Cuban refugees is still in its initial stage. "We are studying the problem andare busy working out a basis for a decision," the Foreign Ministry explained on Wednesday.

Any possible government decision is likely to take some time, since the ministers most closely affected--Foreign Minister Ola Ullsten and Immigration Minister Karin Andersson--are both abroad at the moment.

LEADERS REACT TO FAILED RESCUE ATTEMPT

Thatcher Message to Carter

LD252026 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1813 GMT 25 Apr 80

[Text] Mrs Thatcher was tonight standing firm behind President Carter--despite mounting concern that Britain and the Allies were not consulted over the rescue attempt. The prime minister--who first heard of the fiasco in an early morning BBC newsflash--tonight sent the President a message expressing great admiration for his courage.

And in the Commons, as MPs raised the spectre of the action provoking world conflict Deputy Foreign Secretary Sir Ian Gilmour refused to condemn the Americans. "This is the time for allies to stick together and not criticize each other," he told stunned MPs.

Shadow Foreign Secretary Peter Shore summed up the mood. "The world is holding its breath this weekend," he said.

The crisis wiped 800 million pounds off shares on the London stock exchange and sent gold up 28 dollars an ounce and the dollar down.

Mrs Thatcher's message to President Carter expressed sympathy and said she had been much moved by his broadcast. The prime minister's public stance and swift support for the President hides private fears and criticism by ministers over his handling of the crisis. Reports that they were concerned about the stability of the Carter administration were described as "wild" but nevertheless there were few answers from them on what could happen next.

Sir Ian was asked by MPs to guarantee that in no circumstances would Britain support the United States in military action. But he avoided giving an answer.

There was strong pressure tonight for a Western summit meeting to clarify the whole situation--a request the President would be unlikely to resist after his appeal for support from his allies. The move will be given a full airing at Luxembourg this weekend when the Common Market heads of government meet. What worries Britain and the Nine is that they may be dragged into military action against their will for the sake of the unity of the alliance.

A group of Labour MPs left by Mr Anthony Wedgwood Benn today tabled [forwarded] a Commons motion calling on the government to withhold co-operation on economic sanctions against Iran unless Britain receives a firm assurance that no armed force will be used to secure the release of the hostages.

There were rumblings from both sides of the House over the President's lack of consultation over the abortive rescue. Whitehall took some pains to point out that Mrs Thatcher did not get the President's message about what had happened until 9 am--nearly two hours after hearing it on the radio. One interpretation of this was that Britain wants to record her displeasure at the President's go-it-alone decision.

Sir Ian confirmed that Britain had not been consulted but said she was aware of the possibility of a rescue effort. "We were not involved," he said. Later he said in reply to Mr Shore: "The greatest amount of consultation between the U.S. and Europe and her allies is thoroughly desirable."

Carrington Interview

LD260323 London BBC Television Network in English 2145 GMT 25 Apr 80

[Interview by Peter Snow with Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington on 25 April carried on the "Newsnight" program; introduced by John Tusa--place not given]

[Text] [Tusa] Earlier this week Western capitals were congratulating themselves on the fact that the EEC decision to coordinate diplomatic and economic sanctions against Iran in support of Mr Carter had removed for the time being at least the threat of military action. Fears in Washington that Mr Carter was on the slippery slope toward war seemed more a matter for future anxiety than immediate concern. Now, despite Mr Carter's attempted distinction between a rescue mission and a military operation, everything has been telescoped and to cap it all after months of allied complairts about lack of consultation by Washington there was virtually none about the rescue attempt. Peter Snow talked to Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington earlier this evening.

[Begin recording] [Snow] When did you first hear about this?

[Carrington] I heard about it on the BBC news this morning at 0730.

[Question] So you had no idea it was coming?

[Answer] No, we were informed that there was a possibility of this action in confidential channels and merely putting two and two together because one has seen quite a lot in the papers but nothing else.

[Question] How did you react to this information when it was first given? Did you think it might be wise to tell President Carter not to do it?

[Answer] Well, I would not really like to go into that. I mean just let me say, you know we have a lot of confidential talks with the Americans, and it emerged in one of these confidential talks.

[Question] But what is your reaction to it now that it has happened?

[Answer] Well, if it had been a success I think that we would all be applauding and saying what a daring thing and how it solved the problem. So I am sorry that it did not succeed and I am extremely sorry for President Carter that it did not succeed. It was obviously an operation of very great difficulty because if you look at the map Tehran is a very long way away from anywhere.

[Question] But this was an act of force. Was he right, was he wise to try it?

[Answer] I do not think that President Carter would think that it was an act of force in the sense that you are talking about.

[Question] What do you think?

[Answer] If I could just explain that when he was talking about an act of force to the allies, for example, and talking about sanctions, I think he was thinking of mining the ports and the blockade and varied acts of war, and I think that he himself would feel that this was not an act of war against Iran or the Iranian people but a measure taken to rescue hostages who were illegally kept--and I think there is a distinction.

I must say I agree with him: I think there is a distinction between that and acts against the Iranian people by mining the ports and by blockade.

[Question] Are you then giving this operation your full approval?

[Answer] It is not a question of giving my full approval. We were not consulted and that was that and anyway it is over. But I am rather sorry it did not work.

[Question] But you do not think it was a mistake in terms of the alliance, the future of world peace and so on?

[Answer] People always think things were a mistake unless they come off. If it had come off everybody would have thought that this was absolutely marvelous, so I do not think we want to be too critical.

[Question] What do you think about the situation now that this has happened? Do you get the feeling--yesterday we had some White House advisers who were saying that we are now on a slippery slope to war.

[Answer] No, I do not think we are on a slippery slope to war but I do think the situation is very grave. I think that in a way we are concentrating on the situation in Iran when the real danger is the situation in Afghanistan where you have this invasion of a neutral country by the Soviet Union right outside Europe and for the first time using its troops, and I think that is very serious. I do not think that we can accept that or even accept that it is irreversible. Equally, I think that the situation in Iran inevitably rubs off on that situation, and both those situations have an effect upon the whole problem of the Middle East and the Arab-Israel question. And so I do think that that area of the world at the moment is fraught with danger.

[Question] What do you think we should be telling the Russians now?

[Answer] I think that the Russians ought to realize two things: first of all, that what has happened in Afghanistan is not going to be forgotten by the West and is not going to be acceptable and is not going to be considered irreversible. We shall go on pressing for them to withdraw and this is not a 9-day, 3-month or 6-month campaign. The second thing: I think that the Russians ought to realize the mood of the American people. You've only got to go to America to see the way that the hostages are on the front pages of every newspaper all the time, that there is this program in the evening, that it is very much in the minds of the American people and that the American people feel frustrated that the most powerful country in the world is held to ransom by an Iranian Government--anyway some Iranians--in defiance of the International Court of Justice, in defiance of the United Nations. And I believe that the Russians ought to realize that the American people are in a mood in which they feel very, very angry and frustrated.

[Question] Are you then really happy that President Carter, the President of the most powerful nation in the world, is entirely in control of events, and that through miscalculations of his own he won't be drifting toward some kind of a dangerous situation like a war?

[Answer] When you talk about being in control of events you talk as if you were in control of a dog that you would take for a walk on a leash. Foreign affairs really is not like that. What you have to do is to make a number of judgments about what is happening and to analyze the situation and to get your timing and your decisions right. Sometimes you get it wrong, sometimes you get it right.

[Question] What is he doing, right or wrong?

[Answer] I don't myself think it is fair to say that events are out of control. I think that there are some grave times ahead and all of us have got to make right decisions.

[Question] You think he is getting his timing right on the whole?

[Answer] I don't know about the timing on the rescue operation. I would have thought on the timing on Iran I think that he has been exceedingly patient. I do not think you could fault him on that.

[Question] If we now do have to move to a situation in which President Carter, because the hostages are not released in the next 3 or 4 weeks, has to confront the prospect of the use of force, will you support him, a blockade?

[Answer] I don't think the use of force is the right way to solve this problem. I don't believe it would be the right way to do it because I cannot myself see it necessarily being very successful. I think that I would greatly sympathize with the Americans and I have already with the dilemma they find themselves in, but I would hope very much they would not resort to the use of force.

[Question] Would you consel them not to do it?

[Answer] I think it is very unwise to say what you would do in circumstances which you do not know about in 3 or 4 weeks, 5 or 6 months' time. The whole situation may be totally different but I still do not think the use of force is probably right.

[Question] But you have already heard President Carter touch on the possibility of using force and not in connection with grabbing the hostages out but in the general connection of a blockade. Isn't that enough to have triggered off a counsel on your part to him not to use force?

[Answer] I never believe that when you talk to your friends in private you should tell everybody in public what you said to them.

[Question] You are implying that you have talked?

[Answer] No, I was not implying anything. I was implying I was not going to tell.

[Question] It is the impression you give.

[Answer] I was implying I wasn't going to tell you.

[Question] Let me ask the question in a different way. Is there a situation in which you might see here a Suez in reverse, where your government, your predecessors were counselled by the Americans not to use force in Suez. Can you see yourself perhaps counselling the Americans not to make a mistake?

[Answer] What you say to friends and allies that of course depends first of all on what you believe to be the most helpful thing to say and secondly on your belief in the essential solidarity of the alliance subject to the advice that you give. And I really do think it is important that all of us should maintain the solidarity of the alliance--otherwise I think that the whole of the free world is going to be in great danger. The Americans are very vital to us. They are in trouble and when your friends are in trouble you help them out and you do not spend your time being critical and carping. But at the same time if you believe it to be sensible and right you give them advice which you believe to be good advice.

[Question] What are the dangers, what could actually happen? I mean people watching this may be asking themselves, I mean here are these chaps talking about a very serious situation, a grave crisis. What could actually go wrong? Could, is it conceivable Iran could fall apart, and the Russians move in and the West have to counter that? How could this get any worse?

[Answer] I think you could find a situation in which Iran did break up and I have no doubt that the only beneficiaries of that would be the Soviet Union. I think it would break up more because of the internal conflict in Iran itself then because of any outside pressures, but that would be very serious and there is no doubt about it that if it did break up it would lead to some very grave problems in that part of the world, and no doubt very great problems for the West generally in terms of its oil supplies and the Gulf. And I think that the Russians must be aware of this and must be made aware of this.

[Question] If they move into Iran you would not tolerate it: President Carter has made that clear already.

[Answer] Yes.

[Question] You would not either.

[Answer] No, I mean this. I think this would be very dangerous for the Western world.

[Question] Final one. Chancellor Schmidt talked about this looking like 1914. Do you think it is as bad as that?

[Answer] No, I think there were certain similarities--I mean by which he means of course that people gradually slide into war by mistake. I would have thought that we are all rather conscious of that; anyway we ought to be conscious of it because Chancellor Schmidt has been saying it and so we must be very careful that that does not happen.

[Question] Do you agree with him?

[Answer] What do you mean, that it is similar to 1914? I think that can be overemphasized.

[Question] Thank you very much, Lord Carrington. [end recording]

Opposition's Shore Rejects Force

LD271518 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1411 GMT 27 Apr 80

[Text] Shadow Foreign Secretary Mr Peter Shore today rejected suggestions that military force should be used to release the American hostages in Iran. "There is no question of our giving support to any of the military options...", Mr Shore said on London weekend television's "Weekend World" programme. Mr Shore said he would support President Carter in other moves to free the hostages provided the means of achieving them seemed likely to be effective. He stressed the hostages were an international problem and called for initiatives to release them to involve the United Nations and Russia. Mr Shore said neither America or Russia wanted a confrontation over Iran if the situation in the country deteriorated. If Russia was tempted to move in militarily because of Iran's "disintegration" there was all the more reason for a "meeting of minds" between the nations over the issue.

BIPARTISAN APPROACH ON IRAN CRISIS IN DANGER

LD270953 London THE SUNDAY TELEGRAPH in English 27 Apr 80 p 1

[Peter Simmonds article: "Two-Party Unity in Peril"]

[Text] The bi-partisan approach of the government and the shadow cabinet to the Iranian crisis is in serious danger after the abortive military attempt to rescue the American hostages.

Mr Callaghan and his shadow cabinet are to review their earlier tentative decision to support the government in pushing through a bill allowing economic sanctions against Iran. The shadow cabinet understood that economic sanctions would forestall American military action. The Common Market foreign ministers agreed last Monday to go ahead with sanctions legislation on the same understanding.

Mr Shore, the shadow foreign secretary who pushed in the shadow Cabinet for support for the bill, is expected to argue now that Labour support should be contingent at least on an unequivocal statement by the government that it will not support further military action by America in the Gulf. But the argument of many Labour MPs that the party should have nothing to do with the bill has been given impetus by the American rescue attempt. The immediate response of the government in the wake of the attempt is that the government remains committed to introducing a bill.

The anxiety of some Labour MPs about the siting of cruise and Pershing missiles in Britain has also been heightened by the way Mr Carter launched his military venture in Iran, without consultations with allies or the American Congress. The MPs will use this as further evidence of the need to know the precise procedures under which the missiles can be launched.

Mr Tam Dalyell, Labour MP for West Lothian who chaired a meeting at the Commons last week of 60 Labour MPs fearful that economic sanctions could boomerang, gave a warning yesterday that the bill would get a "tempestuous" passage. Sanctions on an ascetic, stubborn Iran could simply be counterproductive, Mr Dalyell, secretary of the party's Foreign Affairs Committee, said in Edinburgh.

ENVOY RETURNS TO IRAN; THATCHER TO ATTEND EEC SUMMIT 'EARLY'

LD261508 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1207 GMT 26 Apr 80

[By Tom McMullan, PA diplomatic staff]

[Text] Britain's ambassador to Iran, Sir John Graham, will return to Tehran tomorrow evening, the Foreign Office announced today. He will be flying to Iran at about the time Mrs Thatcher and the Common Market heads of government, meeting in Luxembourg, will be discussing how to respond to the failure of President Carter's efforts to free the American hostages in Tehran by military means. A Foreign Office spokesman said that the ambassador's return was in line with the decision reached last week by Common Market foreign ministers.

This decision provided for a two-stage sanctions plan against Iran, a reduction in diplomatic representation followed by trade sanctions if the hostages were not released by mid-May. The Foreign Office said that ambassadors from the seven other Common Market countries, who had diplomatic relations with Iran would also be returning to the Iranian capital. They would seek an early meeting with President Bani-Sadr to convey to him the Common Market's decision.

In London, it was confirmed that Mrs Thatcher, accompanied by Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington, will leave a few hours early tomorrow for the Luxembourg summit. She was originally due to leave in the late morning but this has now been brought forward by several hours. This will give the Common Market leaders more time to discuss the international crisis, particularly after the failure of the American rescue effort, and also how to resolve Britain's problem over the size of its budget contribution.

Foreign affairs are expected to be discussed at the first session in the afternoon. A key issue will be whether the Common Market leaders should seek an early meeting with President Carter or bring forward the economic summit arranged for Venice in late June.

USE OF CIVILIAN PLANES TO FERRY TROOPS TO ASIA DISCUSSED

LD251258 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1223 GMT 25 Apr 80

[By Robert Hutchinson, PA defence correspondent]

[Text] The British Government is holding discussions with Washington about the possibility of providing civilian wide-bodied jets to ferry U.S. forces to S.W. Asia if necessary, Whitehall sources confirmed today. But Britain has no specific plans for any such operation.

The talks are on two levels--inside the NATO framework and bi-laterally between London and Washington. The Western alliance's long term defence programme, agreed at the London summit three years ago, identified a need for America's allies to provide wide-bodied cargo capable aircraft to help in the trans-Atlantic air bridge of reinforcements for Europe in times of war.

An RAF spokesman said today: "We have been active in alliance discussions on how to meet this requirement. "UK should be able to achieve the target that NATO seems likely to set by drawing on civilian aircraft available to the government in times of emergency."

NATO at one stage tried to convince airlines to modify the cargo holds of their wide-bodied jets to carry equipment and ammunition. But the airlines said the added weight and cost of modification would hit their business and now NATO is in touch with the jet manufacturers to try to get these changes incorporated in the next generation of aircraft.

Meanwhile it was learned today that the government had not yet made any official approaches to British Airways or other civil airlines for the use of their wide-bodied jets. But if a call comes, the airlines are bound by the Civil Aviation Act to accept the requisitioning by the state of any necessary aircraft.

British Airways has 40 aircraft suitable for transporting troops and equipment. These include Boeing 747 jumbo jets and Lockheed Tristars.

Under the act, the government can also call on British Airways to operate the jets.

Two other British airlines also operate wide-bodied jets--Laker Airways, with nine McDonnell-Douglas DC-10's, and British Caledonian with four DC-10's.

British Airways said the number of aircraft it had for troop charter work was very limited. "If we had to take aircraft out of regular service this would be at some consequential financial loss," a spokesman said.

VANCE RESIGNATION CITED AS 'MOST SERIOUS OF REPERCUSSIONS'

AT281100 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1000 GMT 28 Apr 80

[Text] It was reported from Washington that the resignation of U.S. Secretary of State Cyrus Vance is considered the most serious of repercussions after the recent failure of the U.S. attempt to save the Tehran hostages.

News agency reports note that the Vance resignation is a clear expression of disagreement within the U.S. administration and was undertaken at the worst possible moment for President Carter who is continuing his election campaign. According to all reports, through his resignation Vance wanted to forcefully express his disagreement over the way in which President Carter appears to be determined to solve the U.S.-Iranian crisis. It is stressed that Vance was a staunch defender of detente in U.S.-Soviet relations while the White House, in contrast, referred a more forceful policy, thus progressively and gradually proceeding toward some form of confrontation.

PARTIES REACT TO U.S. RESCUE ATTEMPT IN IRAN

KKE (Exterior) Statement

AT261304 Athens RIZOSPASTIS in Greek 26 Apr 80 p 1

[Text] The KKE [Exterior] Central Committee Press Office yesterday published the following statement:

"Today's military act by the U.S. imperialists in Iran has provoked an international uproar and repugnance.

"This dirty operation constitutes an undisguised military act against Iran, a blunt violation of its sovereign rights. It reveals that through the excuse of rescuing the hostages the Americans are promoting their long-term plans for suppressing the Iranian Revolution and forcibly imposing imperialist domination in the Persian Gulf area. It also reveals that an entire imperialist-anti-Soviet-anticommunist campaign had been prepared to cover up the U.S. aggressive plans against the countries of the area.

"At this moment, the first duty of all peace-loving forces is to manifest solidarity with the Iranian people's struggle against U.S. imperialism, their country's independence and sovereignty and the struggle of the other peoples of the area, and to hold a worldwide rally to repulse the dangerous imperialist plans.

"The tense situation that is shaping up is fraught with immense direct threats of Greek involvement in U.S. adventures because our country is dotted with U.S. military bases similar to those that were used for the U.S. operation against Iran, and because the Americans have unequivocally stated that without the use of NATO's southeastern wing 'it would be madness' to proceed with an intervention in the Persian Gulf area.

"The government can no longer play with the country's fate and our people's future. We ask it to state without delay that it will not allow the use of Greek territory as a springboard for U.S. military operations against Iran and the other countries of the area and to immediately proceed with the closing of the U.S. bases."

KKE (Interior) Statement

AT271314 Athens I AVYI in Greek 27 Apr 80 p 1

[Text] The KKE (Interior) Press Office has announced the following:

The KKE (Interior) Central Committee Executive Office convened extraordinarily and dealt with the situation which has developed since the U.S. provocation in Iran.

In the spirit of the statement it issued yesterday, the Executive Office stresses the great dangers which have been created for peace and the threat of our country's involvement in U.S. imperialism's adventurist military activities.

It considers it necessary to immediately take measures by the Greek side--A) to condemn the U.S. adventurist activity; B) to express solidarity with the Iranian people and the Iranian Revolution which are being put to the test; and C) to make it absolutely clear that the government in no way will accept having the country involved in any kind of military operations or having national territory along with the air and sea space used for similar purposes.

The Executive Office considers that the democratic parties owe it to themselves to coordinate their forces so that all national and peace-loving forces of the country are activated en masse to achieve the above goals.

For peace, for detente, for noninvolvement in adventurist adventures and for brotherly solidarity with the Iranian Revolution.

Further Party Reaction

AT261257 Athens I AVYI in Greek 26 Apr 80 p 1

[Excerpts] Yesterday there was no reaction from the Greek Government to the U.S. operation in Iran, an operation that all parties of the democratic opposition--like international public opinion--strongly condemned and described as a threat to international peace.

Government personalities said last night that the Greek Government "does not have sufficient information regarding the issue" despite the fact that according to informed sources U.S. Minister [as published] McCloskey yesterday morning visited Foreign Minister G. Rallis and briefed him in this regard.

The KKE (Interior) Press Office published the following statement yesterday:

"Washington's adventurist operation against Iran is a provocation, an undisguised act of war which violates all rules of international law. It is not an act for the rescue of hostages but an attack against the Iranian Revolution for the establishment of the sovereignty of U.S. imperialism in the Persian Gulf.

"The danger of a local or broader military clash is filled with inestimable consequences for the peace of the area and the entire world. From one hour to the next our country may suffer the consequences of such a development.

"The government must express disapproval for Washington's provocation, which has caused international indignation, and must abstain from any form of encouragement or support for the U.S. aggressiveness with facilities of the United States in the Greek area which would increase the danger for our country's involvement in U.S. adventures.

"All the country's national and peace-loving forces must condemn this aggressive act and must, with coordinated action, ask for the immediate withdrawal of the U.S. interventionist force and of all the other foreign forces from the Persian Gulf and the Middle East, for our country's noninvolvement in these imperialist plans and must struggle for the perservation of peace, national integrity and independence."

PASOK Chairman A. Papandreou made the following statement:

"Washington's irresponsible military act constitutes a direct threat to international peace. At this time, which is critical for humanity, it is the duty of all governments and all political forces struggling to save and consolidate detente and peace to condemn the provocative and adventurist policy originating at the White House. We call on the Greek Government to fulfill its duty to the Greek people and condemn the military operation in Iran."

KODISO [Democratic Socialist Party] Chairman I. Pesmazoglou stated that our country must express its categorical opposition to the U.S. operation in Iran which, regardless of its result, constitutes an act that endangers international peace.

"The citing of humanitarian motives by the U.S. administration does not justify a military intervention which creates dangers of sweeping all peoples into the calamity of war," I. Pesmazoglou added.

The EDA [United Democratic Left] Press Office issued the following statement:

Without ignoring the illegal nature of holding hostage U.S. diplomats, something that should be ended through peaceful negotiations, EDA believes that this act is one more confirmation of the U.S. adventurism which sometimes hypocritically concerns itself with the guarantee of detente and peace and sometimes does not hesitate to risk a new bloodbath for humanity.

COAST GUARD FIRES AT TURKISH GUNBOATS OFF SAMOS

AT261352 Athens AKROPOLIS in Greek 26 Apr 80 p 10

[Text] Yesterday a Greek Coast Guard station opened fire with small weapons at two Turkish gunboats which were sailing through the narrow strait between Samos and the Turkish coast. It is pointed out that the distance between the Greek and Turkish coasts at that point is not more than 3 miles. The Turkish gunboats did not reply to the Greek gunfire but continued on their way and departed. It is believed that the Greek side will protest through diplomatic channels to the Turkish Government and will claim that the Turkish gunboats violated Greek territorial waters.

OFFICIALS COMMENT ON CONSEQUENCES OF U.S. ACTION IN IRAN

Demirel Statement

TA251813 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1800 GMT 25 Apr 80

[Text] Pointing out that relations between the United States and Iran were causing concern, Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel said that the U.S. hostages in Iran should not be harmed. Demirel said that killing the U.S. hostages would be an inhuman act. Demirel made this statement as he was emerging from his weekly meeting with acting President Ihsan Sabri Caglayangil. Today's meeting started at 1800 and lasted 1 hour and 20 minutes. In a statement after the meeting Demirel said that all the details of the strained relations between the United States and Iran were not yet clear. Demirel added: I wish that this problem could be solved before it gets worse. Both sides must make efforts so that cool heads and commonsense prevail.

Additional Demirel Comments

TA252040 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 2015 GMT 25 Apr 80

[Excerpt] Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel replied to questions by reporters as he was emerging from his weekly meeting with the president.

[Begin recording] [Question by unidentified reporter] In its 1700 newscast today, the BBC reports that Carter sent a message to the Allied countries notifying them that bases in these countries might eventually be used by the United States. Has such a message reached Turkey?

[Demirel] At this hour we have received no such message in this regard.

[Question] What will Turkey's (?stand) be?

[Answer] The situation is very confused. That is to say even the parties which are involved in the incident have not yet openly stated their position. How can we do so? Turkey's stand shall not be to the detriment of its Allies or neighbors. Turkey shall adopt a stand that will help to improve and not worsen the issue. To date we have tried to play an appeasing, conciliatory and unifying role in this issue. Except for Turkey, there is almost no other country that could play this role. What the future holds shall depend on the development of events. At this moment I cannot comment on that.

[Question] Have you taken any initiative on today's events regarding the fate of the hostages...?

[Answer] You have no one to talk to. It is difficult to find a respondent. This is the difficulty.

[Question] Will you take any conciliatory action?

[Answer] I cannot comment on this subject at the moment. [end recording]

Prime Minister Demirel told the journalists that the latest incidents between the United States and Iran would be discussed by the Council of Ministers in a meeting tommorrow. He recalled that a discussion would be held in the Grand National Assembly tomorrow on foreign policy issues.

Council of Ministers' Statement

TA261517 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1500 GMT 26 Apr 80

[Text] It has been announced that in its meeting today the Council of Ministers discussed the latest developments in the relations between the United States and Iran. The meeting was held under the chairmanship of Prime Minister Demirel. A statement issued at the end of the meeting, which began at 1030 and lasted 3 hours, says:

The Council of Ministers has discussed the operation, which attempted but which reportedly failed, to protect [as heard] the members of the U.S. Embassy in Tehran who are being held hostage there. The Council of Ministers has concluded that the incident might lead to high levels of tension in our region as well as in the world. The Council of Ministers believes that, even though holding diplomats as hostages is contrary to international law and to the rule that ambassadors should not be harmed, this de facto situation which has lasted more than 5 months should be settled through peaceful means. Our Council has decided to speed up efforts to ensure a peaceful settlement of the conflict between brotherly Iran--to which we are tied as a neighbor, and by friendship and moral ties--and the United States--with which we have ties of friendship and alliance. Consequently, our Council has concluded that it would be appropriate to establish closer relations with the concerned parties.

Erkmen's Assembly Address

TA261625 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 26 Apr 80

[Text] The foreign policy debate held at the joint session of the Senate and National Assembly has ended. The debates were held under the chairmanship of National Assembly President Cahit Karakas. The first to speak at the meeting which began at 1400 was Foreign Minister Hayrettin Erkmen. He talked about Turkey's foreign policy and the recent developments in the Middle East. On the U.S. operation in Iran, Erkmen said: I would like to say clearly that the planes used in the operation did not come from Turkish skies.

Erkmen said that Turkey favors a peaceful settlement of the hostage problem. He added that it was against international law that the students had taken hostage the diplomats serving at the U.S. Embassy in Tehran. Erkmen added: This conflict must be resolved. However, it is preferable that it is resolved in a peaceful way. We have been Iran's neighbor throughout history. We have friendly ties with Iran, brotherly ties and moral ties. We must certainly view Iran from this viewpoint. It is a pleasure and an honor for us to carry out our duties in the peaceful settlement of the problem. However, the dimensions of the problem are so great that it cannot be solved with the help of one country or diplomatic means. We believe that it is necessary and possible to seek, through peaceful methods, means for putting an end to Iran's problem and the United States' bruised condition.

Senator Tuncel's Address

TA261735 Ankara ANATOLIA in Turkish 1620 GMT 26 Apr 80

[Text] Ankara, 26 Apr (AA)--Justice Party Senator from Izmir Suleyman Tuncel has described the U.S. military operation undertaken to release the hostages in Iran as "an unfortunate attempt."

Tuncel said: "It is my hope that the United States will not make another such unfortunate and abortive attempt. We are convinced that such attempts would have dangerous consequences for the region as well as for the entire world.

Senator Tuncel addressed the Grand National Assembly today during the off-the-agenda debate on recent developments in the region on behalf of the Justice Party Senate and National Assembly groups. Tuncel said that "Iran's integrity, sovereignty and independence as well as the establishment of a stable and democratic system in Iran is essential for Turkey's security."

We Are Opposed To the Use of Force

Pointing out that "Turkey has always been opposed to the use of force in international relations and it will continue to be opposed, Tuncel continued: "I would like to state that we have observed that, when events in the Middle East are viewed as a whole, the situation in the region could--if vital interests are damaged--spread outside the region and escalate into a general hot war between blocs."

Assessing the "general conflict of interests in the world," Tuncel noted that "the interests of the superpowers have been in competition, particularly in the region inside the Ankara, Kabul and Addis Ababa triangle in recent years."

Stressing the strategic importance of the region within this triangle, Tuncel added: "The fact that a large part of the oil in the world is produced in this region is the reason for the conflict of interests between the blocs."

Tuncel concluded his speech, saying: "It is a fact that the implementation of one-sided and pro-Western policies will not be beneficial in the face of developments which involve so much conflict from the viewpoint of our national interests and foreign relations. We should maintain our position within NATO for our security. We should continue fraternal and sincere relations with Iran, Iraq, Syria and other Islamic countries. We should pursue a flexible but determined policy toward the Soviet Union and other neighbors, which would give priority to our country's security and national interests in the face of possible developments, based on continuing good relations within the framework of detente."

Feyzioglu Appeal for Unity

TA261144 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 26 Apr 80

[Text] Republican Reliance Party leader Turhan Feyzioglu said that gravely dangerous developments that might threaten world and regional peace are taking place around Turkey. At a news conference in Ankara, Feyzioglu said that the Soviet Union might try to take advantage of the attempted U.S. military intervention in Iran and the U.S. decision to impose an economic embargo on Iran. Expressing concern over the developments in the Middle East, Feyzioglu said that Turkey, more than ever, needs national unity in the face of these foreign problems.

[Text] Three U.S. Air Force C-130 planes have taken off from a base in Egypt and have entered Iranian airspace. Because of a technical failure which resulted in a clash between the two planes and the death of eight U.S. soldiers, the aggressive operation was cancelled. Western news agencies report the White House spokesman as having said that President Carter assumes full responsibility for this dangerous adventure. The spokesman refrained from a detailed statement.

Commentary on Mission

TA270831 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0730 GMT 27 Apr 80

[Unattributed commentary]

[Text] U.S. imperialism's military aggression against Iran is causing wide protests in the world at large. It is being pointed out that more than 700 U.S. troops took part in this provocative act carried out under the guise of saving the hostages in Tehran. The aggression, which was halted because two U.S. planes collided, is being considered as an additional step in Carter's policy of dragging the world into a new war. The Soviet TASS agency described as an unprecedented adventure this U.S. military provocation. This imperialist aggression was strongly denounced in a mass rally held in Tehran, which stressed that the Iranian Revolution would be preserved forever. As the world public was protesting this adventurous act of the Carter administration, a group of U.S. senators asked Carter to withdraw his candidacy for President.

It was also revealed that the U.S. planes that participated in U.S. imperialism's military and provocative aggression against Iran took off from the Incirlik base. The fact that Turkish personnel employed at the U.S. Embassy in Ankara were sent out of the embassy under the pretext of forced leave is the biggest proof of this. Worried by the wide public reaction, Demirel and Foreign Minister Erkmen are trying to hide the fact that the U.S. planes left from the Incirlik base. In this way they are preparing the ground for a second U.S. military aggression against Iran. In a statement in which he tried to hide the fact that the U.S. planes took off from the Incirlik base, Erkmen said: There has been no such request submitted to us. It is being claimed that the FRG and the NATO headquarters were not notified of the U.S. military aggression against Iran. How could Demirel and Erkmen be notified of an aggression undertaken without the knowledge of even the FRG and NATO?

By signing the slavery agreement with the United States, the Demirel government has prepared the ground for our country to become involved in the adventures of the imperialists. Taking advantage of the situation our country is going through, the imperialist United States is trying to drag our country into such very dangerous adventures. The Demirel government has shouldered the task of being the gendarme of the United States in our region. The Demirel government, which has hurriedly signed the slavery agreement with the United States, is trying to force through parliament the oppressive emergency bills to force our people into such an adventure.

We are calling on all patriotic, progressive and democratic people and organizations: Let us not allow the United States to drag our country into fire. The U.S. and NATO bases must be removed from our soil; the bilateral slavery agreements must be torn up. Let us close our ranks in the struggle against the passing of all the antidemocratic oppressive Demirel emergency bills. Together with the regional peoples, let us make our voice heard against the aggressive actions of U.S. imperialism.

22 COMMUNIST PARTIES MEET IN PARIS

ID2904 44 Paris Domestic Service in French 0600 GMT 29 Apr 80

[Text] Today is the 2d day of the European communist parties conference on peace and disarmament. Yesterday there was an attempt, for whatever it may be worth, to forget the most important absent delegations, namely, the Italians, the Spaniards, the Romanians and the Yugoslavs. Much commented on was the strong attack by Czechoslovak representative Vasil Bilak against the Americans, accusing them of wanting to bury the Final Act of the Helsinki Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe.

And you will not be surprised if I tell you that the Czechoslovak was not the only one to have a go at the Americans. Having said this, the conference ought to close with an appeal of the 22 parties represented for a rallying in Europe of all peace forces, implying of course that all these peace forces are those gathering around Big Brother Moscow. On this point, as a matter of fact, Soviet representative Ponomarev, even if he launched a very ecumenical invitation for the union of all democratic, socialist, social-democratic and Christian forces, did not beat around the bush. His statement that the USSR is the main guarantor of world peace does not leave much room for those who do not think exactly the same way. It was no doubt in order to attenuate this revealed truth that the French delegation head Maxime Gremetz displayed a conciliatory spirit by affirming that the sovereign decision of every party on the participation in a meeting such as this must be respected, because in fact the preoccupation of the participants yesterday was one of papering over the deep divisions that there are with those absent (namely the Italians, the Spaniards, the Yugoslavs and the Romanians), those who in the name of so-called Eurocommunism did not want to put on a jersey that looks a little too much like that of the Moscow dynamo club.

IMF COMMITTEE MEETING ENDS, ADOPTS COMMUNIQUE

OW260358 Tokyo KYODO in English 0124 GMT 26 Apr 80

[Text] Hamburg April 25 KYODO--The interim committee, the main policymaking body of the International Monetary Fund (IMF), wound up a one-day meeting here Friday after adopting a joint communique stressing the need to continue the fight against inflation. Japanese Finance Minister Noboru Takeshita said the meeting was significant in that financial leaders of the world came to a common understanding on the necessity to give top priority of policy to fight against inflation. The financial leaders also agreed to promote international cooperation in execution of fiscal and monetary policies, prevention of protectionism and recycling of oil money, he added.

Meanwhile, there had been hopes before the meeting that finance ministers and central bank governors might be able to reach a final agreement on the establishment of the long-debated substitution account, a mechanism to absorb surplus dollars in the world for stabilization of foreign exchange markets. But they failed to reach such an agreement, due to difference of views on technical problems, such as methods of operating the account. According to Japanese delegation sources, the establishment of the substitution account will most likely be delayed until 1981 or after. The participating financial leaders agreed on the basic need to recycle oil money from oil-producing nations to countries with balance of payments difficulties. They, however, were unable to agree on concrete steps to be taken in this direction.

The results of the interim committee will be reported to an IMF-World Bank joint meeting to be held in Washington this autumn.

EC SUMMIT CLOSES IN LUXEMBOURG; NO ACCORD ON BUDGET ISSUE

U.S. Relations Discussed

LD281216 Paris Domestic Service in French 1100 GMT 28 Apr 80

[By correspondent Dominique Souchier in Luxembourg]

[Excerpt] It has been said of this [EC] summit that it would be dominated by agricultural and budget questions. This morning's breakfast, however, was devoted to something quite different--the international situation. It was an unscheduled meeting which revealed the real preoccupations of the Nine--Carter, for example, much more than the mutton war or quarrels about big money. The Nine are thinking over their relations with the United States but they will reaffirm their solidarity with the American people for two reasons. On the one hand, they believe that the failure of the American raid does not change anything fundamentally--the Tehran taking of hostages remains unacceptable--and, on the other hand, Europeans consider that the Soviet occupation in Afghanistan is an even greater cause for concern than the development of the Iranian situation. Hence, this morning's breakfast.

Margaret Thatcher, Helmut Schmidt and Valery Giscard d'Estaing wanted to compare their analyses and unite their efforts. The three are not believed to have talked about other problems.

French Proposal on Budget

LD281227 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 28 Apr 80 p 1

[Alan Osborn dispatch: "France Offers Deal in EEC Budget Row"]

[Text] Luxembourg--The long and bitter argument over the size of Britain's net payment into the Common Market budget was on the way to solution at the EEC summit in Luxembourg last night following a surprise initiative by France.

France's proposal caused a major stir at the opening of the two-day Common Market summit meeting, and there was not immediate reaction from Mrs Thatcher, even though she had been informed of the plan in general on Friday.

Essentially, President Giscard d'Estaing proposed yesterday that instead of cutting Britain's annual pounds 1,100 million contribution to the EEC by an agreed amount, the member countries should place a ceiling on the amount Britain pays--and he suggested the 1979 net contribution as a base.

The French did not put a figure on this, but British officials calculated it at pounds 500 million. If that figure were to be agreed, Britain would thus get an effective reduction of pounds 600 million or so in its 1980 contribution.

At first glance this would be far too little to satisfy Mrs Thatcher and would indeed represent barely "half a loaf" which she has already rejected. But the charm of the French plan from Britain's point of view is that it would increase the effective amount of the reduction in 1981 and 1982 when the net contribution would be expected to rise to well over pounds 1,200 million and perhaps approach pounds 1,500 million. In a sense, then the French plan could provide a cut of pounds 1,000 million in the British EEC bill in 1982.

However, it was still unclear yesterday whether or not the French want to build in some kind of progressive mechanism to the ceiling--to keep it in line with inflation for instance, or with the growth in the EEC budget overall.

Moreover, there is no clear agreement on the actual level of Britain's contribution in 1979, and the French might claim that it is much higher than pounds 500 million. A British briefing paper, in fact, puts the figure at pounds 780 million.

This confusion arises because of the different way of handling the so-called monetary compensator amounts which are subsidies paid to food exporters to compensate them for currency losses in certain markets. They can be regarded as EEC budget credits for either the exporting or the importing country.

Finally, there is doubt over whether the scheme would expire automatically at the end of 1982 or carry built-in renewal clauses.

Mrs Thatcher has insisted that a short-term solution is not acceptable to Britain and regards a six-year plan as the minimum necessary.

In return for this apparently generous concession from France, it was clear last night that Britain would be expected to withdraw its longstanding opposition to an increase in EEC farm prices this year.

Mr Walker, attending a Luxembourg meeting of EEC farm ministers running in parallel with the summit, has long insisted on a price freeze for EEC products in surplus--milk, sugar and wine--but the signs yesterday were that he would yeield in the end. France wants an average 5 per cent farm price increase this year, but a proposal from the Italian EEC presidency suggested 4.5 per cent, including 3.6 per cent increase for milk, and there was growing belief that a settlement would crystalise around these levels.

If the British Government does concede such an increase, it would add probably about one penny in the pound to food prices in Britain this year and increase the retail price index by a quarter of a per cent. It would also add some pounds 80 million to Britain's net contribution to the Common Market in 1980 and still more in subsequent years.

'Long, Hard Battle' Over Budget

LD251614 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1435 GMT 28 Apr 80

[By Steve Levinson, PA ecoromics correspondent in Luxembourg]

[Text] Mrs Thatcher this afternoon spelt out for the first time how much she expects to pay into the Common Market this year--150 million pounds. But the figure did not impress her EEC partners as the European summit in Luxembourg went into overtime in a bid to solve the budget problem.

Mrs Thatcher's remarks came when an exasperated French President Giscard d'Estaing asked her point blank: "What are you prepared to contribute to Europe?" He has already offered a deal which could limit the British payment to 500 million pounds a year for at least the next three years--a deal which Mrs Thatcher has cold-shouldered.

But her chances of cutting the 1,200 million pounds annual bill by much more seemed remote this afternoon, and officials were hinting that her new demand--which would give Britain a massive rebate of 1,000 million pounds this year--was an opening bargaining position in what looked likely to be a "a long hard battle."

Shortly after this latest manoeuvre the nine heads of government broke for a belated lunch--already three hours after the summit was due to end. It seems unlikely that any conclusion will be reached until late this evening.

Budget Reduction Offer Made

NC281636 Paris AFP in English 1631 GMT 28 Apr 80

[Text] Luxembourg, April 28 (AFP)--The European Economic Community (EEC) today agreed at its summit here to offer Britain a 750-million-pound (1,500-million-dollar) reduction in its contribution to the EEC budget. Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher was going over the proposal which would bring her country's total share of the budget to 350 million pounds (700 million dollars), a European source said.

The plan would provide for the European commission to make new proposals this year for the 1981 and 1982 budgets.

Thatcher Holdout Yields Failure

LD290928 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 0330 GMT 29 Apr 80

[By Steve Levinson and Geoffrey Meade, PA staff reporters, in Luxembourg]

[Text] Mrs Thatcher's bid to find a once-and-for-all solution to the problem of Britain's 1,200 million pounds sterling Common Market bill failed at the last gasp in Luxembourg last night.

She was offered a refund of about 800 million pounds sterling this year, but still held out for a deal which would see her through the next three years.

At the end of two days of exhausting and tense talk, the prime minister was in buoyant mood and clearly hopeful that she will get her way when Common Market leaders meet in Venice in June.

"We were not very far apart when all things are taken into account," she said at her post-summit press conference. There had been compromise on both sides, she added. "I don't despair. I never do. We have got a good deal further at Luxembourg--not far enough, but a good deal further." Failure to reach an agreement on the budget means there is no agreement on the issue of farm prices, the lamb war and fisheries. On all these, Mrs Thatcher is holding up agreement, but she denied she was operating a policy of obstruction.

Despite the tough line the prime minister obviously took throughout the two-day summit, she seemed at the end to be in a relatively conciliatory mood. She made it clear she would not threaten to hold back Britain's VAT payments to the EEC in protest. "The withholding of the VAT I would only consider as a last resort and we are not at a last resort yet," she said.

Mrs Thatcher warned that agreement on issues like farm prices was unlikely until the budget dilemma was solved. "We won't make much progress on agricultural issues until the budget is settled," she declared.

At the end, Mrs Thatcher appeared to be less than 100 million pounds sterling away from agreement. She accepted the principle of a German plan which would have frozen Britain's level of payments to only 325 million pounds sterling this year--a saving of about 800 million pounds sterling. But she was not prepared to concede that, in 1981, the 325 million pounds sterling ceiling should rise by a proportion of the general increase in the entire EEC budget costs. She wanted Britain to continue paying the 1980 maximum for several years.

Earlier Mrs Thatcher rejected a French proposal which would have pegged Britain's payment to about 500 million pounds sterling for at least the next three years. She explained: "We all compromised. My partners moved and offered more both on amount and duration.

"Duration was particularly important, and I did not want a very temporary settlement. The up-shot was that, when the amount was almost satisfactory, the duration was only a year or so out, and, when the duration was about five years, the amount was wholly unsatisfactory."

More than just cash was at stake, however, Even if the budget figures had been agreed, Britain was isolated on other matters. Mrs Thatcher said: "Even if we had got settlement on the budget, we would have been in considerable difficulty on some of the other proposals put before us."

Britain was the only country not to agree a 5 percent average increase in EEC farm prices this year, which farm ministers meeting alongside the Community heads of state had been battling for.

"The whole agricultural council would have agreed increases in the proportion of the budget which went on agriculture--just at the time when we are trying to move in another direction," Mrs Thatcher said.

But, if Mrs Thatcher was cool about the outcome, French President Giscard d'Estaing and West German Chancellor Helmut Schmidt were furious about the way their proposals were dismissed. They indicated they would not be willing to include the British budget problem on the agenda for the next EEC summit in Venice. But Mrs Thatcher pointed out that this decision was a matter for the Italian presidency of the Council of Ministers to decide. President Giscard was even quoted after the summit as saying: "I won't allow such a contemptible spectacle in Venice." European Commission President Mr Jenkins summed up the meeting as "the most tantalisingly disappointing European council I have ever known--tantalisingly disappointing because we came nearer to agreement than I had hitherto perhaps believed possible. But we just failed to grasp it."

Sanctions Decision Reaffirmed

NC282318 Paris AFP in English 2315 GMT 28 Apr 80

[Text] Luxembourg, April 28 (AFP)--The following statement was issued at the close of the Common Market summit meeting here tonight:

"The heads of state and government and the foreign ministers expressed grave concern at the trend of recent events, especially in Afghanistan, Iran and the Middle East. They considered that events now more than ever require of the member states of the European Community that they show cohesion.

"The European council noted with deep concern that Soviet military forces have not been withdrawn from Afghanistan despite the condemnation of the international community expressed by the General Assembly of the United Nations and despite the repeated calls of Nine and of the Islamic Conference and the ASEAN countries.

"The European council reaffirmed the view of the Nine that a solution in accordance with the resolution of the United Nations General Assembly could be found in an arrangement which allowed Afghanistan to remain outside competition among the powers and to return to its traditional position as a neutral and non-aligned state".

"The Nine are ready to support, in concert with friendly and Allied countries, any initiative designed to promote such a solution, emphasising that their own proposal is neither rigid nor exclusive.

"In this connection, they believe that the Islamic and non-aligned countries have a particularly significant role to play.

"Since the occupation of the U.S. Embassy in Tehran and the seizure of its staff as hostages, the Nine have repeatedly condemned this inadmissible violation of international law. They reaffirm their solidarity with the government and people of the United States in their present time of trial. They consider that the situation created by this violation opens the door to developments fraught with serious consequences. A return to a state of legality is the only way to ensure peace and security.

"The European council reaffirms the decisions taken by the foreign ministers of the Nine on 22 April in Luxembourg."

"The Nine declare their full support for the steps which the secretary-general of the United Nations intends to take to secure the release of the hostages. The Nine reiterated their belief that only a comprehensive, just and lasting settlement can bring true peace to the Middle East.

"The European council denounces the acts of violence committed in southern Lebanon against members if UNIFIL.

"At this time of crisis in world affairs the European council believes that it is vital that international procedures for the management of crisis and the easing of tensions be used to the [word indistinct] and that the UN Charter and international law be fully upheld."

PRESS, KREISKY CRITICIZE U.S. RESCUE ATTEMPT

AU281702 [Editorial Report] Extensive comment in the Vienna press of 26-28 April 1980 frequently reflects frustration and dismay at the failure of the U.S. attempt to rescue the hostages held at the U.S. Embassy in Tehran. There is a great deal of criticism of President Carter, as well as of his timing of the rescue mission and of what is widely regarded as the inefficiency of its implementation. Numerous papers also express misgivings as to the political and military consequences that might follow from the U.S. failure. Attacks on President Carter range from DIE PRESSE's "we regard the peanut farmer as the worst President since the end of the World War II, or possibly of this century" and KURIER's "highest paid apprentice in the world" to KRONEN-ZEITUNG's calling him "Calamity Jimmy." The abortive operation is frequently depicted as a "fiasco," including by WIENER ZEITUNG, which says that "nothing worse could have happened to the world" at this time. There are numerous references to negative consequences, such as the West European allies' loss of confidence in Carter's policy, loss of prestige in the Third World, loss of the "Afghanistan trump card," "delivering the final blow to moderate Iranian politicians," and encouraging the USSR to take bigger risks, by displaying military weakness.

Despite their criticism of President Carter and his ill-timed futile rescue attempt, two papers--DIE PRESSE and KURIER--remind their readers of what the Americans did for Austria after 1945. KURIER asks "where would we be without the Americans?" and DIE PRESSE says "it must not be forgotten that we are linked by historical friendship with the United States and that a U.S. defeat [illegible] a misfortune for us all." KURIER concludes from the latest U.S. failure that the superpower America may have become sloppy but, recalling the tremendous U.S. effort that took Americans to the moon, the paper says that America can accomplish miracles if it is challenged. It adds that now would be the time for another miracle.

ARBEITER-ZEITUNG on 28 April reports a Chancellor Kreisky statement at a Vienna rally on 26 April "that he did not want to join in the numerous attacks on Carter but that he did not think much of muscle-flexing." According to the paper, Kreisky condemned the taking of the hostages as a crime that violated international law, but said that he had regarded any rescue attempt as "hardly feasible" in view of the huge distances involved and the existing situation. Moreover, he said, there is a conflict going on in Iran between the men who came to power through elections and other groups, especially the group around Khomeyni, and one should not interfere with such a controversy as long as there is a chance that it might produce some positive results. Kreisky added that one lesson to be derived from the "failure in the Iranian desert" should be for responsible politicians of the East and West to reassess the confidence they seem to be placing in their military leaders.

KREISKY, HUNGARY'S LAZAR HOLD TALKS ON TRADE, INTERNATIONAL ISSUES

AU281020 Vienna Domestic Service in German 0520 GMT 28 Apr 80

[Robert Heger report on 26-27 April talks at Drassburg Castle in Burgenland between Chancellor Bruno Kreisky and Hungarian Premier Gyorgy Lazar--with recorded excerpts from statements by Lazar and Kreisky after the end of the talks on 27 April 1980, Lazar beginning in Hungarian fading into German translation]

[Excerpts] Two main topics were discussed in the rounds of talks lasting several hours near the Austrian-Hungarian border: first, the international political situation and the possibilities of promoting the policy of detente--which were discussed by the government chiefs in a strictly private talk--and, second, bilateral economic questions, which were discussed with the participation of Trade Minister Staribacher and State Secretary Nussbaumer on the Austrian side and Foreign Trade Minister Veress and Deputy Minister of Metallurgy and Machine Industry Kozma on the Hungarian side.

Council of Ministers Chairman Lazar said about the results [begin Lazar recording] Let me tell you very briefly that the result of our talks--as always in the past--has been very topical, very fruitful and very useful. We have certainly achieved results, but we are not going to content ourselves with them and we will jointly look for possibilities--that, too, is a result--to make our cooperation still more varied and still more successful. In our opinion, such possibilities do exist. [end recording]

Chancellor Kreisky mentioned specifically Austria's interest in the planned Czechoslovak-Hungarian Danube power plant, the intensified cooperation with Hungary in third markets, the expansion of bilateral trade and, primarily, the 600 megawatt thermal power plant project in southern Burgenland. This power plant is to utilize the brown coal deposits in the Torony region and is to be built at a cost of 7.5 billion schillings either near Rechnitz or near Oberbildein at the south Burgenland-west Hungarian border. The actual cost will depend on the prescribed measures to prevent air pollution and on the price the Hungarians will charge for their brown coal, which has a heating value of 1,800 calories. Chancellor Kreisky commented: [begin Kreisky recording] We did not, of course, discuss questions of price, coal prices--that is something we have to leave to the experts. [end recording]

The thermal power plant could be completed by 1987. After agreement has been reached in principle, negotiations on the details will be held. Further topics covered at Drassburg: Austrian firms are to get still more orders for large hotel construction projects in Budapest--two such hotels are currently under construction. Moreover, border crossing proceedings are to be simplified by the Hungarian side.

Chancellor Kreisky, after the conclusion of the talks said: [begin Kreisky recording] And, summing up, I would like to say that despite the difference of the political systems in Hungary and in Austria there is no getting away from the fact that we are neighbors who are somehow linked by historical bonds of a past whose effects extend into the present. And thus we both believe that it is our duty to demonstrate, by the example of our cooperation, how two peoples in Central Europe, each committed to a different system, can nevertheless develop good-neighborly relations and good cooperation--in other words, that which is called coexistence. [end recording]

Further rounds of Hungarian-Austrian talks at various levels were agreed on.

Kreisky Comment

AU281022 Vienna DIE PRESSE in German 28 Apr 80 p 2

[Special DIE PRESSE report]

[Excerpts] Eisenstadt (L.M.)--In a talk with DIE PRESSE on Sunday [27 April] Chancellor Kreisky showed himself highly satisfied with the talks he had with Hungarian Council of Ministers Chairman Lazar over the weekend at Drassburg, Burgenland. As Kreisky stressed, the relations between the two neighbor countries with different social systems in Central Europe are "optimal" and free of any--even humanitarian--problems.

The Hungarian wish for tariff reductions will be met by tariff concessions, Kreisky said, adding that the Hungarian side has declared its readiness to further expand the border crossing points. In this context Kreisky pointed out that since the abolition of visas the number of Austrian tourists visiting Hungary has doubled, and that Austria is interested in shortening the waiting periods at the border.

In discussing topical political problems the two government chiefs were in agreement as far as the continuation of the policy of detente and the normalization of the international situation are concerned. Kreisky accepted Lazar's invitation to pay an official visit to Hungary within the next 12 months. As Trade Minister Staribacher declared after the talks, the technical details of the coal power plant in southern Burgenland have already been agreed on.

AFRICAN NATIONAL CONGRESS WANTS OFFICE IN VIENNA

AU281145 Vienna DIE PRESSE in German 28 Apr 80 p 2

[Special DIE PRESSE report: "After PLO, Black South Africans Want Office in Vienna"]

[Summary] Vienna (A.U.)--Only a few weeks after Austria's recognition of the PLO another liberation organization has approached Vienna: The African National Congress (ANC) wants to set up an office in the Austrian capital.

"Last week a 2-member ANC delegation headed by Thomas Nkobi, one of the three most prominent representatives of the liberation movement, visited in Vienna with several political figures as well as the Foreign Ministry, where they met with a 'very positive' reaction. Ambassador Fischer, who had been delegated by Foreign Minister Pahr for this talk, confirmed that he did not say 'no.' 'If they want to set up an office, why not?' it is stated at the Foreign Ministry. What is under discussion, however, is obviously merely an office without diplomatic status that is to serve for information purposes only." However, the ANC representatives want Austria to finance this office, and to this end will submit a formal request for Austrian aid.

"As to the situation in South Africa, the ANC representatives declared that they would participate in the national conference suggested by Pretoria provided that the black leaders who are currently detained on Robben Island could participate in it. For the time being, however, the ANC--encouraged by the developments in Zimbabwe--will step up the armed struggle, they said, adding that the liberation movement does not want any bases in Zimbabwe, but will set up such bases in South Africa itself.

COAL, PUBLISHING FIRMS REPORTED TO BE KPOE FRONTS

AU271400 [Editorial Report] Vienna DIE PRESSE in German on 25 April on page 13 carries a 500-word feature report by Alexander Fieber entitled: "Coal for the Austrian Communist Party [KPOe]: Muhri and Comrades Display Commercial Ambitions Again". The feature discusses a current civil law suit filed by the KPOe against a former KPOe member, Martin Maimann, over the property rights of the "Turmoel" Company, reportedly worth 50 million schillings. The paper notes that the KPOe--after the conclusion of the State Treaty--set up a "Communist economic empire" in the coal and oil import sector, with trusted party members as figureheads. Although party Chairman Franz Muhri emphatically denies this, it is believed that these companies have financially supported the KPOe.

The paper mentions the following firms that were or still are involved with the KPOe: Interhag (coal), Pol-Karbon (51-percent Polish-owned coal import firm), Kommerzkontakt (until 4 years ago headed by Jeno Desser, head of the KPOe Central Committee economic department), and the Globus Publishing House. According to the paper, Globus is today the most important company of the KPOe group of commercial enterprises. By printing propaganda material for all East bloc countries it helps finance the KPOe and its party organ VOLKSSTIMME. According to DIE PRESSE, there are several other "camouflaged firms" as well as "Austrian" enterprises controlled by managers and capital from communist countries, such as the "Garant Insurance Company, where the Russians Chernychev and Yakhchenko are on the executive board."

["J.V.S." report: 'Informateur' Claes Gambles on Finding an Apparently Impossible Tripartite Coalition by 15 May"]

[Text] Reporting on Monday night on his "informateur" [fact-finding] mission entrusted to him by the king on Saturday, Mr Willy Claes, deputy prime minister and minister of economic affairs in the outgoing government, disclosed two governing ideas.

On the one hand, it appears that in political circles a majority is taking shape in favor of a tripartite government in which Christian, socialist and liberal groups would participate.

And, on the other hand, Mr Claes believes that in view of the summer habits of Belgian citizens it is clear that a solution must be found by 15 May. In fact, if it were to appear that no government formula could be found, it would be necessary to resort to elections. Quite obviously, however, it is hardly likely that elections could be held in July.

But, despite the difficulties which are piling up in front of him, during his press conference Mr Willy Claes insisted on the threefold need to resolve the political crisis rapidly, form a government capable of dealing with the economic and social crisis, and achieve a sufficient majority to carry out state reform.

According to Mr Claes, if the three conditions which he is trying to fulfill are not achieved, elections will be unavoidable. And he believes that it is far from certain that the situation would be clarified as a result of new parliamentary elections.

The "informateur" takes the view that any newly-elected chambers will obviously have to become constituent assemblies. In any case, the deputy prime minister believes that he will need to make another report. Mr Claes seems to favor a tripartite national union coalition even though he has doubts about the possibility of making the Christians, socialists and liberals agree to a comprehensive government action program.

Mr Claes has approached French-speaking parties, insisting on the need to tackle the state's financial difficulties. He has warned the Flemish parties that no political party in the country's southern region is prepared to exercise power unless it receives serious guarantees with respect to regionalization.

The "informateur" admitted that it is difficult to simultaneously ask the liberals to accept the "program law" in its present form, ask the socialists and Christians to modify this "program law," and persuade both Flemish-speaking and French-speaking parties to agree to a compromise on institutional matters.

Be that as it may, Mr Claes explained that no time limits had been set for his mission as "informateur" but that he intended to reach conclusions as soon as possible. "I feel relatively optimistic, insofar as I hope to be able to provide the 'formateur' [premier-designate] of any future government with a maximum of tangible elements. However, I do not rule out at all the possibility of failure," he stated.

Obviously, Willy Claes, who is inclined to pessimism by nature, still believes that his mission can succeed. His statements show that time could be on his side. However, little time has been allowed him since the political and parliamentary world will have to be given definite information about its future by mid-May.

Party Negotiations Begin

LD250817 Brussels LE SOIR in French 23 Apr 80 p 2

["J.V.S." report: "Thirteen Distinguished Men in Search of an Unprecedented Formula: the 'Six-Party Coalition'"]

[Excerpts] Monday in politics effectively marked the transition between a particularly full weekend and the real launch--planned for this Tuesday--of the negotiations between Christians, socialists and liberals with a view to forming the new government. The opening shot of these negotiations occurred at 1030 on Monday morning at a private hotel on the Rue Lambermont, but the protagonists are still at the observation stage. "Formateur" [premier-designate] Wilfried Martens began by summarizing the country's economic, social and financial situation and by outlining a five-chapter government program which includes the definitive state reform.

In keeping with the outline put forward by Mr Willy Claes at the end of his fact-finding mission, the country's three great political families will give equal priority to the community and socioeconomic files. On Monday priority went to the latter. On Tuesday the former will be tackled first.

The "formateur" confirmed that he believed that he would be able to decide, by Thursday or Friday, whether continued negotiations were likely to result in an agreement on a six-party government. This amounts to calling Monday's conversations strictly exploratory.

When he met the press in early evening, Mr Martens quite naturally believed that it was too early to determine his chances of success. By Tuesday evening, however, he hopes to possess sufficiently complete elements with which to put forward precise proposals for the definitive state reform. He feels that seven points must be tackled and resolved first: councils, executives, power, financial resources, the settling of disputes, Brussels and the German-speaking community.

"Any reform," Mr Martens explained, "must result in major transfers of power and resources and a coherent division of these powers and resources between the national state and the new political entities, given that the central government must keep its powers which may not be challenged."

Meanwhile, we know that Mr Willy Claes has stated that, in all probability, worthwhile solutions to the definitive state reform would be scarcely different from the plans worked out at Egmont Palace and Stuyvenberg Castle. Asked to comment on this assertion, Mr Martens avoided doing so by an elegant pirouette: "I prefer to make no reference to the past, and my introductory outline should permit a discussion freed from the burden of past events."

Let us note, finally, that Mr Martens explained that each of the six parties present at the negotiating table gave its own answer to the questions asked, but that some of these answers coincided.

GENSCHER STATEMENT PAYS TRIBUTE TO CYRUS VANCE

LD281737 Hamburg DPA in German 1656 GMT 28 Apr 80

[Text] Bonn--Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher said in a statement to appear in Tuesday's edition of BILD-ZEITUNG that a good friend is leaving the command bridge. "We Europeans all have cause to be grateful to him for his work, the Western alliance and the close U.S.-European friendship." In a telegram to Vance today, Genschen wrote that he is deeply affected by his decision to resign. The telegram, published in Bonn, went on to say that Genscher gratefully recalls the 3 years and more of close and friendly cooperation which was characterized by a wide measure of agreement on issues, trust and personal affection. Vance has done great service for close German-U.S. cooperation.

PRESS VIEWS VANCE RESIGNATION AS WEAKNESS IN ADMINISTRATION

Cause for More U.S. 'Insecurity'

DW290749 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE in German 29 Apr 80 p 1

[Article signed G-N: "An Old Conflict"]

[Text] The conflict in the U.S. Government was built in from the very beginning. The President likes controversial discussions on foreign policy: This is how Zbigniew Brzezinski described it once to a White House visitor. He wants to hear all points of view prior to making a decision. Secretary of State Vance withstood these disputes patiently--with a loyalty that could not be surpassed--discreetly, reliably, and loyal to the limits of self-sacrifice, exhibited recently with regard to America's role in the UN on the Israeli settlement policy.

On the first pages of Kissinger's memoirs we find this conflict being described: Nixon wanted to have just a negotiator in the State Department. The President wanted to reserve the direction of foreign policy to himself and his security adviser. That dominated the Rogers-Kissinger dualism. Kennedy had acted exactly the same way with McGeorge Bundy vis-a-vis Secretary of State Rusk. The difference was, however, that those presidents had brought along basic understanding of foreign policy which Carter does not have. He listens once to Brzezinski, once to Vance and then again to Andrew Young. The difference involves aims and methods of foreign policy. Vance did not give strong impulses to U.S. foreign policy nor a certain direction. His contribution consisted of carefulness, fruits of diplomatic negotiations in the sense of a settlement out of court. His insistence gave American foreign policy continuity--continuity and experience the President could not contribute. Vance's resignation increases the costs of the unsuccessful commando mission for the liberation of the American Embassy members in Tehran which was decided on against his advice.

In the middle of the election campaign the resignation of the secretary of state will probably be considered less as the end of foreign policy dualism in the government and thus as an alleviation, but much rather as the falling apart of the administration. That will inflict new damage on the very much battered Carter. Insecurity will probably continue to grow in Washington. The European governments ought to feel involved and ask themselves whether their lack of good will and alliance spirit in past months is part of the guilt for the loss of American "fortune."

DIE WELT Assessment

DW290750 Bonn DIE WELT in German 29 Apr 80 p 6

[Kie., commentary: "One of the Pilots"]

[Text] Jimmy Carter has not just lost his daring venture for the rescue of the hostages; he has also lost his secretary of state over it. There is at least one reason why Carter should not take this quite lightly.

To Vance, his opposition to the commando operation in Iran was the last impetus for quitting a job which was constantly becoming more frustrating. It is the causes of this frustration which Jimmy Carter should diligently study. They are not at all attributable to the off-described antagonism between personalities: Brzezinski on the one hand, Vance on the other. They are solely attributable to the fact that the President did not indicate clearly enough his preferences between the often contrary advice he received from his two top foreign policy advisers.

Nixon had a different style indeed. He did not allow any conflict to arise between Secretary of State Rogers and his newly appointed security adviser Henry Kissinger: He did not even listen to the secretary of state. This guaranteed uniformity of line, but already at that time it undermined the prestige of the State Department.

Was Secretary of State Vance the right man in the right place? There are doubts. On a worldwide scale, in the face of growing Soviet military might, claims are being made about the U.S. protective-power mission which Vance approached without any particular concept, with a basically pacifist attitude developed during the Vietnam years. This attitude also influenced the President himself for quite some time although, at the same time, he availed himself of a security adviser who was seeking answers to a rougher reality--clairvoyantly but with little diplomatic dexterity. Thus, two foreign policies evolved to the confusion of friend and foe alike.

Perhaps the voluntary exit by Cyrus Vance will bring calm to the whole chaos. But only perhaps. Jimmy Carter is in the center of heavy storms. After the mishap in Iran, now desertion in his own camp. For the time being this does not look like a relaxation of the situation, nor does it strengthen the [administration's] authority for the time being.

POLITICAL FIGURES STATE VIEWS ON ABORTED IRAN ACTION

DW281130 Munich SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG in German 28 Apr 80 p 2

[Report on remarks by leading FRG political figures in reaction to the U.S. commando mission in Iran]

[Text] Bonn--After the failure of the commando mission for the liberation of the hostages in Tehran, Chancellor Helmut Schmidt sent a cable to President Carter in which he expressed his sympathy. It reads as follows:

"Esteemed Mr President,

"Dear Jimmy,

"I would like to assure you of my sympathy in this difficult hour. The news that the illegal taking of hostages has cost eight human lives fills me with consternation and sadness. Our sympathy goes to their families.

"Anyone who has ever shared in the responsibility for the lives of hostages can appreciate your feelings in this difficult hour. You may rest assured that the Federal Government is determined to continue endeavoring for a solution of the hostage issue at the side of the United States.

"Helmut Schmidt".

Leading politicians of the social-liberal coalition and the opposition were agreed in stressing the need for the Federal Republic's solidarity with the United States in view of international tensions. But while SPD Chairman Willy Brandt simultaneously stressed that the Germans must look after their own interests "just like others are doing, too," the head of the CSU land group in the Bundestag and deputy chairman of his party, Friedrich Zimmermann, once again made it plain that unrestricted support for Washington is necessary. The FDP chairman, Federal Foreign Minister Genscher, said that in view of the experience with the "horror of war," German policy always and primarily must be a policy of safeguarding peace.

Speaking at the so-called "minor party congress" of the SPD, Brandt emphasized that the Western alliance in which the Federal Republic is rooted "firmly and in partnership," remains "vitally important" for the Federal Government and for Europe. The profound concern about the continued arms race and the threat to peace is a challenge for untiring, responsible initiatives. The pursuit of German, European and generally Western interests must be joined together "properly and in trustful coordination," Brandt told the party council, the party executive board and the control commission of the SPD. In an interview granted to the SPD paper ZEITUNG AM SONNTAG, he indicated his objections to a boycott policy. "The idea that a world power can be punished is not very close to reality," he said. At the same time, Brandt criticized as inadequate the current efforts of the great powers toward settling the crises.

In Munich, the FDP chairman, Federal Foreign Minister Genscher, called on all states of the world including the Soviet Union and the responsible people in Tehran to embark now with determination on the road toward the peaceful solution of the hostage drama aspired to by Carter. The readiness of UN Secretary General Waldheim to mediate once again deserves the support of all sides. Carter's statement that the action in Iran solely served the objective of liberating the hostages and that it was not directed against the Iranian people or against the Islamic Republic of Iran should be taken seriously. In the United States as well as on the international level a discussion will emerge on whether the action was correct and expedient. "Anyone remaining silent about the taking of hostages in Tehran, anyone occupying a small country like Afghanistan with their troops, should not set themselves up now as arbiter in the world," Genscher said. As for "singular voices" which speak of possibly using German soldiers on the Persian Gulf as well, Genscher stated that "our need for missions by German soldiers outside the country has been satisfied once and for all."

Federal Economics Minister Lambsdorff, speaking at the party convention of the Liberals in Rhineland-Palatinate, stressed that the conformity of interests between Europe and the United States must now also find expression "in common action." The "virtues" that are in demand now are "balance and patient pursuit of all political opportunities for safeguarding peace." It is necessary to remember at the same time, however, "who ultimately guarantees life and prosperity and political freedom for Western Europe."

CDU Deputy Chairman Alfred Dregger demanded immediate consultations between the European NATO countries and the United States. Speaking at the Hesse Land CDU Congress, he stressed that a coordinated course of action alone can guarantee an effective strategy for safeguarding peace. [paragraph continues]

In the Mainz ALLGEMEINE ZEITUNG, Dregger at the same time raised conditions for a meeting between Chancellor Schmidt and Soviet chief of state and party Brezhnev. In the same paper the opposition's disarmament expert, Alois Mertes, voiced the anxiety that Schmidt would be going to Moscow emptyhanded and would return with hands tied.

The head of the CSU land group, Zimmermann, at a land conference of the Junge union organization in Munich issued an appeal to continuously demand the withdrawal of Soviet troops from Afghanistan. The Soviet Union just wants to make the West grow accustomed to its political, military and territorial successes. This is Soviet "conference diplomacy," Zimmermann noted, advocating the view that what Moscow understands by detente policy is "maintenance of the status quo and diverting attention from its aggressive and expansionist policy." Zimmermann also advocated an increase in the Federal Republic's arms expenditures.

CSU Secretary General Stoiber said that the Europeans must be prepared to support the decisions of President Carter more quickly and refrain from "verbosely talking them to death." Stoiber cricicized the fact that "the decisions of the Americans are constantly criticized, but nobody knows what to do." CDU Treasurer Walther Leisler Kiep called for patient negotiations and for the preservation of the balance of strength. According to Kiep, detente policy is "not something devised to ease the rigor of the foreign policy march; it is top performance sports." The military deterrence risk must be restored again through German and European efforts.

In the opinion of Defense Minister Apel, the mechanisms of crisis management developed in the past decade are not working "as desirable." As a result, an essential element of politics--predictability--has suffered, Apel declared in the journal DER SPIEGEL. Increasing tension between the two world powers also entails the danger of diminishing leeway action for the medium-size powers. The minister called on the Soviet Union to open negotiations on the proposal by Chancellor Schmidt not to install any new medium-range missiles for the time being.

The defense expert of the CDU/CSU, Manfred Woerner, voiced understanding for Carter's decision. For months the Americans have showed patience and demonstrated more indulgence than they really could have been expected to have shown, Woerner said. Woerner termed understandable Carter's decision not to inform the Allies about the mission beforehand. After all, Carter had seen for himself how reluctant the Europeans had been to participate even in the sanctions against Iran.

FDP Deputy Juergen Moellemann demanded a considerable intensification of the common efforts by the West toward working for the release of the hostages. Speaking at a meeting in Ibbenbueren he accused the Soviet Union of "playing a false game" in the Iran conflict. Anyone who wages war for months in a defenseless country is probably the least competent of condemning an attempt to liberate the hostages.

Wolf Graf von Baudissin, director of the Institute for Peace Research and Security Policy at Hamburg University, believes that, following the abortive attempt to liberate the hostages, it will be much more difficult for the Soviet Union to look on idly in the event of another military action by the United States. What now matters is to raise the conflict-triggering level which often is very low, Graf von Baudissin said in Wiesbaden.

During a demonstration of about 400 people in Hamburg on Saturday against U.S. action in Iran, a molotov cocktail was hurled at the office of a U.S. airline company, Pan Am. Police said that a window was smashed and a small fire started.

KOHL WARNS AGAINST CRITICIZING U.S. POLICY

LD281524 Hanburg DPA in German 1439 GMT 28 Apr 80 LD

[Text] Bonn--CDU Chairman Helmut Kohl has warned against criticizing American policy following the failed attempt to rescue the U.S. hostages in Tehran. He told the CDU National Executive in Bonn today that the United States of America and the American President were in particular need in the present difficult situation of their friends' and allies' solidarity. In the past few decades Europeans have taken U.S. solidarity and its security guarantees for granted. "The American people can lay claim to our support as a matter of course." Kohl stated that anti-American criticism could give rise to dangerous irritation.

PRESS COMMENTATORS ASSESS CONSEQUENCES OF U.S. RESCUE ATTEMPT

Allies in 'Very Difficult' Position

DW281422 Duesseldorf HANDELSBLATT in German 28 Apr 80 p 2

[Klaus C. Engeles commentary: "Friends in Need"]

[Text] After the failure of the military expedition to free the American hostages in Tehran by force, the question remains of whether the responsible people in Washington will take more far-reaching military actions after the failure of the "humanitarian mission"--such as mining Iranian ports or blockading them.

It was Washington's statement that "no firm schedule exists for military action" which made it easier for the European Community foreign ministers to commit themselves in Luxembourg to a two-stage plan of economic sanctions against Iran as of 17 May. Some Western alliance partners now call into question the implementation of the agreed sanctions, despite all official statements expressing understanding. The fact has not been missed that President Carter as well as his secretary of defense have confirmed again lately that "all options" as before are being kept open. Once the hostages have been moved from the Tehran embassy complex to several secret places it is obvious that a second direct liberation attempt by American special units can no longer take place.

As regards the other military options, the American Pentagon chief also mentioned the risks of escalation." "The disruption of trade through military action," said Brown to the press, "will be considered. Such steps lead to complications. The conflict will be internationalized and extended with consequences that are not necessarily desirable. The crisis has increased tension in an unstable region of vital importance to us." Washington observers believe that behind this hint is the growing insight that a blockade of Iranian ports could very easily lead to a direct confrontation with the Soviet Union in a region where the U.S. units are not the strongest. With the argument that the unsuccessful liberation mission was a humanitarian mission and not a military action, the Carter administration wants to protect itself vis-a-vis the Alliance partners--who were promised that no military action would be undertaken until the Iranian situation had been examined in mid-May--as well as vis-a-vis Congress, whose prominent representatives charge the President with having violated the War Powers Act.

The U.S. Government, which for months has been pursuing its Iranian strategy on two tracks by secretly planning military action, must now reorient itself under complicated conditions. More involvement by the Alliance partners with regard to pressure on Iran is being considered an an important way out of the dilemma. [paragraph continues]

Deputy Secretary of State Warren M. Christopher launched a new American consultation campaign last Friday before ambassadors of NATO partners as well as Japan, Australia, New Zealand and Spain with the intention of quieting down confusion and irritation in the Alliance in connection with the disputed surprise military action. Certainly the Allies must demand from the United States far-reaching, timely consultations following the recent experience. The core problem of whether more Western solidarity with regard to political and trade sanctions wouldn't drive the Iranians even more into the arms of the Soviets has now come to the fore. Washington has made it very difficult for its allies.

Carter Motives Viewed

[Robert Held editorial: "Not Just a Failure"]

[Text] The Washington POST stated this weekend that the President is determined, although not successful. The Europeans have discovered this also, but with the feeling of people who have just been driven blindfolded through an enormous pothole and who cannot quite imagine how things would have gone on if the driver had not stepped on the brakes.

But we will see somewhat more clearly once the dust has settled. The commando mission may have failed in such a way that a repeat has become impossible, but the United States has demonstrated that not every action is being talked to pieces over there, discussed in public prematurely or torpedoed by Congress. The War Powers Act of 1973 still seems to leave sufficient leeway for the President to engage in a surprise action in theinterest of the nation. Senators and the Allies have been given an opportunity to realize that, sometimes, priority must be given to keeping a thing secret. The federal chancellor's skepticism was reduced to the remark that, naturally, much luck is necessary to carry out such a mission.

Carter was determined but not successful. The Americans say with shame that they have failed in , of all places, a field where they otherwise move around with so much self-assuredness: technical mastery. The planners thought that two helicopters more than necessary would produce the reserve required for the operation. America, known to the Europeans by its "enormous means" ["klotzen"] in military operations, dispatched one helicopter too few. When three helicopters broke down, the world power was caught out of breath in the middle of this great historic act.

With this case of "too little, too late" the Americans are not well off in the region of the "Carter doctrine," particularly since they are operating in an area where Soviet airlifts of 10,000 soldiers have been implemented. And yet the enterprise obviously had a baffling and impressive effect: Iranian reaction--domestic as well as with regard to foreign policy--is rather moderate despite all the jubilation. At home, however, 70 percent of the Americans have agreed with the President on such bravery--also for the future.

But that is not particularly comforting for the Europeans. Carter acted in a circumspect way, using the help of Egypt instead of the Israeli offer. Nothing is to be feared more than some pan-Islamic solidarity where monarchists and Marxists would rally around the ayatollah to have a showdown with America, Europe and Israel. That danger has not yet been eliminated. Nobody is certain that the two crises--Iran and Afghanistan--will remain separated. The moment they merge the Soviet Union will have won the game.

With regard to this point, the Europeans would like to know more about Carter's motives. Did he act like a soldier who "implements" something because of pressure by the nation, something he considers not implementable, in order to prove through failure that he is right, right with regard to those who charge him with doing nothing and those, such as the dependents of the hostages, who cry out "for God's sake do not introduce any violence"? He pulled himself out of this dilemma a bit despite the failure or maybe just because of it. He is receiving a basic democratic legitimation over the heads of the critical apparatus in Washington which must also be considered in the calculations of lamenting parliamentarians. His courage to take action has been approved by the populace. The anonymous masses are stronger than all who want to find fault with Carter through rational criticism. A trace of absolutism with regard to the presidency can be felt again, with support for it as through a plebiscite. This is something thought to have been eliminated along with Nixon.

The enlightenment about the decision-making process that led to the mission in Iran seems to disclose a Carter who is, after all, somewhat less of a hesitating preacher of repentance and somewhat more of a former professional officer. His appearance following the catastrophe showed absolute composure. Carter obviously made the final decision against the revised advice of his loyal secretary of defense, not to mention Congress which was left out in the cold. Without batting an eye he made a confession of his lonely responsibility, thus stressing the existential part of his decision. In doing this the President pulled the stops which were supposed to cause sympathetic echoes in the country of heroic legends.

The Europeans did not take the occasion to stab him in the back. The idea was much rather awakened again that a case of terrorism on a larger scale is involved: terrorism through taking of hostages aimed at degrading and destroying the dignity of the hostages and of the one being blackmailed. The outlines of a person deteriorate as well as the authority of a state and the determination of society: One thinks of Schleyer, of Moro. Now even a world power is experiencing this devilish mechanism without the entire civilized world helping it in a real or efficient way. One could feel this moment of reflection in the response of the Federal Republic.

U.S. Prestige At Stake

DW261243 Munich SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG in German 26/27 Apr 80 p 4

[Klaus Arnsperger article: "After Each Strike Offer the Other Cheek?"]

[Text] Not only President Carter but the citizens of the United States will forever remember 25 April as black Friday. Almost 6 months of hopes which have been frustrated again and again now have culminated in an abortive use of extreme means for liberating the 53 hostages in Tehran--a military coup de main that the President, according to his repeated assurances, intended to carry out only if all other measures were exhausted. Certainly the United States still has other military means of pressure available: a blockade of the Persian Gulf by its naval forces or the mining of Iranian ports. But, although the failure of the first military action was primarily the result of the technical failure of one of the aircraft used in the enterprise, it has now created a fundamentally new situation: The United States has crossed the threshold of the use of military force and already the first step in this dangerous terrain has ended with failure.

President Carter, and with him 220 million Americans, now stand with their backs to the wall. The first consequence of the abortive liberation maneuver will probably be that from now on all efforts at liberating the hostages with diplomatic means and economic sanctions will have to be paid for with even more patience and additional concessions. [paragraph continues]

The rulers in Tehran will immediately interpret the American debacle in the desert as a good omen for them. Their unyieldingness will increase and will add to the danger of panicky action, which is possible in the White House at any time. This present state of affairs constitutes what is presumed to be the largest risk.

But public pressure on Carter will very likely increase. The President might be tempted, without showing any further regard for the interests of his allies, to risk the gamble to restore the credibility of American strength by taking even stronger military action. A large majority of the U.S. public will not forgive him the abortive venture for the mere reason that those critics who have for years deplored the allegedly progressive decay of U.S. combat readiness will now undoubtedly be encouraged.

The initial reactions of the man in the street, which Friday morning manifested themselves in numerous phone calls to radio and television stations, were typical in this respect: True, there were some partly tearful voices who defended Carter's decision to act but, surprisingly, many women and men considered the failure of the venture as a new shame and humiliation of the United States before the eyes of the world. American self-confidence, which has always taken heart from the belief that the United States in effect could achieve anything if only it was done with the necessary technical means, has again been dealt a painful blow. The point now is how long the Americans as a nation will be prepared to continue to support a President who seems to expect them to offer the other cheek after each strike of fate.

The fact that Carter, contrary to the announcements made by his spokesmen that he was going to wait and see for another few weeks what course developments would take, was prepared to cross the threshold of military action, shows clearly that it is now no longer the 53 Americans held prisoner in Tehran which constitutes the chief problem of the hostage crisis but the prestige of the United States as a world power, as the only convincing counterweight to the Soviet Union. Previously, Carter always rejected the use of military force for liberating the hostages, arguing that it was too risky. Because of the local conditions in the Iranian capital, any coup de main was bound to most seriously endanger the lives of the prisoners.

In Carter's television statement on Friday it sounded differently: The chances for success of the rescue action had been excellent. But the local circumstances have not changed since 4 November 1979. Coups de main like the one the Israelis carried out successfully at Entebbe, the Germans in Mogadishu and the French in Kolwezi seemed to the U.S. strategists to be hopeless from the start because the hostages are held prisoner in the center of a huge city and in the interior of a country to boot which is equipped with modern control [as published] devices. The way the U.S. enterprise in the desert now seems to have failed through technical circumstances proves post facto how correct the original assessment was.

In a strictly political sense, the hostage crisis in Iran has escalated into a confrontation with the Soviet Union. The attempted coup de main in Iran was much more hazardous than a naval blockade or the mining of Iranian ports. If the hostages had been killed, Washington would hardly have had another alternative but to use massive military means in Iran with all the ensuing possible consequences. A Russian countermove very likely would have been as good as certain. Who would then have been able to prevent a direct American-Russian confrontation?

Boelling, Kohl Response

LD281713 Hamburg DPA in German 1609 GMT 28 Apr 80

[Excerpt] Bonn--Government and opposition figures in Bonn today strongly refuted the Soviet news agency, APN's, exceptionally sharp attacks against the Federal Republic's policy.

Government Spokesman Klaus Boelling stated that "animated polemical language" could not obliterate the fact that the Federal Government had repeatedly pronounced its sincere and pressing interest in talks between the two alliances on establishing military balance at the lowest possible level. When APN spoke of the Federal Republic's "military ambitions," the author himself could not take such a claim seriously. A Foreign Office spokesman stated that the article was "purely polemical" and was not aimed at achieving advances in arms control.

In his statement, Boelling called attention to the numerous assurances given by the Federal Government to the effect that NATO's offer of talks was meant seriously and that every effort should be made to enable talks to begin at the earliest opportunity. The Soviet Union has been reminded of the offer several times without having responded. "Threatening gestures in the form of words" cannot divert the Federal Government from its conviction that talks on the imbalance in medium-range weapons, caused by the Soviet arms drive, are urgently needed. The claim that the Federal Republic was trying to obtain nuclear weapons was described by Boelling as "contradicting the truth."

In the opinion of CDU Chairman Helmut Kohl, the recklessness of the Soviet threats could scarcely be surpassed: "Yesterday the pipes were calling the tune of detente; today Moscow is taking up the cudgels for military threat." It was the federal chancellor's overdue duty to oppose the Soviet Union's undisguised threats resolutely. CSU group leader, Friedrich Zimmermann, also called on the chancellor to unequivocally reject the Soviet attempt to exert pressure and to state at the same time how he now viewed the invitation to visit Moscow.

SCHMIDT 'NOT YET DECIDED' ON JUNE VISIT TO MOSCOW

LD281330 Hamburg DPA in German 1313 GMT 28 Apr 80

[Text] Bonn--Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt has not yet decided whether to accept the invitation by the Soviet head of state and party Leonid Brezhnev to visit Moscow in June.

Government Spokesman Klaus Boelling told the press in Bonn today that no date had yet been fixed for the chancellor's visit. The Federal Government was still in the process of making up its mind. Bonn was in contact about the visit with its most important allies in which the time element was an important factor.

LE MONDE: EUROPE'S CONFIDENCE IN CARTER 'WILL NEVER BE RESTORED'

LD281601 Paris LE MONDE in French 27-28 Apr 80 p 3

[Jacques Amalric commentary: "Manna From Heaven for the Kremlin"]

[Excerpt] The U.S. attempt to free the hostages by force places the European governments in an impossible position. Under the terms of a tacit but extremely clear agreement, it was accepted that Mr Carter was going to give reason at least one last chance. The initial reactions recorded on Friday should not give rise to any illusions: the "understanding" shown toward Washington by Chancellor Schmidt and Mrs Thatcher in fact conceal great anxiety and deep irritation. London, like Bonn--not to mention Paris which is keeping quiet for fear of exploding--once again feel that they have been wronged by the U.S. President, that they have "played to the gallery" and willy-nilly served as a decoy for an armed operation. The crowning misfortune for Mr Carter, who will certainly not go down in history as an expert in consultation, is that the commando force's failure makes the affair ludicrous as well as whimsical. Even supposing confidence has ever existed between him and the main European leaders, it will certainly never be restored. No promise will henceforth be able to prevent Europe from regarding the U.S. President as a recidivist in power. Moreover did he not say on Friday--although after taking full responsibility for the Tabas affair--that the United States will continue to pursue "every avenue" to secure the release of the hostages? At this stage it is no longer enough just to talk of a transatlantic misunderstanding. It is an extremely serious crisis.

A Hint of a Smile

Who benefits from this crisis? A hint of a smile noticed at the Soviet Embassy in Paris on Friday morning answers this question. Indeed Mr Gromyko had the utmost difficulty in hiding his satisfaction when he was asked to comment on the U.S. attempt. "I could hardly believe it at first," he replied before stating that he is resolutely opposed to any use of force...against Iran. Several hours later, with a speed to which we are not accustomed, the Soviet press issued a series of sanctimonious warnings to Western Europe against the danger of linking its fate too closely to that of the United States.

Moscow's satisfaction is hardly surprising and Mr Carter is at fault for not thinking of this. Manna from heaven is not the usual fare of the Kremlin, especially since the invasion of Afghanistan. The fact is that since the beginning of the year, following tactics which served them well in 1956 after the invasion of Hungary and 12 years later after the occupation of Czechoslovakia, the Soviets have been trying to make people forget the blow they had dealt the Afghan people. The White House chief has just helped them considerably by behaving as if the Afghan and Iranian affairs were comparable.

However, the two crises are fundamentally different. There can certainly be no question of accepting the practice of seizing hostages, especially when such a practice is backed by a state. The Tehran affair, although unjustifiable, is part of a special historical context in which U.S. responsibility is not negligible; it is one of those great collective upheavals which require firmness, of course, but also understanding, wisdom and time. The Afghan affair is entirely different since it is the first time since World War II that the Soviet Union has occupied a country outside its official sphere of influence. There is no admissible motive which could justify such an action which is accompanied by "cleanup" operations aimed at an entire people. The labored explanations given by Gromyko on Friday as to the existence of foreign intervention in Afghanistan are not admissible unless you adopt a new concept--that of self-aggression....

Mr Carter's big mistake will prove to be his failure to understand these profound differences. The price of this mistake is liable to be particularly high even if it is not followed by any of the other repercussions which are still possible: consolidation of the "normalization" in Afghanistan, at least a temporary move by Iran into the Soviet sphere of influence, neutralization of Pakistan, which has just received more proof of U.S. inconsistency and toward which Mr Gromyko has been particularly threatening, and the speeding up of the collapse of U.S. credibility throughout the world, and even in China. It is certainly not surprising, that, in face of such prospects, Mr Gromyko found it difficult to disguise his smile.

MORE SUPPORT FOR U.S. FROM ALLIES URGED

LD280949 Paris FRANCE-SOIR in French 27-28 Apr 80 pp 1-2

[Benoit Rayski editorial: "Whose Fault?"]

[Text] Jimmy Carter is certainly in the wrong--he should not have failed in his attempt to free by force the American hostages in Tehran, and obviously he has made the mistake of not having ensured, through success, the obligatory applause of all those who would have hastened to hail a victory on his part and are now sneering at his failure after being so willing to accept the kind of state terrorism which is practised in Iran....

Yes, Jimmy Carter has been in the wrong but no one--especially people in Europe who have readily accepted the seizure of hostages in Tehran--should be pleased with this.... Jimmy Carter has been in the wrong but how can you fail to notice that his indecision, hesitations and lack of success are also a reflection of our own weaknesses....

Let us say right now that in this affair the present U.S. President's moods and electoral chances seem to us of completely secondary importance. What is at stake is something much graver and more serious, since it is the Western world's credibility in the face of the challenge presented to it by its adversaries. However, instead of realizing this, the idea was allowed to gain credence--and Europeans are largely responsible for this--that the drama of the Tehran hostages was a mere trial of strength between Jimmy Carter and Imam Khomeyni, between an indecisive man (and this is, after all, correct) and an irresponsible one (and this is correct as well).

Muddle

The fact that those who have supported this analysis draw arguments from it to explain that they were quite right to let Carter get bogged down in the Iranian morass by himself, merely shows how blind they are.

In fact, the allies of the United States had every right to criticize the U.S. President--they could and should have criticized him for his indecision and weakness in the face of the Khomeynist challenge; they could and should have helped him to act more quickly and resolutely instead of holding him back; they could and should have shown by deeds and not only by words that Iran had put itself beyond the pale among nations instead of trying to "understand" at all costs the Iranian Revolution.

Maybe this would have prevented this sorry muddle which we now witness. And maybe this would have prevented this ludicrous spate of statements which have been raining down on us since yesterday as if they were revelations, including a surrealistic statement by Foreign Minister Gromyko who denounced in Paris "American aggression against Iran" while Russian divisions devastate Afghanistan, a grotesque statement by the PCF which expressed its indignation at "the Americans' act of piracy" and a dismaying statement by Iranian Foreign Minister Qotbzadeh who coldly declared that henceforth the United States will be responsible for anything, including the worst, which could happen to the hostages.

But maybe it is not too late to react. Not too late to tell Tehran that we see the 50 American hostages as our own and that any attempt to endanger their lives would be considered to be an act of war. And also to tell the United States that we feel sorry and deplore the fact that it has suffered setbacks, because these setbacks are also ours.

LE FIGARO: CARTER 'RIGHT TO LAUNCH' RESCUE ATTEMPT

LD280823 Paris LE FIGARO in French 26 Apr 80 pp 1,2

[Max Clos commentary: "The Risk"]

[Text] You can sneer. You can rejoice. You can also regard the failure of the U.S. operation in Iran as a serious setback not only for the United States but also for Europe and France because we belong to the same camp.

The verdict will obviously be negative. Mr Carter's political career is very likely to be jeopardized but this, after all, is not our affair. The hostages' fate is more uncertain than ever. At best we can fear increased surveillance and worse treatment. At worst, reprisals. In Iran, the "hawks" have been strengthened and the already difficult position of the advocates of a negotiated solution has been considerably weakened.

It is all very easy for the Soviets to condemn it as an "indescribable act of piracy."

Europe will find additional reasons to limit its solidarity with the United States if not refuse it altogether. The arguments are well known: Mr Carter is not reliable, his policy is erratic, he asks his allies to support an adventure doomed to failure without consulting them. This has been demonstrated!

Unfortunately this picture is only too true. Aside from his personal weaknesses Mr Carter also seems to lack an essential virtue: luck. This is a fatal defect in a statesman.

Well! After this indictment we have two things to say. The first is that, although Mr Carter launched this operation too late and very badly, he was right to launch it and in doing so acted like an honorable man. On the moral plane he has nothing to justify. No head of state can tolerate a situation where 50 of his compatriots are held hostage by a foreign power. He has exhausted all--and more than all--the possible concessions and the acceptable degree of patience. It is intolerable to hear this operation described as a "fantastic adventure." To hear the Soviets, after Afghanistan, denouncing the "aggression against Iran" would prompt mirth if such cynicism did not send shivers down your spine.

The second is that an operation of this type by definition involves a risk which must be accepted at the outset. The only way of avoiding failure is not to attempt anything and to suffer passively by letting things drift, like a dog, to quote Montherlant's [French author] description.

The Canadians risked and suffered defeat when they landed in Dieppe in 1942. Was that fantastic? The Americans ran a risk on the Normandy beaches in 1944. The Israelis at Entebbe, the Germans at Mogadishu, the French at Kolwezi all took risks. All could have failed. Does that mean we should condemn them for having dared to try? In these three cases there is a thin dividing line between a ridiculous initiative and a heroic exploit: namely success, which itself depends almost equally on good preparation, the courage of those carrying out the mission and on luck.

All that leads us to a simple conclusion: Yesterday the world entered an extremely serious phase in its history which can hardly be disguised by bleating about "happiness" and "detente."

We would do well to consider the fact that Mr Carter now only has the choice between two solutions:

--Accept his defeat, sit back and let things happen. The result of this would be to give the Soviets free reign. In that case God help the world, Europe and France!

--Fight and plan his revenge. However, he cannot afford a second failure. This time he must win. He will be forced to use much more powerful means, in other words take the risk of a Soviet response. The consequences of this is war. In that case the Lord preserve peace!

The horizon is obscured with black clouds.

AFP: WITHDRAWAL OF TROOPS IN CHAD CONFIRMED

AB281009 Paris AFP in French 0849 GMT 28 Apr 80

[Text] Paris, 28 Apr (AFP)--The withdrawal of the French troops in Ndjamena started on Monday morning, sources close to the French Defense Ministry confirmed early this morning. The withdrawal of the troops and the transfer of equipment will be carried out over several weeks, the same sources added. These troops, which were gathered in the Chadian capital's airport before fighting began, had observed strict neutrality. (?They included) about 1,100 men [words indistinct] of the 9th Marine Infantry Division and the 11th Paratroop Division, which constitute the French Army's intervention units abroad, according to the source.

The destination of the Transall planes which have started the French troop withdrawal operation has not been disclosed. Reports from informed sources say the French troops could stop over either in Libreville in Gabon, or in Douala in Cameroon before going back to France.

POLITICIANS VIEW U.S. MILITARY ACTION IN IRAN

LD281918 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 1700 GMT 28 Apr 80

[Text] Rome--Harsh comments on the events in Iran have come from the president of the Social Democratic Party, Giuseppe Saragat, and the secretary of the Republican Party, Giovanni Spadolini. According to Saragat, it is unthinkable that a civilized country like America should abandon 50 of its citizens to their fate. Had it happened to the Soviet Union, the reaction would have been as quick as lightning and it would have been applauded by all democratic countries, even though the Soviet Union and Iran, in Saragat's opinion, are ruled by tyrants not less ferocious than the ex-shah. According to Spadolini, the Republicans have not failed to encourage Italian action in favor of economic sanctions against Iran without internal reservations, within the plan for an indispensable and rigorous Western solidarity.

Finally, a note from the De Martino-led faction of the Italian Socialist Party states that the failure of the American raid risks reinforcement of the power of the ayatollahs against the laymen, Bani-Sadr and Qotbzadeh, and favors the influence of the Soviet Union in Iran.

Franco Servello, member of the Secretariat of the Italian Social Movement-National Rightwing, speaking on the aborted American raid in Iran, asserted that the Italian Government is an accomplice in a paracommunist operation designed to create distance between Italy and NATO. In this sense, the attitude adopted by the Italian Foreign Ministry is unprecedented.

NEWSPAPERS COMMENT ON U.S. RAID IN IRAN

26 Apr Press Review

AU261550 Rome ANSA in English 1520 GMT 26 Apr 80

[Text] Rome, April 26 (ANSA)--The botched American incursion in Iran predictably dominated the front pages of the Italian dailies this morning with many of them stressing that the failed mission to liberate the hostages in the American Embassy in Tehran had merely heightened the chances of war. A selection of the headlines offers an overview of the predominate tone of Italian reactions:

"Almost At War for the Hostages" (the rightwing Rome daily, IL TEMPO).

"The Failed Blitz Increases USA-Iranian Tension" (the Christian Democrat Daily, IL POPOLO).

"Carter Risks War" (the Rome daily, LA REPUBBLICA).

"The World, One Step From War" (the Communist Party daily, L'UNITA).

"U.S. Raid Unleashes International Tension" (the Socialist Party daily, AVANTI).

"A Farce That Could Have Been War" (IL MANIFESTO, the most authoritative spokesman to the left of the Communist Party).

According to LA REPUBBLICA, the American raid "requires rather grave meditations", first of all regarding the U.S.'s capacity for leadership, "which has been the subject of doubt for some time, but now has been further weakened". According to the daily, these meditations should also turn to relations between the U.S. and NATO. "This second question is obviously the most important one for us Europeans and should now be faced with the utmost clarity", LA REPUBBLICA said.

Like most dailies, LA REPUBBLICA pointed out that President Carter ordered the raid after requiring a series of "proofs" from his European Allies before the Iranian crisis and the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan. Just as the Europeans were "putting large interests on the line", the commando which then "withdrew ingloriously" went into action, the paper noted. At this point, LA REPUBBLICA listed a series of questions:

"What credibility does an ally who behaves in this way deserve?

"Is it possible that, in such conditions of insecurity, the European reply should always, and in any case, be an unconditional yes?

"May we not be seeing the emergence of an A-for-America [as received] factor that risks being a permanent source of instability and disquiet?"

The Turin daily, LA STAMPA, owned by the Agnelli family of Fiat fame, raised a similar series of questions:

"No one doubts that the Americans are right in the cruel affair of the Tehran hostages. But the EC had only just been asked to decide on economic sanctions against Iran and, even if laboriously and reluctantly, agreement had been reached. It was an important and unifying moment for Europe, which has vital economic interests in Iran. But the agreement was emptied of all meaning at a blow by an attempt at a test of force of which only some governments had even the vaguest inkling."

L'UNITA, too, underscored the surprise of the West European governments when they heard of the incursion. "For the European," [said] the daily, "a trick of this kind is a serious warning . Now, one can see more clearly by what infernal machine they risk being overcome if they abandon the rigorously defensive and geographically limited definition of their alliance and let themselves be dragged to the slippery threshold of a generic solidarity that has to be voiced in any case".

According to IL POPOLO, the failed incursion could even act as a detonator for "other risky operations. We are faced by a leap of quality in the attitude of the United States, forced for months to bear...the weight of an intolerable blackmail on the level of international law. We know for certain that the failed American blitz has not only not resolved, but rather complicated and aggravated everything further".

AVANTI voiced the fear that the incursion would add a "new and disquieting file to the already voluminous dossier of Euro-American relations, which maybe have never known happy and idyllic moments". According to AVANTI, the Europeans feel they were "tricked" by Carter since no one informed them in any way of preparations for the raid.

IL TEMPO pointed out that the incurions would "turn upside down" the data of the situation in the Gulf region--and not only in the Persian Gulf . "As of today, we have entered an entirely new phase of the problem. So it is not easy to make forecasts".

The Rome daily, IL MESSAGGERO, pointed out that it was "all very well to say Carter has taken full responsibility for what happened and that the whole operation was prepared and put into effect outside the Atlantic Alliance.... The fact remains that, in recent days, Carter asked the Western Allies for closer and more effective solidarity in economic sanctions precisely because he had renounced, or postponed to the future, military-style solutions".

The Milan daily, IL GIORNALE NUOVO, one of the most conservative in the Italian spectrum, was one of the few newspapers to urge closer ties with the U.S. as a result of the incursion. According to this sheet, "aligning themselves more and better than hitherto, the West will obtain two goals".

According to IL GIORNALE NUOVO, these were:

"They will placate and reassure America.

"They will tell the imbeciles in Tehran that the free world will not sell its soul for barrels of oil.

""For this reason", the paper said, "we do not understand why (Italian Foreign Minister Emilio) Colombo wanted to be the first, and so far only Western foreign minister to deplore the American initiative".

IL MANIFESTO described the incursion as "worthy of a Marx Brothers film" and pointed out that, if the American Congress followed its own rules, it should "solve the electoral question" by throwing Carter out of the White House for not seeking its approval of an act of war. "It is difficult to believe that the world's destiny depends on this dimension of stupidity among the powerful", the paper commented.

"In fact, the gravest danger may well lie in the possibility that things went exactly as Carter says they did. That the United States has added to its sins against Iran a move of such imposing imbecility as to bring the world to the brink of war.... The game of provocation--the Soviets in Afghanistan and the Americans in Iran--is bringing us to the edge of catastrophe. Don't let us be fooled by the flimsy and misleading fragility of the pretexts. Behind them, there are gigantic conflicts, the old and the new shell of imperialism. It would not be the first time that a spark sends the world up in flames, but it would certainly be the last".

28 Apr Press Review

AU281606 Rome ANSA in English 1540 GMT 28 Apr 80

[Text] Rome, April 28 (ANSA)--The abortive American incursion in Iran left the Italian press split down the middle this morning with the conservative and centrist newspapers urging the Western Allies to reconfirm their solidarity with Washington.

"You recognize true friends in adversity" was the comment of the Milan daily, CORRIERE DELLA SERA, in an editorial bearing the title, "Allies in Difficult Times". According to the newspaper, "it was easy and profitable to proclaim yourself a friend of the Americans when the Washington government donated Europe enormous sums under the Marshall Plan, and, in subsequent decades, supplied even greater economic and military aid to anyone who wanted it." Now the United States runs the risk of being isolated. It would be suicidal blindness on the part of the Europeans not to show solidarity with the Americans".

The conservative Rome daily, IL TEMPO, added that the American people might be "tempted to interpret the incomprehension of the Allies as a lack of solidarity and friendship, if not as a sign of unconscious hostility...."

An even more conservative daily, IL GIORNALE NUOVO of Milan, criticized the statement with which the Italian Foreign Ministry "hastened to deplore the American blitz". "We ask, not so much Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo, as Prime Minister Francesco Cossiga, without whose approval the statement could not have been made, what forced him to pronounce assessments which no one asked of anyone and which, in fact, none of the West's responsible leaders expressed. "Once the crisis is past, if it is successfully overcome, we may also ask America to explain the improvidence and blindness which induced the necessity for, and fiasco of the blitz. But, as things stand, there can be no trials of America. There is just solidarity to affirm".

In this context, the newspapers underscored the importance of the present EEC summit in Luxembourg.

"The Nine's leaders are trying to strengthen Western relations" was the comment of the Milan daily, IL GIORNO. "The problem is to work out a foreign policy at the highest level for the first time since the EEC foreign ministers decided to impose sanctions on Iran last week".

"The Nine are in search of cohesion" was how the Rome Daily, IL MESSAGGERO, put it. The dramatic change imposed on the Iranian crisis by the failed blitz has forced the European leaders to forget their irritation over the lack of consultations and to shelve their diffidence towards Washington".

But the leftwing dailies criticized the American move. The Italian Communist Party daily, L'UNITA, for example, warned that the fate of the hostages was now more uncertain and pointed out that American diplomacy was "in a more difficult position because of the badly aborted blitz".

BRIEFS

1979 TRADE WITH SAUDI ARABIA--Milan, April 22 (ANSA)--In the first months of 1979 Italian imports of Saudi Arabian oil increased from 19 to 28 million tons, while Italian exports to the Middle Eastern nation in the first eleven months of last year increased in value by 27.5 percent. These figures were released by an Italian Foreign Trade Ministry report which asserted that Italian exports had already increased substantially in 1977 (seventy percent more than in the preceding year) and also in 1978 (30.8 percent). The report also indicated that the operative possibilities of Italian firms in Saudi Arabia are still positive, not only in the building, transportation and communication fields but also in small and medium-sized industries. The report also stressed that Saudi Arabian authorities are not in favor of exchanging oil for dollars and reiterated that they will supply crude only to those countries which commit themselves to cooperating in Saudi Arabia's industrial development. FOREIGN MINISTER 'REGRETS' VANCE RESIGNATION

ID290936 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 0600 GMT 29 Apr 80

[Text] There have been comments and reactions in Spain to the resignation of Cyrus Vance. To be precise, our Foreign Minister Marcelino Oreja said that, without going into the reasons which led Cyrus Vance to take this decision, I regret the loss of such a good friend from the office of secretary of state, with whom I have had an open and constructive dialogue. I have always admired in him his great diplomatic qualities of firmness and (?responsibility) in the service of America's national interests.

CARRILLO INTERVIEWED ON PARIS CP TALKS, TIES WITH CPSU

ID281510 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1400 GMT 28 Apr 80

[Text] We now present a statement by Santiago Carrillo, secretary general of the Spanish Communist Party, on the European communist parties conference in Paris. A conference of European communist parties, convened mainly by the communist parties of France and Poland, began in Paris this morning. The PCE is among the several European communist parties not attending the conference. Santiago Carrillo, why are you not in Paris today?

[Begin Carrillo recording] I would say that first there is a procedural reason. We are of the opinion that one or two parties are not authorized to convene a conference of this kind and, at the consultations prior to the convening of the conference, we and other European communist parties said we were not in agreement. Logically the conference should not have been convened since at least 10 communist parties were opposed to it.

Then there is the problem of substance. We feel that the struggle for peace in the countries of West Europe has to be a unitary struggle, including communist and socialist parties and other progressive, democratic parties outside of the two military blocs. This reason, which underlies our position, was not taken into account by the organizers of the conference and it is no accident that the countries attending this meeting, headed by the Eastern countries, are those where relations between the forces of the left and progressive forces are probably in worse situations.

Obviously the communist parties alone cannot bring about the triumph of the cause of detente and peace at this time. Therefore we have not gone to Paris because we think that West European communist parties should act in the defense of peace independent of the blocs, trying to bring together in this--which is something which interests practically all men and women on our continent and, indeed, the whole of humanity--all those who, independently of their ideology and their political convictions, believe that we have to avoid the possibility of a nuclear holocaust. This is why we and 10 communist parties like us have not gone to Paris. [end recording]

Santiago Carrillo now tells us about present relations between the PCE and the CPSU. [Begin Carrillo recording] I think that the PCE is maintaining its relations with the CPSU, as do all communist parties and a large number of socialist parties including the PSOE [Spanish Socialist Workers' Party] and other democratic parties. This does not mean that these relations are subordinate relations, at least for our part. We are prepared to maintain relations. We want to carry on maintaining them, but what we do not accept is a subordinate relationship with any party, whatever it is. [end recording]

CARRINGTON TO DECIDE ON U.S. TRIP LATER IN WEEK

LD281338 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1252 GMT 28 Apr 80

[Text] Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington has abandoned plans to accompany the queen on her visit to Switzerland, which starts tomorrow, the Foreign Office said today. The world situation following the Iranian hostage crisis, was blamed for the change in schedule. Foreign Office Minister of State Mr Peter Blaker will now accompany the queen on the four-day trip.

A firm decision on the visit by Lord Carrington to America this weekend, for talks with the American secretary of state will be taken later in the week.

Following Mr Cyrus Vance's resignation from the position yesterday, a successor will have to confirm arrangements already made for Lord Carrington's visit.

The Foreign Office would not comment on reports that Mr Vance had quit in protest at the abortive attempt to rescue the American hostages until official confirmation of the resignation has been received.

DAILY TELEGRAPH: U.S. 'RIGHT TO TRY' TO RESCUE HOSTAGES

LD260931 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 26 Apr 80 p 16

[Editorial: "Right To Try"]

[Text] The U.S. Cavalry did not get through. The beleaguered garrison stays beleaguered. Their captors' war whoops rend the air. There cannot be many Americans who are not filled with burning rage at the spectacularly public failure of the attempt to rescue the hostages. To add to their mortification, the rescue failed not because the rescuers fell gloriously in battle or were out numbered and overwhelmed by redskins but because of "equipment failure." Equipment failure! From the country which sent men round the moon and brought them back! What could have been a triumph is instead a disaster of painful magnitude. Our heart goes out to the Americans.

Let there be no expressions of secretive and malicious pleasure at America's discomfiture, nor of condemnation either. In this column yesterday we expressed in forceful terms criticisms of the way Mr Carter has been conducting policy toward Iran, in particular the loose way in which he had encouraged speculation about possible military measures that might be taken, which then turned out to be mainly directed toward pressuring the allies into adopting economic sanctions. We pointed out that military action taken against Iran by American forces could lead to clashes with Russian forces which, because of the geographical situation, lead to a choice between humiliating defeat or widening of the conflict, perhaps a nuclear confrontation. All those criticisms still stand. They do not apply, however, to the attempt to rescue the hostages, or indeed to any future attempt.

The rescue attempt, as Mr Carter has rightly emphasised, was not a military move directed against Iran as a country or against the Iranians as a people. That is not to say that such moves would not, in other circumstances, be fully justified. The Iranian invasion and holding of the American Embassy in Tehran--American territory in international law--is technically speaking an act of war, as well as being a gross breach of the system of diplomatic immunity accepted by all countries. In former times it would without hesitation have been accepted as a casus belli. [paragraph continues]

Be that as it may, to treat it as such, under existing world conditions and in the peculiar circumstances existing in Iran, would be wrong. A military expedition mounted with the sole object of getting the American hostages out is quite another matter. It is fully justified as a controlled reaction to the Iranian attack.

If it is so justified--as it is--why, it could be asked, should it not have been mounted earlier? It is over five months since the invasion of the embassy took place. The answer lies in Mr Carter's earlier belief--correct in our view--that there was a good chance that release of the hostages might be secured if America showed exemplary patience while attempts were made, through many channels, to bring this about by peaceful means. This very nearly succeeded. President Bani-Sadr, after his appointment by Ayatollah Khomeyni, was clearly working towards that end, with the first step being to get the hostages out of the hands of the gunmen holding them in the embassy and into the direct hands of the government. At the last moment, a light head-shake from Khomeyni killed the scheme, it must have been after that when Mr Carter turned to the rescue option.

One aspect of this sad development which stands out like a sore thumb is the criminally irresponsible course being adopted by Russia. Mr Gromyko refused to answer when he was asked at a press conference in Paris yesterday if the Soviet Union would stand by with its arms folded if any of its citizens had been taken hostage. Russia, because of its spying activities, has more need than any other country to see that the laws on diplomatic immunity are upheld. That does not count, apparently, against the need to stoke anti-Americanism.

In considering whether the rescue attempt should have been made it is surely only necessary to envisage how utterly changed everything would have been had it succeeded. It was right to try. It has been the most appalling bad luck that it failed. All must hope that the Iranians have more sense than to cause harm to their captives. Up to now, Americans in general have shown amazing steadiness and maturity. A recent opinion poll showed that only 22 percent favored armed action against Iran. But there are limits. There must be a very raw mood in many American homes today. So far as the allies are concerned, the need for high-level, wide-ranging consultation is greater than ever. Mrs Thatcher might offer to accompany Lord Carrington to Washington on his scheduled visit next Saturday.

'CLARITY' ON WEST'S DANGER URGED

LD270926 London SUNDAY TELEGRAPH in English 27 Apr 80 p 16

[Editorial: "Sandstorm"]

[Text] It is unfortunate that the fiasco which overtook President Carter's rescue helicopters in the Iranian desert has thrust the issue of the 50 American hostages even more firmly where it has absolutely no business to be--namely, under a fierce spotlight at the very centre of the international stage. Compared with many other dangers which currently threaten or divide the Western world, the fate of those 50 captives in Tehran, grievous and cruel though it is, is something which always has belonged, and still does belong, in the wings, there to be solved quietly, without histronics and as far away as possible from the glare of publicity.

Two issues tower over and above the sorry, unfinished saga of the hostages. These issues will be there whoever gets into the White House in November and whether or not the hostages themselves have been freed by then. The first is the growing threat of anarchy, accompanied by Soviet penetration, in the entire Persian Gulf, an area President Carter himself has declared to be so economically and strategically vital that the United States is prepared to go to war--with more than eight helicopters--to defend it. [paragraph continues]

The second is to preserve the unity and the strength of the Western alliance in the face of this threat, which has been brought appreciably nearer by the Soviet invasion and occupation of Afghanistan.

Last week's events will certainly have done damage, both in the Gulf itself and in the contiguous areas of Western Asia and the Horn of Africa, by denting America's credibility. At a slow pace following the fall of the shah 15 months ago, and then at an accelerated rate after the Red Army marched into Kabul last Christmas, the Americans have striven, throughout all three regions, to present themselves as reliable guardians of the peace. It was made clear that the United States, although willing, was not yet ready and for months past, the air has been full of plans to raise a 110,000-strong American emergency force and full of pleas for African and Arab staging bases to get that force into action when needed.

What do key countries like Pakistan, who rejected the initial American aid offer as inadequate, or Kenya and Oman, who have both come forward with staging facilities, feel now? If America, the temple of technology, cannot, after months of preparation, keep a tiny helicopter fleet airborne over 500 miles, what trust can be placed in promises of a mighty air bridge over 3,000 miles?

The other absolute priority of the day is the need to keep the Atlantic Alliance not only intact but moving in step in the same direction. Here the key word is not so much credibility as consultation. There are obvious arguments for keeping the details of a tricky operation such as last week's rescue attempt from everyone who does not have to know; and that may well include your best friends and closest partners. Nonetheless, those friends and partners have the right to feel private chagrin and concern. If the closing words of Mr Carter's broadcast are to be believed, he will now revert to those long-term peaceful pressures over the hostages, which have been advocated by his allies. That must involve closer co-operation. The need for such co-operation is even more compelling if his words were in fact a bluff, and more drastic options such as naval blockade, are still swirling around in his mind. Any military move beyond a rescue attempt pure and simple is a matter for the Alliance as a whole to decide.

On the subject of outside advice, it would surely be desirable for the President to extend his own ragged circle across party lines--something which the American political system readily permits. In such a national emergency the recruitment of Henry Kissinger, for example, could do much for America's standing abroad as well as for the quality of decision-making in Washington.

Mrs Thatcher, both before and during the latest crisis, has shown that she knows where the true priorities lie. The nation as a whole presents a less homogeneous and far less convincing spectacle. We seem quite content to produce and goggle at lurid films on the supposed sex-life of Arabian princesses, with little thought for the damage such trivia can wreak on our relations with the most powerful, but also the most vulnerable, state in the Gulf. And our athletes are out on their own for once--but alas, only in their stampede to get to the Moscow Olympics as though the murder of Afghanistan were something which did not affect citizens in track-suits.

Any of them who watched the televised reactions of Mr Gromyko, the Soviet foreign minister, to the abortive helicopter raid, might have experienced a few qualms. Even in the long catalogue of Soviet hypocrisy and double-talk, few things have been so nauseous has his attempt--tongue almost visibly in hollowed cheek--to inflate America's attempt to free their own infamously imprisoned diplomats into an act of imperialist aggression. This from the man whose government has poured more than 100,000 invasion troops into Afghanistan under the cloak of "fraternal help"! But by seeking to cloud the real issue facing the West, he managed only to sharpen it further. We can even be grateful to him for that. Clarity about the realities of the West's dangers has never been more urgently needed.

I SIMERINI CLAIMS KIPRIANOU BEING PRESSURED TO RESIGN

NC270838 Nicosia I SIMERINI in Greek 27 Apr 80 p 1

[Excerpts] According to information received by I SIMERINI, President Kiprianou is being pressured by those surrounding him to resign, while various groups of the governing Democratic Party [DIKO] are already holding secret meetings to discuss the succession issue. At recent meetings DIKO cadres brought up the issue of "succession" in the event Mr Kiprianou is forced to resign either for reasons of health or due to escalating attacks against the government.

It was learned from DIKO circles that Mr Kiprianou is being pressured to resign as soon as possible--by the end of May--to prevent the total collapse of the government structure and further failures for the Democratic Party. However, according to our information, Mr Kiprianou refuses to discuss the issue of his possible resignation. DIKO cadres who support Mr Kiprianou's resignation, have noted, among other things, the issue of the deterioration of the president's health, who, as is known, was forced to stay away from his office for over 10 days. At secret meetings held recently, the issue of "succession" was brought up in the event that Mr Kiprianou ultimately will be persuaded or forced to resign.

In the event that developments lead to new presidential elections then the candidacy of the presidency will be claimed, as we are informed, within the Democratic Party by Mr A. Mikhailidhis. But according to our information others within the party are moving to claim the same candidacy.

DIKO Denial

NC271835 Nicosia Domestic Television Service in Greek 1730 GMT 27 Apr 80

[Text] The Democratic Party [DIKO] has issued a statement which describes as totally unfounded an allegation by a newspaper today that President Kiprianou is being pressured by party circles to resign. Because of the press report, the DIKO Political Bureau, Executive Committee, Nicosia District Committee and the NEDIK [Democratic Party Youth] Executive Secretariat held an extraordinary joint meeting today. The meeting established the existence of, and denounced, the attempt to ruin the president of the republic and the party, Mr Kiprianou, and approved a resolution of unreserved support for him. The resolution expresses concern over possible danger to the smooth functioning of the country's political life which, according to the statement, emanates from both press reports and the slogans of the latest congress by the Democratic Rally party youth as well as on other occasions. The statement calls on the Cypriot people to be alert and vigilant to confront any possible undermining of the state.

At the same time, House president and deputy chairman of the party Mikhailidhis has issued a statement saying that the entire newspaper report about DIKO cadres is a fictitious myth. Moreover, Mr Mikhailidhis has stressed categorically that any insinuations that he has exerted any pressure on the president to resign do not in any way respond to reality and aim at causing confusion.

NEWSPAPERS COMMENT ON U.S. RAID IN IRAN, REPERCUSSIONS

I VRADHINI: U.S. Not to Blame

AT261349 Athens I VRADHINI in Greek 26 Apr 80 pp 1-2

[From the "Evening" column: "The Operation"]

[Text] Public opinion all over the world was shaken yesterday when it was informed that the U.S. operation for the liberation of the 53 U.S. hostages--who have been illegally detained for 174 days (!) in Tehran--failed during the initial stage when the helicopters that were carrying the group to rescue the hostages were damaged in a central Iranian desert. The uneasiness was general and, naturally, Greek public opinion could not be an exception.

After the failure of the operation the first reactions must, in any case, be considered reassuring. It seems UN Secretary General Waldheim's appeal for self-restraint will be heeded and the danger of a more widespread involvement, which of course none of us wish, will recede. But even if these first encouraging indications are confirmed, there is no doubt that the failure of the U.S. operation has further complicated a very dangerous situation in one of the most sensitive areas of the world, in which--in its broader meaning--Greece unfortunately is situated.

The facts which as of last night were publicized about the "technical" problems that forced President Carter to order the cancellation of the operation almost from the beginning leave a very confused picture. There are many unanswered questions and it is very difficult for one to accept the story that the helicopters which were carrying the members of the rescue group were damaged one by one in the Iranian desert during an operation which supposedly had been planned and prepared for months. Nor are the subsequent Iranian claims about the pursuit of the U.S. planes by Iranian jets more convincing. There are many gaps which must be filled in order to understand what truly happened. In any case, at least at present, the communique of the chief of the Iranian General Staff, who attributes the U.S. operation's failure to "God's help", offers the most eloquent possible interpretation in its generality and vagueness.

The Iranians have the right to protest the violation of their territorial sovereignty and they are not exaggerating when they describe the operation as "an act of war" against Iran. Nevertheless, they forget that they first violated every rule of international law and diplomatic relations with the detention of the 53 hostages. They also forget that first their own act could be considered as "casus belli."

It would be easy to condemn the U.S. operation. No one wishes to resort to military methods which can lead to more widespread involvements and dangers for peace. In this case, however, no one can also claim that Washington did not try for almost 6 months to exhaust all means for a peaceful settlement of the problem through negotiations. The blame for the failure does not fall on the American side and it should not be blamed for running out of patience.

The failure of the operation to free the hostages certainly will have unfavorable repercussions on U.S. prestige and on the personal prestige of President Carter--which may possibly influence significantly the development of a campaign for the election of the President. However, these are not the most important facts that should draw our attention. The operation has shown that as long as the "hostage crisis" is prolonged for principally internal reasons in Iran the greater will be the possibilities of desperate activities with involvements that may be difficult to control, and then not only the lives of the hostages but also peace will be endangered. Let all bear this in mind....

I KATHIMERINI Assessment

AT271440 Athens I KATHIMERINI in Greek 27 Apr 80 p 9

[Editorial: "After the Failure"]

[Text] Both aspects of the U.S. intervention to liberate the Tehran hostages cause grief: the fact that it took place, and the fact that it failed. And what is funny--if at such a time one can speak about jokes--is the fact that one can understand neither why it was decided to carry out the operation nor why it failed.

President Carter rallied all the Western world and that part of the Third World that he could rally to align them with Washington in implementing diplomatic and economic measures to isolate Tehran for its reluctance to release the hostages. The effectiveness of the reprisals was disputed but finally not a few governments agreed to boycott the Iranian economy.

Thus, while the plan was unfolding, Carter decided on a military operation to kidnap the people detained at the U.S. Embassy. Why did he do it? If he believed that the severance of commercial and economic exchanges with the Ayatollah's Iran would produce results he should not have proceeded with a unilateral military action. If he did not expect anything substantive from pressures of a "peaceful" nature then why did he insist on their implementation so much? Regardless of how a very good-willed observer wishes to approach the issue, it is impossible for him to find logic in it.

Consequently only one explanation is possible. After enduring for some time the persistent recommendations of U.S. public opinion to undertake dynamic action, the U.S. President made concessions, fearing that a refusal would cost him the election. This decision, which is so blatantly incompatible with the behavior which Carter has demonstrated thus far on this specific problem was imposed on him by the party, which saw Republican candidate Reagan--an unequivocal follower of forcible intervention--as winning. Thus, if because of the operation's failure it becomes necessary to scrub someone, that man will be Carter and not the Democratic candidate! [as published]

Why did the operation fail so miserably? Perhaps we will never know! However, the people who planned it and set it in motion should have considered that the only alternative in case of a lack of success could not be failure but the decision not to undertake it! This is because the consequences of its failure do not stop with either fewer or more dead and injured U.S. soldiers or with Carter's electoral troubles. They go further, much further--into the future of international life.

Certainly there will not be immediate, violent reactions by any side against the Americans because, regardless of the negative consequences their act may have for them, this does not stop it from carrying a message that is very significant for the calculations of others: that the Americans also do not hesitate to resort to active solutions to defend what they believe to be their national interest and prestige. After all, the precedent of the Soviet invasion in Afghanistan did not contain anything different. It turned the entire world against Moscow--except for its various satellites--and it opened a wound for it--the armed struggle against the Afghans--but the invasion also made it known that "superpower" USSR can disregard completely the independence of other peoples and the principles of international law without anyone daring to punish it. Why should such "blustery" behavior not find imitators?

What makes the U.S. operation to free the hostages most worrisome is the fact that it was not inspired by the idea of the "preservation of peace" but the foolishness that "war also produces solutions." After everything that has happened thus far and that has excessively weighed on international relations, anything additional in the same direction is a step toward war.

Undoubtedly the detention of the U.S. diplomats is infuriating. Nobody objects to the claim that the Islamic republic is pushing things too far, even though it is insisting that it will bring permanent peace to the world. The U.S. wish to protect its "national face" is most justifiable, but all these things absolutely do not justify the undertaking of gestures which achieve nothing but bring war nearer, a war which, even if it allows nuclear bombs to explode only on the opponent's nuclear bases and not on inhabited areas, will cost 300 million dead evenly divided among the Soviet Union, the United States and Europe!

Therefore, if all those people who think that with such "procedures" solutions will be found to international problems are not mad or irresponsible, then it is high time the others--the prudent ones--raise their voices so that they may take humanity's fate in their own hands without hypocrisy, without "naughtiness" in the "game" for the protection of peace. Above all, those whose time has come to move are people themselves. For one or two decades after the last war those who were inviting others to join crusades to support peace and were organizing international conferences and mass demonstrations were the communists, but they abandoned everything as soon as the nuclear arsenal became the great "trump card" of "existing socialism"--ever since the USSR began exporting arms and war, instead of struggling against war.

The dramatic episode of the dispatch of armed forces to rescue the hostages is a critical opportunity for the Greek people to declare their absolute opposition to the warlike atmosphere, to the activities that bring it again on humanity's road. We have folded our arms long enough.

AKROPOLIS Justification

AT271339 Athens AKROPOLIS in Greek 27 Apr 80 p 4

[From the "Laconic" column: "The U.S. Operation"]

[Text] The abortive U.S. operation to free the hostages does not simply mean an extension of their detention. It increases the dangers to their lives. In Iran their situation is not controlled by the government. There are active and, in fact, armed forces which nobody knows who directs and what they serve. Many things are rumored even about the fanatic students who are detaining the hostages. Therefore, it should not be precluded that unaccountable and irresponsible elements, guided or not, may kill the hostages or at least some of them for revenge or to serve inadmissible aims, in which case a chain reaction may start and an exceptionally dangerous situation may develop, not ruling out even a clash. The only reassuring thing at present is that the hostages were not executed in retaliation immediately after the U.S. operation was learned of. In those moments of fury and exacerbation of the situation even the worst eventualities were possible. But as time passes and fury subsides chances increase that extremes will be avoided. In any case, Moscow, which has launched a violent propaganda attack against Washington in which it accuses Washington of violating international law and using the hostages to promote its "aggressive and hegemonistic" policy in the Middle East, is not correct. The abortive operation proves exactly the opposite. If the Americans had used the hostages as a pretext they would not have attempted to liberate them. They would have left them in the hands of the fanatic Iranians and would have launched an attack in the Persian Gulf. However, apart from this, the Soviets are the last people who have a right to accuse the United States of violating international law when they themselves have invaded a foreign country which in fact in no way harmed them. On the other hand, it was the Iranians who violated international law and provoked the Americans.

Motives 'Inspire Respect'

AT261428 Athens AVRIANI in Greek 26 Apr 80 p 3

[From the "Clearly and Lucidly" column: "The U.S. Hostages"]

[Text] The U.S. intervention in Tehran [as published] for the rescue of the hostages provided international public opinion with great thrills yesterday. It was the first time in history that such a great military machine was set in motion for an adventurist operation. The United States claimed that the operation had an exclusively humanitarian goal. If this was the motive for the operation, no doubt the majority of the people agree with it. Anything done to save humanitarianism in this selfish world moves the people and inspires respect.

In any case, we must acknowledge that President Carter had the honesty to immediately undertake personal responsibility for the failure of the operation which was condemned by our democratic opposition.

Generally we should stress that the liberation of the hostages moves every educated and civilized person and that, regardless of the failure of the U.S. intervention, all the people wish for an end to this adventure for people who have been detained so long in an embassy--innocent victims of more general international complications.

TURKISH ROLE IN IRAN OPERATION TO BE QUESTIONED BY CONGRESS

AT281400 Athens APOGEVMATINI in Greek 28 Apr 80 p 18

[Excerpt] Turkey Guilty for the Failure

The APOGEVMATINI correspondent in Washington, Aris Angelopoulos, telephoned the following:

The Carter administration will be asked to reply to the following question: Why is it that the aircraft and helicopters which took part in the dramatic operation last Friday had to cover great distances from the Persian Gulf and Egypt, with the well-known results, instead of taking off from Turkish bases?

Many members of Congress and the Senate will request the immediate commencement of an investigation into the reasons which led to the failure of the attempt to save the hostages and into why the aircraft did not take off from the Diyarbakia base which is close to Tehran.

Greek-American congressmen and senators will insist on being informed on why convenient U.S. bases in Turkey, which borders with Iran, were not used. They will also ask if the consent of the Turkish Government was requested and what its reply was.

"We would like to know what usefulness there is in U.S. bases in Turkey when we are unable to use them at a time of supreme emergency," I was told by a member of the U.S. Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Jacob Javits, senator from New York, also gave assurances that Congress will commence an investigation this very week.

"We will look into all facts surrounding the decision of the President to use the armed forces without consulting us. We will particularly look into the reasons why it was decided to add further dangers to the operation with the result that it failed because of the great distances that our aircraft and helicopters had to cover," I was told by Senator Church, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

It will be investigated whether Carter did not request Ankara's consent because he feared a refusal or whether he did request for it and received a negative reply. This investigation will have serious repercussions on subsequent treatment of Turkey on the part of the U.S. Congress.

AKROPOLIS NOTES 'CONFUSION' IN OPPOSITION OPINIONS ON U.S.

AT271340 Athens AKROPOLIS in Greek 27 Apr 80 p 4

[From the "Laconic" column: "Do They Know What They Are Asking?"]

[Text] The fact that there is--or is intentionally cultivated--an unprecedented confusion in the area of the opposition emerges from its demand that the government disavow the U.S. attempt in Iran. The parties which have expressed this opinion should answer some simple questions: Was it or was it not a violation of international law to occupy a foreign embassy and arrest and detain the staff for months as hostages? Was a UN resolution issued or not calling on Iran to free the hostages? Was it or was it not a new violation to flout the UN resolution? And in their opinion what should international society's reaction be toward those countries which violate international law? Force them to respect it or applaud them, protect them and encourage them on the road of illegality? If the latter is the case, how do we have the right to demand that other countries act against Turkey on the Cyprus issue when we ourselves applaud a violation of international law and ask our government to condemn the legal reaction of a country which has been brutally provoked?

ERBAKAN CALLS ON GOVERNMENT TO RESIGN, CRITICIZES U.S.

TA281744 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 28 Apr 80

[Text] National Salvation Party leader Necmettin Erbakan said that the government should resign after the president is elected and should give the new president the opportunity to appoint the government with which he will work. Erbakan said: The time is up for the Justice Party government which came to power claiming that it will solve all problems within 5 months.

Speaking in Sakaray's Karasu and Kaynarca districts, Erbakan said that anarchy has mounted and reached grave dimensions during the Justice Party government and that millions of peasants, civil servants, workers and artisans are faced with the problem of making a living. Erbakan continued: The Justice Party government, which came to power promising a warm winter, a full shopping bag and a cooking pot, has mercilessly devalued the Turkish lira as a result of IMF orders and has dragged millions of peasants, civil servants, workers and artisans to poverty and hunger. As if all this was not enough, the government has again succumbed to IMF orders to devalue the lira, to freeze workers wages, to keep floor prices low, to cut loans, to stop investments, to levy heavier taxes and to continuously increase prices. Noting that the Justice Party has not kept any of its promises, but that on the contrary it has exacerbated the wound, Erbakan added that in foreign policy the government has pursued a pro-Israeli attitude in accordance with Western wishes.

TRT correspondent Ahmet Cavusoglu reports Erbakan as saying that the government should try and dissuade the United States from its anti-Islamic stand. Erbakan said: The U.S. administration should change its attitude. It should renounce its policy of preventing the Islamic world from gaining consciousness and strength. It should adopt a policy of establishing good will and friendship relations under equal conditions with a strong Islamic world instead of trying to enslave the Islamic world through puppet administrations. Erbakan concluded by saying that the government was trying to transform the country into a slave dependent on the West through the EEC.

TURKES CITES NEED FOR NATIONAL UNITY, ACTIVE FOREIGN POLICY

TA271725 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1615 GMT 27 Apr 80

[Text] Ankara, 27 Apr (AA)--In such critical times when the entire Middle East may go up in flames and when Armenian terrorists increase their attacks against Turks and Turkish diplomats, Turkey needs national unity and togetherness more than ever, Nationalist Action Party leader Alpaslan Turkes said Sunday.

He said Turkey had to follow an active foreign policy in order to defuse the tension in the Middle East where Iraqi-Iranian hostilities and Iranian-American confrontation have increased the dangers of a new war. Turkes suggested that Turkey should mediate between Iraq and Iran, which are both friendly towards Turkey.

Turkes also said that the government drive to root out anarchy was enough, he said more should be done to purge the leftist elements whom he said have infiltrated the state machinery.

DEMIREL ASKS NAP TO SUPPORT JP CANDIDATE IN VOTING

TA281750 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 28 Apr 80

[Text] Justice Party leader and Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel said that he wants to give priority treatment to the presidential elections this week. Demirel held a meeting with Nationalist Action Party [NAP] leader Alpaslan Turkes today. The meeting was held in Turkes' office in the parliament. It began at 1600 and lasted 1 hour. The request for the meeting came from Demirel. In a statement after the meeting, Demirel said that everybody wanted the presidential elections to be concluded as soon as possible. He said that he wanted all the Justice Party senators and deputies to attend the voting this week. He added that the Justice Party general administrative councils would hold a joint meeting tomorrow and that the Senate and National Assembly groups would meet later. Demirel said: In other words, we want to give priority treatment to the presidential elections this week. Consequently I asked the honorable NAP leader, Alpaslan Turkes, to support the Justice Party candidate in the elections to be held this week. He agreed.

Demirel noted that they also discussed the problems facing Turkey. He said that he would meet National Salvation Party leader Erbakan tomorrow and that he would ask him to support the Justice Party candidate as well.

A reporter recalled that in an earlier statement Demirel had said: "Deputy from Istanbul Bilgic is the only, first and last candidate of the Justice Party." Demirel replied: "No, I have never said such a thing. In fact, it is not a question of party candidates when you elect a president. However, no candidates other than the honorable Bilgic emerged from the Justice Party. "Asked if another candidate would emerge from the Justice Party, Demirel said that he would not talk about the issue.

Asked whether he would meet RPP leader Ecevit in connection with the presidential elections, Demirel said: It is too early to talk about that. We are at a stage where we cannot see the distant future [of the presidential elections].

In a statement after the meeting, NAP leader Turkes said that Demirel had asked him to support the Justice Party candidate in the presidential elections. Turkes said that he told Demirel that the NAP would continue to support the Justice Party candidate. He added that they discussed the various problems of the country during their meeting. Replying to a question, Turkes said that they did not talk about specific names in connection with the presidential elections and that they did not discuss the changing of the Justice Party candidate.

[Text] The Ordu governor's office has announced that civil servants and students are forbidden to participate in any type of rally or demonstration to be held on May Day. Governor Resat Akkaya announced today that legal and disciplinary action would be taken against civil servants and students who disobeyed these orders. He added that the requests submitted for rallies and demonstrations to be held in Ordu and four of its districts had been accepted and that the necessary security measures were being taken.

Eskisehir Ban

TA281936 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 28 Apr 80

[Text] The governor's office has banned all types of May Day rallies and demonstrations in Eskisehir. An announcement by the governor's office states that the decision was made in light of the present conditions in the country and because of the tension that has been felt in the city following the rally and march for "the protection of democratic rights and freedoms" on 5 April where five people were killed and five wounded. The Sinop governor's office has also announced that civil servants, teachers and students are forbidden to participate in any type of rally or demonstration to be held on Thursday, 1 May.

Istanbul Statement

TA241906 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 24 Apr 80

[Excerpt] A statement by the 1st Army and the Istanbul Martial Law Command says that permission has not been given to DISK [Confederation of Revolutionary Worker Unions] to hold a May Day rally and march in Istanbul. The martial law command Communique No 42 on this subject says:

Even though several illegal organizations have been eliminated and thousands of militants have been detained for subversive acts of terror and violence through the efforts of all our security forces since the declaration of the martial law in our region 16 months ago, our citizens are still threatened daily by prospects of continuous and deadly hazards of murderous attacks and sabotage. As a result, the Istanbul Martial Law Command has felt it necessary to ban sensitive open air rallies and marches in Istanbul for some time to prevent their exploitation by anarchic groups. Under the circumstances, the martial law command has refused to grant the request by DISK to hold a May Day rally and march in Istanbul.

Izmir Communique

TA241907 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 24 Apr 80

[Excerpt] The Aegean Army and Izmir Martial Law Command has announced that applications to hold rallies and marches on May Day have been rejected in order to ensure public order and security in general. Communique No 7 of the command on the issue says:

The Council of Ministers decision to extend by 2 months--beginning 20 April 1980--the martial law being enforced in Izmir Province since 20 February was approved by the Turkish Grand National Assembly. The bans, prohibitions, restrictions, measures and orders issued in the previous six communiques are effective for the new 2-month martial law period. As announced in Communique No 2, the holding of any kind of open air rallies, demonstrations or marches as well as meetings in enclosed places is subject to the permission of the command. So far, no permission has been granted to hold any open air rallies--although permission has been granted for various meetings in closed premises--in a bid to ensure public order and security in general. Meanwhile, the application submitted by the Confederation of Revolutionary Worker Unions' [DISK] third regional representation expressing the wish to celebrate May Day--the official workers holiday--as the international unity, struggle and solidarity day of the world working class and requesting that concerned authorities be given the necessary orders to enable a May Day rally and march has been rejected. The application by the Turkish Revolutionary Worker Peasant Party [TIIKP] Izmir provincial administrative council for permission to hold a rally at a tea garden in Izmir's fairgrounds on May Day has also been rejected in line with past practice and in a bid to ensure public order and security in general in the Izmir Martial Law Region.

FOREIGN MINISTER: VANCE RESIGNATION U.S. 'INTERNAL PROBLEM'

ID290940 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 0700 GMT 29 Apr 80

[Excerpts] Reports to the effect that Portugal placed the Lages Base at the disposal of the U.S. troops involved in the Tehran hostages rescue bid are totally untrue. This was stated by Portuguese Foreign Minister Freitas do Amaral who is visiting Madrid to attend as a guest the meeting of the Andean Pact foreign ministers. Asked to comment on Cyrus Vance's resignation, Freitas do Amaral said that this was an internal problem of American politics.

PAPER EXAMINES ISSUES LEADING TO VANCE'S RESIGNATION

DW290855 Zurich NEUE ZUERCHER ZEITUNG in German 29 Apr 80 p 1

[Correspondent dispatch signed H.E.T.: "Resignation of Secretary of State Vance"]

[Text] Washington, 28 April--U.S. Secretary of State Vance has handed in his resignation. As early as Friday he had aides stress time and again that he had not been in Washington when the 11 April decision to dispatch a military commando team to Tehran for the liberation of the hostages was made. Vance now announces that he did not agree to the operation in Iran,but that he had postponed his resignation until its completion. He would have resigned even if it had been successful....

In reality Vance has seen a heap of shambles in place of his policy since the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan and the postponement of the SALT II ratification. Since As-Sadat's flight to Jerusalem, a course has been pursued in the Middle East which is not in harmony with Vance's views. When he took over his post in 1977 Vance wanted to prove that this office could be handled differently than had been done by his predecessor Kissinger. He promised to keep the public informed often by means of press conferences and to do less traveling than his predecessor. He failed to keep these promises. But while Kissinger always brought something home from his trips, even if it sometimes was more show than substance, Cyrus Vance earned the nickname of "No-Win Cy" for himself because his negotiations were seldom successful.

Vance had always rejected any kind of linkage and insisted that any problem be dealt with separately, just like a lawyer pleads his cases before different court levels. The fiasco of his policy is attributable to this purposeful renunciation of recognizing interrelations.

A year ago Vance announced already that he would not serve more than 4 years as secretary of state, even if Carter were reelected. He primarily cited health reasons, and he also earns more as a lawyer than he does as secretary of state. Last December, and again after the death blow of early March when Carter disavowed the U.S. vote for the security resolution against Irael a day later, Vance's resignation seemed inevitable to outsiders. Carter lost the New York primaries largely because of this vote in the United Nations.

Vance's followers in the State Department and also the press here, which personalizes all problems, do not attribute the resignation of the secretary of state so much to his failures as to antagonism with security adviser Brzezinski. During the past few months Vance had pushed his Under Secretary Warren Christopher into the foreground, obviously hoping that the latter would be appointed his successor.

U.S. RESCUE BID ASSESSED IN FRENCH, BELGIAN, DUTCH MEDIA

ID191633 [Editorial Report] Major Paris dailies have mixed reaction to the abortive U.S. attempt to rescue the Tehran embassy hostages. Whereas LE MONDE appears to highlight the negative aspects of the affair--characterizing it as "badly organized;" and claiming that European leaders feel "irritation" at President Carter's action--LE FIGARO and FRANCE-SOIR prefer to dwell on the collective responsibility of Europe and America in facing up to the threats confronting them.

Issues of LE MONDE, FRANCE-SOIR and LE FIGARO have carried extensive reportage and comment on the rescue attempt. All papers report on President Carter's 25 April statement and the subsequent statements made by Defense Secretary Harold Brown and National Security Adviser Brzezinski, as well as reporting on general U.S. reaction, including reaction from the hostages' families. In dispatches from Tehran (LE MONDE 27-28 April 1, 3 and 29 April pages 1, 4) J.-M. Durand-Souffland reports comments on the operation by Imam Khomeyni, President Bani-Sadr, Foreign Minister Qotbzadeh and Ayatollah Khalkhali. LE MONDE devotes its frontpage editorials on 26-20 April to the repercussions of the rescue attempt, criticizing it as "badly organized, not to say improvised" and commenting that "U.S. credibility" in the world will be seriously undermined. The editorialist also comments that "if Mr Carter's faux pas rouses the Europeans, makes them aware of their weakness and convinces them that their fate lies primarily in their hands, something good will have come of this misfortunte." Commenting on Mr Vance's resignation, LE MONDE's editorialist (29 April) says his decision reflects the recent change in U.S. foreign policy and leaves Brzezinski free "to assert the all-embracing activist view he ha of East-West rivalry."

Jacques Amalric (LE MONDE 27-28 April page 2) and Maurice Delarue (29 April pages 1, 5) both comment that the European leaders feel "irritation" and that they have been tricked by Carter's action, but are not launching into public criticism for the sake of Atlantic solidarity.

The need for such solidarity is highlighted by Benoit Rayski in two editorials (FRANCE-SOIR 27-28 April pages 1-2 and 29 April pages 1, 3), and he blames Europe for not urging Carter to take tough action earlier.

On 26 April LE FIGARO reports under banner headlines on pp 1-2 reactions to the event in Washington, Moscow and Israel, emphasizing the support received by President Carter in the United States, both among politicians and the population, Soviet "jubilation" and Israel's "consternation." In a leading article on pages 1-2 Max Clos deplores the "negative outcome" of the venture but writes that President Carter was right to make the attempt and has acted like a "man of honor." Carter must go on fighting and prepari a revenge but he cannot afford another setback," Clos concludes. Finally, the entire back page of this issue is devoted to detailed reports on the operation itself by Alain Buhler and Pierre Darcourt.

LE FIGARO 28 April carries on pages 1-2 a commentary by Jacques Jacquet-Francillon under the heading "Mission Impossible" in which he forcefully urges West European countries to rally around the United States in its hour of need, arguing that apart from the fact that Europe owes America a debt of gratitude, it badly needs U.S. support if it wants to "survive." The paper also carries further reports on the operation and the criticisms of it voiced in Washinton and also a dispatch from Warsaw by Bernard Margueritte in which he emphasizes Polish opinion's apparently unanimous support for President Carter and the "moderate" attitude adopted by the authorities. In addition, LE FIGARO reports on President Giscard d'Estaing's statement in Luxembourg in which he pledged European support for the United States. Finally, in an article on "The Political Exploitation of the Crisis" in Iran published on page 2, Paul-Marie de la Gorce asserts that the "fundamentalists" are taking advantage of the situation to reduce Bani-Sadr's authority and the "pressures" exerted by leftist elements and also to win "nonaligned countries'" support against Washington.

Belgium

In addition to general reports on the mission and on statements by members of the U.S. administration, LE SOIR 27-28 April carries on page 3 an unattributed commentary on the repercussions of the mission which will "worsen the crisis of confidence between Washington and its allies" and prompt a "hardening of the Muslim world's attitude toward the United States." In dispatches from Washington Jean Pochet comments that the abortive mission is the "worse failure since the Bay of Pigs" and says that the general reaction in Washington is that "Carter is going bananas."

Netherlands

Copies of NRC HANDELSBLAD received to date carry reports on official U.S. Government statements on the abortive mission and reaction in Tehran to the U.S. action. NRC HANDELSBLAD's editorialist (26 April page 7) comments that it is too early to draw clear conclusions from the operation since all the facts are not yet known, but comments that it "could be fatal for the entire world" if a gang of terrorists is able to "keep a superpower in the air" and concludes that one "hopeful sign" is that the fiercest "hawks" now seem to have "more understanding of the dangers of a tough line."

UN LEBANON PEACEKEEPING FORCE MEMBERS TO MEET IN DUBLIN

ID281130 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1053 GMT 28 Apr 80

[By Chris Parkin, PA staff reporter in Dublin]

[Text] Foreign ministers of all 10 countries involved in the United Nations' Lebanon peacekeeping operation will meet in Dublin on Friday.

Ireland requested the talks a week ago following the deaths of three of its soldiers on UN duty. The Irish, anxious about support given UN troops by governments involved in the Lebanese conflict, want to review conditions under which the UN force works. They have also called for a pledge of total backing for the peace keepers from all the UN member states.

Although no physical attacks on Irish UN troops have been reported for more than a week, a diplomatic war of words between Ireland and Israel has intensified.

Yesterday Israeli Premier Menahem Begin, speaking on Irish radio, described Ireland's recent recognition of the Palestine Liberation Organisation as "an act of hostility." And on the same programme the leader of the Lebanese Christian militia, Maj Saad Haddad threatened "suicide action" against UN soldiers.

Friday's ministerial meeting is expected to rubber stamp the demands for more meaningful support as all 10 countries' participants are understood to have signalled endorsement of the Irish plans.

Foreign ministers from France, Italy, the Netherlands, Norway, Nepal, Senegal, Fiji, Ghana and Nigeria will travel to Dublin for the conference.

IPU CONCLUDES WITH ATTACK ON AFGHANISTAN INVASION

ID290729 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 14 Apr 80 p 5

[Unattributed report: "Interparliamentary Union: Condemnation of Soviet Union Stronger Than at United Nations"]

[Excerpts] The resolution of the Interparliamentary Union [IPU] Council session on the Afghanistan invasion represents a stronger condemnation of the Soviet Union than the UN resolution earlier this year, IPU General Secretary Pio-Carlo Terenzio stated this at his press conference following Saturday's concluding meeting of the IPU spring sessions. The resolution was adopted by 88 votes to 25, with 8 abstentions.

Another resolution moved by the United States condemns the taking of hostages, and events in Iran and Colombia are central to its text.

Romania stressed once again that it was not taking part in the voting--an attitude which in itself is a protest.

The IPU Council adopted a strongly-worded resolution which condemns the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan and at the same time encourages the national assemblies of individual countries to put pressure on their respective governments to bring about the withdrawal of foreign troops from Afghanistan. Earlier the IPU Political Committee adopted a corresponding resolution.

Several observers pointed out that the IPU meeting had a different outcome from the vote in the UN General Assembly in January, when 104 countries condemned the Soviet Union, while 18 countries voted against the resolution. But several of the IPU delegations have two votes, and some countries--Cyprus and Greece, for example--split their vote.

A draft resolution on detente and disarmament was also prepared at this meeting and will be discussed at the next UPI meeting in East Berlin in the fall. Several other resolutions will come up at the East Berlin meeting.

All 35 countries which took part in the conference on security and cooperation in Europe will meet in Brussels in mid-May to thoroughly discuss all aspects of the implementation of the Helsinki Final Act. This is in preparation for the followup meeting in Madrid in November.

On the agenda in Berlin will also be the situation in the Middle East, the Palestinian problem and the security of the Indian Ocean and the Arabian Gulf.

NINE WILL NOT PUBLICLY REPROACH CARTER ON HOSTAGE ISSUE

LD291241 Paris LE MONDE in French 29 Apr 80 pp 1,5

[Maurice Delarue article: "The Nine Refuse To Express Official Criticism of Mr Carter"]

[Text] Luxembourg (EC)--On the afternoon of this Monday, 28 April, the European Council was to publish a statement on major international problems--Iran, Afghanistan, the Middle East--whose main aim is to reaffirm the European Nine's solidarity with the United States in the hostage affair and its intention to apply sanctions against Iran unless they are released.

As soon as he arrived in Luxembourg on Sunday, Mr Giscard d'Estaing said: "France is prepared to pursue its efforts and, I think the Community is too, in solidarity with the United States to try and obtain the release of the hostages being held in violation of human rights and international law." After dinner on Sunday evening during which the government chiefs discussed international problems, Belgian Foreign Minister Simonet said: "It is absolutely vital to clearly maintain our solidarity with the United States on the hostage affair."

The Nine will therefore reaffirm the intention which their foreign ministers expressed last Monday to decide at their next meeting in Naples on 17 May to implement sanctions against Iran if "decisive progress" leading to the release of the hostages has not been made by then. These measures should be "identical" for each of the Nine, Mr Simonet stressed, and should be taken after consultation with Washington. Mr Cossiga, Italian Government chief and current president of the EC Council, will discuss this affair with Mr Carter.

However, contrary to the rumors which have been circulating, there seems no likelihood of an Atlantic Council summit meeting being held. However, it would be surprising if, at the summit of the seven biggest Western industrial nations which will be held in Venice in June and will be mainly devoted to economic problems, the hostage affair were not raised unless it has changed radically by then.

Officially, therefore, the Nine still do not despair of finding a political solution with the Tehran government, although such prospects have been seriously jeopardized since the abortive U.S. raid. Indeed, the Nine think the international situation is too serious to further weaken the Atlantic Alliance. Therefore, as the European Nine, they will not publicly reproach Mr Carter for deceiving them and launching a military operation when he had suggested that he would not do so if the U.S. allies gave concrete evidence of their solidarity. The U.S. President's behavior is no less deeply felt and harshly judged by the Nine. However, they will all probably express their feelings to him by the most discreet diplomatic channels.

In any case, by maintaining their plan for adopting serious sanctions, the Nine have shown that they are logical. They have always denied yielding to any American pressures, and they have condemned seizures of hostages, which are especially unacceptable because diplomats enjoying immunity have fallen victim to them and because they violate international law. They would reverse their decision if they were now to change their stance on the pretext that an American raid, undertaken with military means but for humanitarian ends, has lamentably failed.

As far as Afghanistan is concerned, it does not seem that the Nine have expressed any new views on the problem but they believe that this matter is the most serious and the most dangerous for the future.

Mr Giscard d'Estaing and Mr François-Poncet have informed their colleagues of their talks with Gromyko, which have been assessed by all as tougher than ever and opening no prospects for detente. With respect to this matter, some European leaders have stated their intention of remaining in close consultations with the United States. As we know, the foreign and defense ministers of countries "integrated" in the Atlantic organization (this excludes France) are to meet in Brussels in mid-May to discuss Afghanistan. It remains to be seen whether Mr Vance's resignation will not lead to a change in this timetable.

Finally, on the Middle East, the Nine are restating a position which, without being new, is nevertheless appreciably different from that of the United States since the Europeans recall their belief in a balanced Middle East solution which respects the Palestinians' rights and which also recalls Israel's right to live in peace. This position is no different from the one expressed by President Giscard d'Estaing in Amman. Moreover, the Nine intend to take an initiative in June, as the president of the republic suggested during his Middle East trip, after the date set by the Camp David accords for a solution on the West Bank and Gaza by way of Egyptian-Israeli bilateral talks. The Nine's position appears to have sufficient shades of interpretation so that these new ideas, aiming essentially at settling the Palestinian problem, may be seen as a contribution capable of fueling the Egyptian-Israeli dialogue or as situated outside this dialogue the moment that its failure is established. The Nine's ideas will be formulated at the next European Council in Venice in June.

UK CORRESPONDENT REPORTS ON EEC BUDGET STALEMATE

LD291017 London DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 29 Apr 80 p 1

[Alan Osborn dispatch: "EEC Budget Stalemate"]

[Text] Luxembourg--The Common Market summit aimed at solving the problem of Britain's EEC contributions, broke up in basic disagreement late last night. The repercussions for Britain's relations with the rest of the European Community and for the Community's international standing could be profound.

Mrs Thatcher stunned other member nations by rejecting an offer to cut Britain's EEC payments by 800 million pounds sterling in 1980. She said she had not been given firm enough assurances about subsequent years.

In a spectacular game of international poker at the summit in Luxembourg, the prime minister throughout the day rejected a string of progressively higher offers for cutting Britain's net contribution to the EEC budget.

Her final refusal prevented agreement on a cut which would bring the estimated bill for 1980 down from about 1,100 million pounds sterling to about 330 million pounds sterling.

The official French spokesman said that President Giscard d'Estaing felt he had "gone to the limits of generosity" to satisfy Mrs Thatcher.

"Britain is showing a stubborness that is no longer reasonable," he said.

The German spokesman said: "She has been offered more than twice as much as she was offered at the Dublin summit. The chancellor (Herr Schmidt) has stuck his neck out half a metre."

A reduction of 800 million pounds sterling in the EEC bill this year--practically "three-quarters of a loaf" in terms of Mrs Thatcher's original demand--could be presented as something of a triumph by her government, except for the doubts that surround later years.

The original scheme presented yesterday, by Herr Schmidt, was for a one-year adjustment to be followed by a restructuring of the budget mechanism to bring about a much fairer balance of contributions.

This was not good enough for Britain, and Mrs Thatcher said she wanted any agreement to last for six years. Although British officials did not admit it directly, it was largely accepted that to achieve this the government was ready to cave in on farm prices and agree to increases this year.

But no other countries were ready to see a limit on Britain's payments running as far into the future as six years.

At this stage the budget question was dropped and heads of government went on to consider the farm price settlement. British officials stressed there would be no agreement by the government on the prices until the budget problem was solved.

Mrs. Thatcher has insisted all along that any solution on the budget should be permanent. Her great fear is that the problem will recur in a few year's time.

Other countries argue that for Britain against higher costs caused by inflation or expansion of programmes. They say it could make Britain indifferent to moves to economise on the budget.

There is of course a further powerful reason for French and German opposition. They would have to bear the brunt of financing any concessions to Britain.

Italy and Ireland, the two poorest member countries, are spared the need to contribute to a solution of the British problem. Germany would have to shoulder roughly half the cost and France almost a third.

What yesterday's extraordinary events demonstrated, however, was how far France and other EEC countries are ready to go in meeting Mrs Thatcher's demands when their own special interests are at risk. In this bargaining Britain's greatest asset is its right of veto over the annual farm price package.

If Mrs Thatcher simply says no to any rise in EEC farm prices this year, the French and other governments will come under increasing pressure from their farmers.

Mr Walker, the agriculture minister, has been alone in pressing for a price freeze for products in surplus--milk, sugar and wine. His tough resistance has become Mrs Thatcher's best bargaining point though it was felt inevitable last night that she would have to yield it if she was to get her way on the budget.

In agreeing to higher farm prices--and 5 percent has been seen as the likely increase--Mrs Thatcher would be gambling that a triumph on the budget would outweigh the domestic political consequences of an immediate but probably moderate increase in the cost of living. A 5 per cent increase would put about 1p in the pound on to food prices in Britain.

STARIBACHER TO VISIT HUNGARY AT END OF MAY

AU291125 Vienna ARBEITER-ZEITUNG in German 29 Apr 80 p 6

[Unattributed report: "Coal Power Plant: Staribacher to Hungary for Talks on Details"]

[Summary] At Trade Minister Staribacher's economic talks last weekend with his Hungarian counterpart within the framework of the working talks between Chancellor Kreisky and Hungarian Premier Gyorgy Lazar, far-reaching agreement was achieved on the construction of a coal power plant in southern Burgenland, close to the Hungarian border. This power plant will have a capacity of twice 300 megawatts [zweimal 300 MW]. The brown coal required for it will be transported across the border from the mines in Torony. While the technical details have already been fixed--this will be the first time for a conveyor belt system to operate across the border--the question of coal prices and of environmental protection on the Austrian side are still unresolved. Only when these questions have been clarified will the exact location of the coal power plant be determined. Minister Staribacher will visit Hungary at the end of May for talks on the details of the project. They will include a loan in the amount of $170 million desired by the Hungarian side. Among the further topics to be discussed during Staribacher's visit will be an easing of border crossing procedures for border zone residents, the modernization of the Hungarian telephone system and the project for a 750-kilovolt transit power line for power deliveries from the USSR to Austria through Hungarian territory.

NUSSBAUMER REVIEWS MOSCOW TALKS ON JOINT VENTURES

AU281400 Vienna WIENER ZEITUNG in German 28 Apr 80 p 3

[Summary] At a Vienna press conference on 25 April State Secretary Adolf Nussbaumer reviewed his 21-24 April Moscow talks which dealt with Austrian-USSR joint ventures in third countries, expansion of bilateral economic relations, Soviet raw material and energy deliveries and East-West cooperation in the energy sector. The visit was made at the invitation of the Soviet State Committee for Foreign Economic Relations. Nussbaumer brought with him a list of Soviet cooperation projects providing for Austrian deliveries worth 8 billion schillings. According to Nussbaumer, he discussed with Committee Chairman Skachkov Austrian subcontractor deliveries for projects in Libya, Algeria, India, Yugoslavia, Pakistan, Bulgaria, Poland and Colombia, in the fields of heavy machine building, electrical engineering, metallurgical and chemical plant construction, railroad construction and steel construction. Moreover, he had talks with the chairman of the State Committee for Science and Technology, Gvishiani, on new developments in the medical apparatus construction, electrical engineering, power industry and automotive industry sector. The Soviet side is also interested in the joint development of a diesel engine, or Austrian subcontractor deliveries of parts for such an engine, as well as in the further development of gasoline motors. "As the state secretary told the reporters, the margin between production of raw materials and energy and the growing domestic requirements in the USSR is shrinking. Nevertheless we had been assured that Austria's wishes in this field would be considered to the greatest extent possible, he said." According to Nussbaumer, the Soviet side is also interested in continuing the negotiations on an international power link [between the CEMA and the Austrian power grids] that would also include Italy and Switzerland.

VOLKSSTIMME Comment on Trip

AU281402 Vienna VOLKSSTIMME in German 26 Apr 80 p 2

[Summary] State Secretary Nussbaumer returned from Moscow with a list of 8 billion schillings worth of possible Soviet orders for Austrian enterprises regarding joint venture projects in third countries.

"Austria is the first capitalist country with which such a cooperation--and moreover on such a large scale and involving such a wide range of products--is to be implemented. At a press conference Nussbaumer underscored the significance of such multifaceted cooperation with the Soviet Union, which will be to the economic benefit of both countries. The state secretary also stressed the political aspects of this agreement, aspects to which increased attention must be paid particularly now at a time of increased tensions. It is necessary to demonstrate that confidence-preserving economic measures can only function on the basis of detente, so that detente is in the eminent interest of all concerned. The fact that this new type of cooperation has been started with Austria, according to Nussbaumer, is certainly due to our country's neutral status, to the country's efforts to maintain good relations with all countries."

Nussbaumer said that it is now up to the firms to which the concrete offers have been made to utilize the offered opportunity and to implement the projects. He added that there is not much time since the projects must be included in the 1981-85 5-year plan of the USSR. He noted that small and medium-size enterprises will also have good opportunities because the USSR is interested in specialized products manufactured in small series. For the first time technical know-how is to be exchanged, for example in the medical technology sector. "Certain difficulties that recently occurred in connection with the Korneuburg shipyard have been settled so that there should no longer be any obstacles to the followup orders hoped for by the company. Moreover, the Soviet Union has declared its readiness to supply additional energy and raw material quotas to Austria, to the extent which the Austrian side makes deliveries serving the rationalization and production increase of the enterprises in the USSR."

NATURAL GAS NEARLY EXHAUSTED, PRODUCTION CUT

AU291134 Vienna DIE PRESSE in German 29 Apr 80 p 7

[Special DIE PRESSE report: "Natural Gas Deposits Largely Exhausted, Domestic Production Drastically Cut"]

[Summary] Vienna (KH/WS)--In view of the expected Iranian natural gas deliveries to Austria scheduled to start next year, the Austrian Oil Administration [OEMV] has excessively exploited the domestic deposits. Now it is necessary to drastically cut domestic production--to less than one half by 1985. It is hoped that this cut can be compensated for by North Sea gas, the deliveries of which will start this year via the just completed WAG [West-Austria Gas] pipeline. Moreover, it is planned to expand the gas storage capacity. This year, the OEMV will invest a total of 3.6 billion schillings, about 40 percent of that amount will be invested in production and one-third in processing.

About 5.5 billion cubic meters of natural gas this year will be available for domestic consumption including 3 billion cubic meters from the USSR, 400 million cubic meters of North Sea gas, and 1.8 billion cubic meters from domestic production. The OEMV plans to expand its natural gas storage capacity from the current 1 billion cubic meters to 1.3 billion cubic meters. Domestic production will decline from 1.8 billion cubic meters at present to about 800 million cubic meters in 1985, of which the OEMV will only supply 300 million cubic meters while the remainder will come from the Upper Austrian RAG [Rohoel-Aufsuchungs-Ges, M.B.H.] company.

This year's oil imports of the OEMV will total 6 million tons, including 2 million tons from Iraq. Since the agreement with Saudi Arabia on the supply of 1.7 million tons of oil annually was only signed at the end of February, this year only about 1.4 million tons will be imported from that country, but these imports will allow the OEMV to do without expensive oil purchases on the spot market. This year the USSR will supply 1.4 million tons of oil, Libya 550,000 tons and Algeria 400,000 tons. The average oil import price for the OEMV will be $31.50 per barrel, as against $25 last year.

LEVESQUE REJECTS PARLIAMENT SESSIONS IN MONTREAL

LD300530 Montreal in English to Europe 2100 GMT 29 Apr 80

[Text] Referendum Quebec--Premier Levesque slammed the idea of sending Parliament to Montreal for a few days before the referendum. He considers it a slap in the face for Quebeckers, and the Quebec leader also says it is ridiculous for Claude Ryan to suggest Canada would join the United States if Quebec separates. (Stephen Boseaneu) has more on the story: While he is conducting his referendum campaign, persuading people to vote yes, Rene Levesque spends a considerable amount of his time fighting a rearguard action against the numerous federal spokesmen who [word indistinct] make some statement or other that he must denounce. The latest is the suggestion to have the Canadian Parliament hold some of its sittings in Montreal as a sign of affection for Quebeckers.

[Begin Levesque recording] That kind of affection is like a slap in the face. Proposing that they come with all the trappings of a federal government and federal Parliament to try and impress the Quebeckers into a no vote--you call that affection? I call that a ploy, and a ploy based on Parliament is something curious in a democracy. [end recording]

Parliament used to be in Montreal but it was eventually moved to Ottawa when it was (?brought down) during protest over the Act of Union of 1840. Mr Levesque also commented on Claude Ryan's claim that if Quebec separates, Canada would be annexed by the United States within two generations.

[Begin Levesque recording] I know Mr Ryan has counsellors high up but I don't think he has revelations about what happens in 2025. Completely ridiculous. [end recording]

Mr Levesque also muses the statement by the federal spokesman (?about his) advantage. During speeches, he tells his audience about the latest proposals from the other side and with the right timing and delivery he sometimes manages to get a good laugh from all of them.

RYAN 'NO' VOTE CAMPAIGN CONTINUES IN MONTREAL

LD300532 Montreal in English to Europe 2100 GMT 29 Apr 80

[Excerpts] Claude Ryan, the leader of the "no" forces, was campaigning today in one of his strongholds, the West Island area of Montreal. As Patrick Brown reports, this region has a very high proportion of English-speaking Quebeckers and their votes are expected to be largely for the no side:

This is one of the strongest areas of the province for the "no" side. The large English-speaking population is sure of the strong "no" vote on May 20th. Mr Ryan is making his usual round of shopping centers, public meetings and factories, including ironically the German [word indistinct] field plant, owned in part by the family of the former Liberal member for (?Westland), Kevin German, the most prominent Anglophobe supporting the "yes" side. Last night, in a free-time broadcast on a private French television network, Mr Ryan made a suggestion that may haunt him for the rest of the campaign. Speaking about overlapping of federal and provincial programs, he said he sees no objection to a joint federal-provincial agency to raise all taxes in the provinces and nationally. The "yes" campaigners are sure to exploit this, claiming that Mr Ryan envisages the disappearance of the Quebec Revenue Department, in other words, handing over more power to Ottawa. Mr Ryan was unwilling to expand on his remarks.

Tomorrow, the premier of Ontario, Bill Davis, joins up with the "no" forces with a speech to the Montreal Board of Trade.

DEFENSE MINISTER ON VANCE RESIGNATION, APN CHARGES

DW300742 Cologne DEUTSCHE WELLE in German to Europe 1730 GMT 29 Apr 80

[Manfred Mueller-Witte interview with Federal Defense Minister Hans Apel, presumably in Bonn; date not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] Minister Apel, does the resignation of U.S. Secretary of State Vance constitute an additional burden for NATO?

[Answer] I think we should not intrude in internal American affairs, all the more so since policies are always the policies of a Cabinet or of the U.S. President. What seems to be important to me is that, especially in these days, we are intensifying mutual consultations, talks with one another, to a point where we know from each other what we want politically. Thus, a common military as well as a political will can form which should make it plan that the use of military means may well be dangerous in this highly explosive period. Therefore, diplomacy, politics, trade boycott are the measures most likely to offer a chance for liberating the hostages alive.

[Question] The resignation of the U.S. secretary of state is being assessed as the result of the controversy between two different foreign policy lines--a pragmatic line and a harder line--and as the result of a clash between doves and hawks. Would you tend to agree, Mr Minister?

[Answer] I know all the individuals in the United States without exception. I had discussions and talks with them during the years in which I have been in my current office. Actually there are no fundamentally different positions. It would be strange indeed if absolutely different positions became discernible in a government, if you want to put it this way. I think the U.S. secretary of state has drawn a conclusion for himself and justified it, and we Europeans ought to refrain from commenting on it.

[Question] The Soviet news agency, APN, has just launched an unusually strong attack on the Federal Republic of Germany. Simultaneously there is still the Moscow invitation of Soviet party and government chief Leonid Brezhnev on the table. Do you think that two different forces are at work there--detente politicians and adversaries of detente?

[Answer] I see primarily a massive action, an attack against the Federal Republic of Germany and its policy, an argumentation that has nothing at all in common with the reality of our policy. It tries to create a distorted picture which may be intentional. It may be an attempt to test how strongly we actually stand in the Western alliance. But this test is over because we stand firmly in the Western alliance. We fully support all NATO decisions, including those of December last year. It remains to be seen whether and to what extent this will have an effect on any visit or travel plans. You understand that I cannot comment on that.

[Question] But in saying this are you hinting at a visit by the federal chancellor to Moscow, possibly this summer?

[Answer] You know yourself that the federal chancellor has received an invitation. We must discuss this with our Western Allies and also with the Soviet Union. Naturally such a visit can take place only in a climate of mutual understanding and with prospects of success. Therefore we will have to watch the coming days and weeks, last but not least with regard to the question of how the tone in Eastern Europe will change and develop. I think that no side has the right at present to heat up the climate. We all have the commitment to calm things down, to begin talks with each other and not to make the worst mutual insinuations.

HANDELSBLATT: VANCE DEPARTURE LEAVES 'POLITICAL SHAMBLES'

DW291006 Duesseldorf HANDELSBLATT in German 29 Apr 80 p 2

[Klaus C. Engelen dispatch from Washington: "Political Shambles"]

[Text] Secretary of State Cyrus Vance, the only top official of the Carter administration who for months has opposed military action for liberation of the U.S. hostages in the Tehran embassy, surprisingly announced his resignation Sunday.

Within a few days the resignation of the highly respected State Department chief has been the second warning shot across the bow of the U.S. head of state--with increasing dangers to the entire Western convoy. Following the spectacular resignation of the 63-year-old Wall Street lawyer--a "team man"--the abortive rescue mission of last Thursday appears to be even more controversial than before. President Carter, who is struggling for reelection, will have to pay for the ostentatious resignation of his secretary of state with an erosion of the broad sympathy and support which the U.S. people at first held for him and his administration after the debacle in the Iranian desert.

Paradoxically, crisis veteran Vance quit on the very Sunday on which he had scored a personal diplomatic success in Luxembourg with the European Council's decision on sanctions, after months of tenacious attempts at persuasion and negotiation. The unraveling of the Iranian knot with the instruments of careful diplomacy was the marching route in the Iranian crisis preferred by Vance and the Western alliance partners of the United States. It is hardly surprising that the chief of the State Department, who proceeded so carefully, clashed with President Carter's security adviser Zbigniew Brzezinski, who is inclined to intervene. For Vance, the limit of acceptance was reached after President Carter said "yes" to a very risky salvage operation.

The leadership change in the U.S. State Department could hardly have come at a more unfavorable moment. The spectacular failure has sufficiently battered the belief in the predictability and competence of the American leadership, and the voluntary resignation of Vance will further drastically reduce the remaining good will enjoyed by this U.S. Government. On the home front, Vance's leaving will prompt Congress to stage an even sharper investigation of the unsuccessful salvage action as well as the remaining U.S. options for freeing the hostages. The rivals for the presidency will now certainly castigate Carter's "leadership chaos" in foreign and military policies more unceremoniously.

The new bad news from Washington creates further puzzles for America's partners, deepening the existing feeling of uneasiness with regard to Carter and his policy--at a time when Washington demands sharper sanctions and evidence of solidarity from the Western allies. It is even more alarming that the resignation of the Washington chief diplomat invites the Iranians and the Soviets to stage even more dangerous challenges and humiliations. Whoever is Carter's second secretary of state--his Deputy Warren S. Christopher would be the logical selection--will be busy during the rest of Carter's term in office with picking up the political rubble at home and abroad.

COMMENTATOR VIEWS EC SUMMIT, VANCE RESIGNATION

DW290940 Munich SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG in German 29 Apr 80 p 4

[Dieter Schroeder editorial: "The Europeans Side With Carter"]

[Text] No world crisis can be so serious as to keep the agrarian ministers of the European Community from quickly agreeing on the annual increase of agrarian prices.

While by their standards the government chiefs of the Nine agreed comparatively quickly on their approach to the threatening crises in Afghanistan, Iran and the Middle East, the agricultural ministers organized the usual horse trading about milk and butter prices. Even in hard times the leadership bodies of the Community work extremely slowly. The chiefs decide on the "guidelines" which then must be worked out by the department ministers. It will be the same this time also so that the final decision on the British contribution can be made only at the next meeting of the Council in mid-June.

The outlines of the "package," however, are already visible and are in accordance with the usual practice of the Community. In a surprising volt President Giscard d'Estaing stated his preparedness to freeze British payments for 3 years at half the amount of 1979 which was considered unfair by the British. As a concession in return, he expects a doubling of the amount suggested by the Commission for agricultural prices. That would do justice to the European principles which see the British demand that payments to and drawings from the Community budget must be balanced as contradicting the rules. But simultaneously, however, the wish of the president is also being considered, who wants to please the French peasants with small gifts in an election year. Mrs Thatcher can celebrate a victory which, in the end, will turn out to be a pyrrhic victory. She will get more than the others wanted to give her at the last Dublin summit, but via higher agrarian prices she will have to accept burdens which she actually wanted to avoid. And Helmut Schmidt can consider himself the originator of the compromise he was aiming for, even at a somewhat higher price than expected, because the hole in the cashbox of the European Community must be filled mainly by Bonn.

In the end, nobody is really content with the solution but the Community has not merely demonstrated its ability to survive, at least to the next crisis, but also the fact that it has remained able to act in a world crisis. Naturally the Nine will need time to negotiate on their joint foreign policy statements and actions according to the same procedure which is aimed at offsetting individual interests. This time the government chiefs acted quickly, but only because the foreign ministers had already formulated the most important problems.

It was not hard for them to take Carter's side after the abortive attempt to rescue the hostages. Granted, they are bound to feel disavowed by the President because the sanctions by the EC against Iran had been adopted last week in the hope that Washington could be prevented from taking military action. Yet a waiver of the punitive measures would be bound to burden the alliance intolerably and drive Carter further into unpredictable adventures.

If any extra proof were needed to show the danger of an isolation of Carter, then it has been supplied by the resignation of Secretary of State Vance. The quitting by this pragmatic politician who enjoys the esteem of the Allies will burden the alliance considerably. At the same time, the idea cannot but alarm us that the President will now be predominantly left to the advice of his security adviser Brzezinski. The idea of a meeting between Carter and the most important European Allies, an idea obviously introduced into the debate in Luxembourg by the British, therefore, does have something to it. It would be urgently necessary for the alliance to find a common strategy in view of the crises in Iran and Afghanistan.

The latest experiences, however, are quite depressing for the chances of success of such a venture. Not only does a wide gap separate the assessment of the situation and the interests. The surprising rescue operation by the Americans also showed that it is very hard to take Carter into the middle. Considering this lack of common interest and consultation, even a summit meeting might end with a situation in which Carter feels he has blank checks and that the Europeans should keep still albeit bear the responsibility when he cashes them in. The call for help to UN Secretary General Waldheim cannot be a substitute for common strategy.

The heads of government did not come up with anything new concerning Afghanistan. The demand for the pullout of the Soviet troops and the reference to guaranteed nonalignment as a potential solution have already become a routine communique, though they are unimportant in view of the Soviet "nyet". What seems to be more sensible is the announcement of a new Middle East initiative. Only if Europeans and Americans push the peace process in the Middle East can they hope to gain more support in the Islamic world for their demands on Tehran and Moscow--and gain a few new friends in the endangered Middle East region. But this has probably been thought out without Prime Minister Begin.

PAPERS COMMENT ON RESULTS OF LUXEMBOURG EC SUMMIT

DW291022 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0505 GMT 29 Apr 80

[Press review on the Luxembourg meeting of the EC heads of state]

[Text] Essen's NEUE RUHR-ZEITUNG writes: The news from Luxembourg could not be worse. Britain's iron lady, Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher, caused the summit to fail. What was involved was money, her money, as the British lady is used to noting at conferences. It is generally known that this is where friendship ceases, and thus Maggie Thatcher demonstrated hardness. At this point we might proceed to business as usual, were it not for the fact that, in the meantime, greater things than 1 or 2 billion more or less from the British coffers for the common EC fund have been at stake. What is involved, after all, is that in a worldwide crisis situation Europe can appear as a political entity which is taken seriously where it counts: in Washington and in Moscow, for example. In Iran, in Afghanistan, in the Middle East, smouldering fires threaten to spread into area conflagrations while in Luxembourg a lady government chief degrades for good this Western Europe into a desolate bunch out of pure national egoism, says NEUE RUHR-ZEITUNG of Essen.

STUTTGARTER NACHRICHTEN adds: At the EC summit in Luxembourg the heads of state and government of the nine EC states found themselves facing the compulsion to assume leadership tasks again in the international field. But the road toward a Europe capable of acting politically, that is to say, toward a unified Europe, is still cluttered with rocks. So far the nine chiefs have failed to jump the hurdles of internal EC financing problems--but they need to overcome far higher obstacles. What matters above all in the EC is to create political cohesion which will make it possible for Western Europe to assume leadership tasks in the Western world. It will take time for the stock-taking to bear fruit, because the process is only beginning.

APN BACKS OFF ON CRITICISM OF FRG MILITARY POLICY

FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU CRITICIZES APN ATTACK

DW290953 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU in German 29 Apr 80 p 3

[Article signed hhg: "A Blow With the Club"]

[Text] Exactly 2 years ago, when Brezhnev visited Bonn, the Soviet and German discussion partners agreed that parity ought to exist in all arms systems, thus also including the so-called medium-range missiles.

The federal chancellor made it clear to his guest how important this balance is for the Federal Government. The Soviet Government, therefore, should have known that there would be consequences if it forgot this principle.

Moscow obviously never took that promise seriously, at least it did not adhere to it in the past 2 years. The reaction had to come. One can certainly quarrel about whether NATO's decision to close the arms gap, made late last year, was the only possible and the best answer. But in any case the Soviets cannot pretend that they have been surprised by a Federal Government that has suddenly become wild.

The furious attack by the news agency APN against the "military ambitions" of the Federal Republic as a danger for the whole world is, therefore, not less alarming. It can be an attempt to spread fear and horror in the Federal Republic and to seek revenge for the recommendation of the Federal Government in connection with the Olympics, but it can also be the beginning of a campaign which would end the relative European calm. Maybe the Soviet leadership considers its relations with the United States as being so poor already that it does not believe it can keep this conflict regionally limited any more. If the Soviet Union were to follow such an assessment of the situation, considering 10 years of detente in Europe no longer worth any special effort, it could indeed inflict immense damage on this continent, but at least as much also on itself.

DIE WELT: APN THREATS 'NO SURPRISE'

[Enno von Loewenstein commentary: "War of Nerves"]

[Text] The times of the carrot are over. Moscow is now grabbing the whip. The threat that the area of the Federal Republic could be considered a target for a "counterstrike" does not come as a surprise. The word "counterstrike" is a euphemism; the Soviet Union knows very well that an attack will never originate against it from German soil.

It characterizes their style that the threat was voiced immediately after the invitation to Schmidt. The Soviets do not speak so arrogantly to the Americans, the British or the French. Vis-a-vis Bonn, however, moderation exists only in a condescending tone, despite the detente policy a la Brandt and Bahr, indicating that this or that would be "favorable prerequisites" (for a gracious approach of Moscow)--as long as the Federal Republic will mitigate its defense preparedness. In the opposite case one would blow fortissimo for cold war.

That should not surprise anybody; most of all it should not intimidate anybody. After all, we have known this repertoire for 3 decades.

WOERNER DEMANDS RETRACTION OF SCHMIDT PROPOSAL ON MISSILES

DW250927 Bonn DIE WELT in German 25 Apr 80 p 2

[Report on Ruediger Moniac interview with Manfred Woerner, CDU Bundestag deputy and chairman of the Bundestag Defense Committee; date not given]

[Text] Bonn--"We expect the chancellor to officially retract his personal proposal prior to the opening of negotiations with the Soviet Union on the limitation of medium-range armaments and to make it clear in the Bundestag that the Federal Government unshakably and unequivocally adheres to the implementation of the dual NATO decision of 12 December 1979. This must be done prior to his potential trip to Moscow." It was with this demand of the CDU/CSU opposition that Manfred Woerner, CDU deputy and chairman of the Bundestag Defense Committee, confronted the government chief in an interview with DIE WELT.

The member of parliament deems the effect of Helmut Schmidt's latest proposals "simply fatal" for NATO. In a speech to the Hamburg SPD on 11 April the chancellor made the offer to the Soviet Union to "agree" on a specific number of years during which both sides would refrain from deploying additional or new medium-range weapons and to negotiate on a mutual limitation of such weapons systems during that period.

Contrary to this remark by the chancellor, the NATO decision does not envisage such a mechanism but makes it plain that, as soon as corresponding U.S. weapons are available after a production period of about 3 years, these systems (108 Pershing II missiles and 464 cruise missiles, so-called GLCM) will be stationed in Western Europe--unless the results of future arms control negotiations have contributed by then toward the preservation of security on a lower level.

According to Woerner, Schmidt's suggestion created widespread confusion in the West. The parliamentarian particularly pointed out the Netherlands and Belgium where Foreign Minister Simonet already indicated in Brussels that the Belgian Government probably could not accept the stationing of 48 cruise missiles slated for Belgian territory. Woerner went on to say that this demonstrates that Schmidt's initiative was softening up the NATO position and that it even threatens to dissolve the automatic mechanism planned in connection with the deployment of arms limitation negotiations remain insufficient.

The CDU deputy moreover considers Schmidt's suggestion suitable for making Moscow believe that the alliance is yielding. The Soviet Union will increase its propaganda efforts even more aimed against the double decision of NATO to close the arms gap. In this way the basis for serious negotiations with the Soviet Union on medium-range arms will be shaken, if not destroyed.

In addition, Woerner remarked on another military aspect: "Even if Moscow accepted Schmidt's suggestion and did not deploy any new medium-range missiles of the SS-20 type for a certain period, leaving them in the factory after production, it would not be an advantage for NATO. These missiles are fully mobile and they can be deployed everywhere in the Soviet Union within a very short time. Because of their range they would reach Western Europe from almost any place on Soviet territory. Thus, a mere deployment halt would not in the least decrease the military threat to Europe."

INTERIOR MINISTER BAUM INTERVIEWED ON OLYMPICS BOYCOTT

DW281923 Hamburg DER SPIEGEL in German 28 Apr 80 pp 22-23

[Interview with Federal Minister of the Interior Gerhardt Baum; date, place not given]

[Text] SPIEGEL: Mr Baum, the Federal Government has had a very hard time recommending to the German athletes a boycott of the Moscow Olympic games because of the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. However, reportedly it will not exert pressure on the sportsmen. Does the government dodge a clear decision?

Baum: We did not have a hard time. Only we didn't take the decision-making process so easy. Following the vote of the U.S. athletes on participation, the Federal Government had to voice a clear opinion.

SPIEGEL: But is the recommendation of a boycott worth anything if sanctions are ruled out from the start?

Baum: I consider it important that this opinion-forming proceed with arguments and not with threats of sanctions. What is a decision worth if it comes only under pressure of sanctions imposed by the state? We have made it clear to the NOC [National Olympic Committee] what we expect it to do. Now it will have to decide freely on how it will act in an extremely difficult situation.

SPIEGEL: The anti-Olympics decision of the Federal Government is criticized in a public as an acrobatic stunt, as a play on two pianos: a bow to the United States, on the one hand, and an attempt to please the Soviets, at least halfway, on the other.

Baum: Our opinion is clear. We do not want our athletes to take part in the Moscow games. If we make a recommendation--and this is the only thing we can do, considering our understanding of the role of sports in a free society--we will have to tolerate the fact that the sportsmen may make a different decision although we do not want this to happen.

SPIEGEL: The chancellor was under the impression, by your statement that no pressure would be exerted, that you had given the Germans to understand with a wink of an eye that it wasn't really that bad if they went to Moscow anyway.

Baum: Was he really? I should think it would be out of place to misunderstand my statement as a wink. The seriousness of our position is beyond any doubt. Nobody should mistake our understanding of opinion-forming as lack of determination. Mr Daume also said publicly that he has by no means understood my statement as well as other statements by the Federal Government as a wink. It is with considerable concern that I see the Soviet Union, which has always had difficulty keeping sports and politics apart, exert relatively massive political pressure on international sports in the present situation--on the meeting of the world sports organizations in Lausanne, for instance. I do not at all want our sportsmen to get into such a scrape.

SPIEGEL: Some people believe that the lukewarm recommendation encourages those who nonetheless want to go to Moscow.

Baum: On the contrary. In sports a threat of consequences by the state--be it the withdrawal of funds, be it the refusal to issue passports--is considered an inappropriate instrument. Such an attitude by the government would produce the opposite of what is actually hoped for. And it is, above all, those sportsmen who are supporting nonparticipation who have urgently warned us against using threats.

SPIEGEL: Despite solidarity with the United States, wasn't the mild warning also aimed at not annoying the Soviets too much, which could be understandable?

Baum: I am not a foreign policymaker, but naturally the most important aspect was our loyalty to the United States. As for the Soviet Union, our policy was guided by the wish to enable it to correct mistakes, possibly without loss of face, in the interest of detente policy which is particularly important for the Federal Republic and for Europe.

SPIEGEL: People always talk about solidarity if they are not convinced about the issue at hand.

Baum: Naturally we had doubts about whether sports could be a useful means of politics. But, ultimately, we saw no other alternative but to ask sports to make this sacrifice. I consider an analysis of sports-related political consequences important.

SPIEGEL: But which consequences do you consider necessary?

Baum: As you know, the IOC [International Olympic Committee] in the past weeks in no way has fulfilled its task of defending its own principles, its own charter. Actually it has failed this test. What did the IOC really do to guarantee the participation of all nations in the Olympics? Now I suddenly read in the press that the IOC president wants to talk with Carter and Brezhnev. I can only say--a helpful gesture.

SPIEGEL: In the recommendation of the Federal Government it says somewhat ambiguously that it is necessary to stick to the proved furthering of competitive sports and that sports events in the international arena should continue to be expressly promoted. Now, will our athletes get money when they go to Moscow or won't they?

Baum: To begin with, it is meant in a more comprehensive sense. It dates back to a discussion with representatives of sports in the last few days. Both sides, the state as well as the sports organizations, are worried by the fact that the discussion on the Olympics partly was connected with a massive attack on competitive sports, the utility and financing requirements of which have been called into question. In addition, the lack of success at Lake Placid has been criticized. So we wanted to make it plain that we adhere to the furtherance of competitive sports.

SPIEGEL: Okay, but will the athletes get the money allocated for them in the budget if the NOC does not heed the boycott recommendation?

Baum: I would consider it regrettable if we now reduced this serious problem of participation in the Olympics to a mere financial affair. In addition, I don't believe that this question poses itself at all in practice. I hope and will continue to see to it that sports will follow our recommendation.

SPIEGEL: But it is certainly permissible to ask what it means if the government promises that there will be no sanctions.

Baum: My opinion is clear: If we say we do not want to put opinion-forming within the NOC under financial or juridical pressure, it logically means in the last analysis that, if the sportsmen really decide in favor of the trip to Moscow, they must not be prevented from doing so by the withdrawal of passports or other sanctions or by blocking funds allocated in the budget.

SPIEGEL: Why has this not been made clear in the recommendation by the Cabinet? In the statement made by the chancellor in the Bundestag it only says that individual travellers cannot expect to get anything.

Baum: Because the funds have been allocated only for a team to be dispatched by the NOC. The furtherance of individual travellers is out of the question.

SPIEGEL: But the politicians in your own FDP faction attach utmost importance to the fact that there is no threat of sanctions.

Baum: Yes. This question has played a great role in the FDP faction. Some in our faction would have decided differently if it had been made quite clear, repeatedly also by the floorleader, that no sanctions are connected with this boycott recommendation.

SPIEGEL: Does it mean that athletes who are soldiers or public servants will get leave for the Olympics as planned?

Baum: If they disregard the vote of the government and the Bundestag, they should take annual leave. After all, being public servants they cannot claim any additional privileges if they do not observe the recommendations of their employer.

SPIEGEL: Does the boycott recommendation also apply to German umpires?

Baum: It would really be double-bottomed if we said "athletes no, umpires yes."

SPIEGEL: And how about sports officials?

Baum: That's another thing: Most international sports organizations will meet in Moscow during the Olympic games. In many cases, elections will be held there. I think it would be a good thing for the Germans to represent our position there and also safeguard German interests. I think this is necessary. It does not mean that they will participate in the Olympic games.

SPIEGEL: Mr Baum, the British Government also recommended a boycott but added: There will be no money for participation. Doesn't this decision show that politics and sports can very well be kept apart but that, nonetheless, sanctions can be imposed?

Baum: The decision may seem to be more logical, more understandable and more consistent but, in reality, it is not. Because, after the experiences we had in the Nazi era, we Germans of all people should not establish a regulatory link between the state and sports.

I add: So far we have avoided an open conflict between the state and sports. We do not want a break like in England. We have preserved a relationship which is based on dialogue between partners. The threat of sanctions would--as sportsmen tell us--disturb this sensitive realtionship.

PRESS DISCUSSES SAARLAND ELECTION RESULTS

OW281440 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0505 GMT 28 Apr 80

[Press review on Saarland Landtag election]

[Excerpt] HANNOVERSCHE ALLGEMEINE ZEITUNG states: All parties represented in the landtag can be content with the outcome of the Saarland elections. The CDU has suffered severe losses, but thanks to the support of the FDP it will stay in the government. It is the first time that the Social Democrats have formed the strongest faction in the landtag. The liberals have stood their ground quite well after all, and the CDU depends on them as before. The "picture looks completely different, however, if one looks at it with a view to the forthcoming Bundestag elections. The Christian Democrats must acknowledge that their chances have deteriorated considerably. The SPD, however, can look forward to the October elections with even more self-confidence than before.

RUHR-NACHRICHTEN of Dortmund notes: The loss for the Christian Democrats is too obvious to say that it was only caused by the short time they have been in office. The CDU as a whole must note that the negative trend of previous landtag elections has continued in the Saar. That is one aspect of the federal policy; the other involves the FDP. Saarbruecken, as before, can be considered as evidence that the FDP has maintained its freedom to form an alliance, that it does not depend on the Social Democrats come what may.

The daily DIE WELT comments: The local elections in the Saar also provide highlights of the federal policy. We know a bad habit prevails that whenever no party achieves an absolute majority in elections, a coalition of losers keeps the strongest parliamentary party from taking over government responsibility we know that bad habit from social-liberal alliances against the CDU. Now the unexpectedly successful SPD is the suffering party.

The FDP considers loyalty to its land policy coalition party to be more important than Nibelungen loyalty vis-a-vis the Bonn coalition. The legend also dies in the Saar that it would be absolutely fatal for the FDP to shift its coalition sympathy from the SDP to the CDU.

RHEINISCHE POST of Duesseldorf writes: The Saar coalition--consisting of the FDP and the CDU--was a test of whether the Free Democrats could aim for a coalition with the CDU/CSU union in the foreseeable future. Since 27 April they have been able to do so. Now it remains to be seen whether they want to or whether they will use the Saar coalition as some sort of a fig leaf. As long as there are three parliamentary parties, democratic development in the FRG needs the mutual ability to form practical coalition among all democratic parties and not merely a basically stated and theoretical ability. The FDP performance in the Saar must therefore be welcomed politically.

FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE ZEITUNG notes: The Saarland FDP had promised the voters to continue the alliance with the CDU. The government has shown remarkable achievements, and the FDP has more than a proportionate influence in the cabinet. This would show further increase in a continued bourgeois coalition. The Saarland CDU will be moderate in the coalition now after the elections. It must now search for the reasons for its losses. Was it because of Minister President Zeyer, who made a pale impression compared with opposition leader Lafountaine? Or did federal policy make an impression in the Saarland? That would be a warning for Strauss.

STUTTGARTER NACHRICHTEN writes: So the question about the guilty person will not be asked in the CDU/CSU union. In this regard they will again have to discuss whether the federal policy trend has not again shown an effect in the Saarland. The SPD could have profited from the present mood because it is represented by the chancellor. If this were the case, which must be assumed, one will hardly be able to ignore the name Franz Josef Strauss. It is interesting to see whether the Christian Democrats will succeed in covering up this explosive discussion at least until the elctions on 11 May [in North Rhine-Westphalia].

ALLGEMEINE ZEITUNG of Mainz states: In all of the landtag elections the Christian Democrats have suffered their greatest losses in the Saar. It would be foolish if, 2 weeks prior to the Landtag elections [in North Rhine-Westphalia] the CDU/CSU were to ignore this urgent warning in a self-deluding way. In the Konrad Adenauer House in Bonn the question will have to be asked whether the losses would have been smaller or even bigger if the Munich candidate for chancellor had been more involved.

BREMER NACHRICHTEN carries the following quotation: After the landtag elections in the Saar, the CDU will have to ask itself the question again and thoroughly as to whether or not agreement on Franz Josef Strauss in the union has a slow but persistent negative effect. The Stuttgarter and Saarbruecken elections show that the wind is blowing so strongly into the face of the CDU that the alarm bells must ring rather loudly in the Bonn party headquarters.

KOELNISCHE RUNDSCHAU notes: This election result in the smallest federal land of all must create great concern among the union parties. The fact that the liberals could stand their ground with just minor losses is probably the most interesting thing about these elections in the Saar. The SPD now forms the strongest faction in the Saarbruecken Landtag, and yet it remains in the opposition. It cannot complain about that because the CDU experienced the same thing for years in Bonn or in North Rhine-Westphalia.

SCHWAEBISCHE ZEITUNG of Leutkirch states: The Social Democrats of the Saarland now share the fate with the union in Bonn and elsewhere, of being the strongest group in parliament but compelled to sit on the opposition benches. It is not good for the strongest party to be kept from governing, be it the union or the Social Democrats--but the Social Democrats have no right to complain about it. They practice this evil unscrupulously.

NEUE RUHR-ZEITUNG of Essen writes: It is not the first time that the winner of an election cannot take the victor's prize home. Wherever there is no absolute majority, coalitions decide. Helmut Kohl experienced that in [word indistinct], the young mayor of Saarbruecken, knows the bitter aftertaste of a successful election campaign as of last night. He is without doubt the winner in the Saar, although his gaining of votes in part is a demonstration of confidence for Helmut Schmidt.

THREE MEN, WOMAN SENTENCED ON CHARGES OF SOVIET ESPIONAGE

LD292058 Hamburg DPA in German 1643 GMT 29 Apr 80

[Text] Stuttgart--The Stuttgart Higher Regional Court today sentenced three men and one woman from Kirchheim-Teck and Essingen to terms of imprisonment ranging from 12 to 14 months on charges of working as intelligence agents for the Soviet intelligence service. In one case the sentence was suspended.

The court found that the four defendants had spied on U.S. facilities such as barracks and supply depots in the Federal Republic. The court said that although "no measurable damage" had been done to the Federal Republic and to the United States, custodial sentences were needed to deter potential offenders.

BRIEFS

PATENT AGREEMENT WITH USSR--Essen--The Soviet All-Union Association for the Import and Export of Patents [V/O Litsenzintorg] has concluded an agreement with the Thyssen Engineering GmbH for the sale of Soviet technique for drying coking coal. This technology, which according to today's press is in use in 30 Soviet industrial installations and in Japan, is better than the traditional system of wet quenching as regards energy conservation and environmental protection. According to reports, Thyssen Engineering is to shortly build such an installation in the FRG, with a capacity of 70 tons an hour. [Text] [Hamburg DPA in German 1513 GMT 24 Apr 80 LD]

FOREIGN MINISTRY DENIES SECRET AGREEMENT WITH IRAN

NC291826 Paris AFP in English 1822 GMT 29 Apr 80

[Text] Paris, April 29 (AFP)--The French Foreign Ministry today denied "categorically" accusations by American syndicated columnist Jack Anderson that France and Iran had signed a secret sanctions-busting agreement.

The accusations, published today, that "France signed with Iran a secret agreement November 21, 1979, are without foundation," a Quai d'Orsay spokesman said. The French Embassy in Washington had already denied the reports.

Mr Anderson said that U.S. intelligence services are investigating a report published in London earlier this year the alleged agreement that would provide France with increased Iranian oil imports in return for stepped up French military and other assistance.

LE MONDE: VANCE DEPARTURE SYMBOLIZES U.S. FOREIGN POLICY

LD291225 Paris LE MONDE in French 29 Apr 80 p 1

[Editorial: "The Defeat of Compromise"]

[Text] Unless there is an unexpected change of heart by him or by Mr Carter, Mr Cyrus Vance will leave his post as secretary of state, which he had occupied since the President entered the White House 3 years and 3 months ago. This resignation is the crowning paradox in the chaotic running of the U.S. political and military machine in the past few days; one of the most loyal and devoted members of Mr Carter's team seems to be abandoning him in his hour of need.

In this affair Mr Vance is primarily being faithful to himself: According to consistent reports, he had opposed any attempt to rescue the hostages by force right from the start and had announced on 11 April--the date on which the Tabas operation was decided on against his advice and in his absence--that he would resign after it had been carried out, whatever its result. His first concern was probably loyalty toward the Allies, from whom Washington was demanding sanctions against Iran precisely to avoid having to resort to military measures. For the same reasons the secretary of state had obtained the President's agreement, at the beginning of this month, for a final series of nonviolent sanctions against Iran (embargo on food and medical products) to be kept in reserve for the future in order to delay the time when violence would be the only possible solution.

This is why the departure of this lawyer--a scrupulous, not to say fussy, advocate of negotiated solutions--symbolically illustrates not only his own failures but the course which U.A. foreign policy has taken in the past 6 months.

Although Mr Carter had confirmed his role as main foreign policy spokesman, Mr Vance had held his last press conference 6 months ago, 5 days before the Tehran hostages were seized: Mr Vance was clearly better suited to the conventional course of traditional diplomacy than to the tumultuous events which were to follow. More than the signing of the Camp David agreements for which the real credit fell to Mr Carter, his main success had been the negotiations for the SALT II treaty. The possibily definitive "shelving"of this agreement and the rise of tension with the USSR seriously weakened his position; it was becoming increasingly difficult for him to "toe the line" until January 1981--the date he had initially set for his departure from public affairs.

Mr Carter's national security adviser Brzezinski now has a free hand to assert the all-embracing and activist view he has of East-West rivalry and to which he has won over the President. Whether Mr Vance is replaced by the former Columbia professor or by Deputy Secretary of State Warren Christopher--a man whom Mr Brzezinski recommended personally last month--will not moderate the predictably tougher line in U.S. policy. Despite or perhaps even because of the failure of the Tabas operation, public opinion seems determined to support further use of force to free the Tehran hostages.

A larger majority than predicted (71 percent as against 18 percent according to a Gallup poll) approves of Mr Carter's attempt. Many U.S. political luminaries, from Mr Kissinger to Senator Kennedy, including Mr Nixon and Mr Bush, have advocated support or understanding Mr. Carter may have just been outstripped by his rival Kennedy in the Michigan primary, but this result has nothing to do with the failure in Iran according to all observers.

FRANCE-SOIR PRAISES GISCARD CALL FOR 'SOLIDARITY WITH U.S.'

LD291209 Paris FRANCE-SOIR in French 29 Apr 80 pp 1,3

[Beoit Rayski editorial: "'Solidarity....'"]

[Text] "Solidarity with the United States...": Valery Giscard d'Estaing spoke this phrase in Luxembourg at yesterday's European summit whose grim agenda (calves, cows, milk...) has naturally been eclipsed by the dramatic failure of the U.S. raid in Iran.

"Solidarity with the United States...": A phrase which, as people say, does not have a good press in France, so much has our country's fear of pro-U.S. alignment been mobilized by a certain political and intellectual terrorism.

"Solidarity with the United States...": A statement which, at other times, would have seemed normal and banal but which now contains--this being rare--an exceptional character.

Thus the president of the republic, of whom the least one can say is that he is scarely accommodating toward the United States, had to make these remarks. It was convenient that he should do so at the very moment when the Americans were suffering adversity, failure and humiliation.

Finally, it was good that Valery Giscard d'Estaing should remind France--and people had ended up forgetting this--that our real enemies are those who, in Tehran and elsewhere, violate human rights.

This is a message needed by the United States, which could have thought that France and Europe were looking more toward the Urals than the Atlantic. But not only by the United States: France, too, since from right to left, from the opposition to the government majority, a series of commonplace and minor statements were being heard yesterday on "the Americans' irresponsibility."

It is clear that reforms are indispensable, provided that their aim is to improve and develop agricultural production, not to destroy it. In this sphere as in the others, if Europe is to emerge from the impasse at the Luxembourg council a minimum of political will is needed.

If Mr Carter's false move makes the Europeans jump, makes them aware of their fragility and convinces them that their fate is primarily in their own hands, then the misfortune will have been of some benefit.

TROOPS FROM CHAD TO BE REDEPLOYED IN AFRICA

AB281237 Paris AFP in English 1156 GMT 28 Apr 80

[Excerpts] Paris, April 28 (AFP)--French troops which today begun leaving Ndjamena, the capital of Chad, will be redeployed in coming weeks in neighbouring African countries with which France has military cooperation agreements, such as Cameroon and Gabon, an informed source here said. The 1,100 troops plus additional command and support elements in Chad were withdrawn to their base in Ndjamena before fighting broke out on March 21 between forces of Transitional Government President Goukouni Queddei and those of former Defence Minister Hissein Habre in a power struggle for the capital.

The withdrawal has begun four days after a visit to Ndjamena of French President Valery Giscard d'Estaing's African affairs adviser, Martin Kirsch. It also follows a Chadian Cabinet meeting on Friday which reportedly decided to sack Mr Habre and other ministers supporting him for reasons of rebellion.

MARCHAIS CITED ON PARIS CP CONFERENCE, TIES WITH CCP

LD281403 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 22 Apr 80 pp 4-5

[Unattributed report on press conference given by PCF Secretary General Georges Marchais on 21 April in Paris: "Defending the Workers Through Action Everywhere"]

[Excerpts] Georges Marchais yesterday held a press conference devoted to the results of his recent trips abroad and to the domestic situation. Accompanied by Charles Fiterman, Maxime Gremetz, Pierre Juquin and Madeleine Vincent, he presented the text we are publishing below and gave detailed answers to journalists' questions:

I have recently had occasion to visit Madagascar, Mozambique, the Congo and Lebanon--not to mention a brief stop in Lisbon where I had talks with Alvaro Cunhal. I met with the top officials from these countries, including Presidents Ratsiraka, Machel, N'Guesso and Sarkis, and from liberation movements and progressive groups--I am thinking in particular of [PLO] Chairman Yasir 'Arafat. These talks and meetings were concluded by a series of important joint statements. Each of these visits was widely reported in the countries' mass media.

I draw three conclusions from these various meetings which confirm the PCF's international authority.

Struggle for New International Order on Agenda

The first is the considerable problems facing the peoples and countries of the so-called Third World. The burden of the colonial legacy, the existence of unfair international relations and the pressures exerted by multinational firms all create enormous problems for these countries and they are tackling them with courage and determination.

This is what Francois Mitterrand meant when he pointed out that he thought it legitimate for a state to use every means to free its nationals--a remark which, like those of the president of the republic, has cut through the weekend's political unrest.

It was merely necessary to remember, as did Valery Giscard d'Estaing and the leader of the Socialist Party, that the Tehran hostages are not only Americans, but also people.

LESSONS FOR EUROPE SEEN IN U.S. HOSTAGE RESCUE ATTEMPT

LD291011 Paris LE MONDE in French 27-28 Apr 80 p 1

[Editorial: "A Lesson for Europe"]

[Text] The United States' recent political disaster in Iran may have a beneficial effect if the Europeans draw the lesson which is asserting itself at a time when the Community is hurling itself headlong into the most serious crisis in its history: No one has the right, neither Europeanor its constituent states, nor peoples nor individuals, to abdicate the least responsibility to anyone, even the best intentioned of people, or to abandon the means of action within its reach or the ability to use those means freely.

De Gaulle was convinced of this, as were Mao and many others before them. It is not a case of isolating oneself, of refusing support and alliances, but of never forgetting that no one can guarantee his own security, that is, his future, except by relying first on himself and not by entrusting himself to the supposed wisdom and power of a so-called "leadership". This, moreover, is the best way not only of gaining the respect of others but of assuring oneself of friends and allies.

At the present juncture in Europe this realization could have definite consequences. It is true that the Europeans are in no state to ensure their military security on their own, even though the obstacles in this sphere are far more political than technical. The lack of political will has prevented Europe from giving itself a real arms industry.

It is also true that Europe has no security in energy. It suffers from this cruelly and is in danger of suffering from it even more in the future. In this sphere, too, the Europeans would be far less vulnerable if they had pooled their efforts in concrete terms instead of losing their way in institutional wrangling. Need we recall that if Europe in its own right possesses the capacity to produce nuclear fuel, it is not due to EURATOM but to EURODIF, a French initiative and a purely cooperative enterprise set up outside the Europe of the Nine with, as its sole ambition, that of producing enriched uranium?

On the other hand, the Europe of the Nine has managed to ensure its food security, which is not insignificant, and to endow itself with the capacity for agricultural export which, in a world doomed to famine, is no negligible political instrument. Who can comprehend the fact that this "Green Europe"--the Nine's most obvious success despite the sarcasm to which it gives rise--should commit suicide because one of its member states has financial difficulties and wants to trade in New Zealand lamb?

Certainly British Prime Minister Thatcher is not entirely wrong. She is perfectly right to demand that some glaring anomalies are corrected; but, ultimately, agricultural costs represent only a minimal part of Community income, and only the overproduction of milk is senseless although it is nevertheless better to have to cope with excess than with shortage....

The struggle for a new international economic and political order is now on the agenda. This need to democratize international relations which I encountered throughout these visits corresponds as much to the interests of the developing peoples as to the interests of the workers in our countries. That is the objective basis for solidarity in struggle which must be taken into account in the future.

Much Expected of France in the World

The second conclusion which I draw from these visits is the vanguard role which a country like ours could play in solving major world problems.

France still enjoys a vast stock of respect and friendship. I was able to assess on the spot how much damge the president's international action is doing to this respect and friendship. Repeated interference in peoples' internal affairs and discrimination in cooperation are giving France the image of imperialism's gendarme. That is a considerable loss for our country and for the cause of progress and peace.

Indeed, we must realize that a great deal is expected of France in the world. France is expected to work to establish new, fairer and more stable economic relations, corresponding to the requirements of independence, democracy and cooperation with the developing countries, particularly the African countries.

France is expected to speak out independently in favor of peace--particularly in the Indian Ocean, which should now be turned into a zone of peace and cooperation among independent states free from foreign military bases in the region.

France is expected to take truly independent action to help find a solution to the Middle East problem. To this end the Palestinian people's legitimate demand for an independent state must be met and the PLO recognized as the Palestinian people's real representative. This independent French action should at the same time effectively help to preserve a united, democratic and independent Lebanon. As far as we are concerned, I have already had occasion to stress that the proposals made recently by the Lebanese president open up such prospects and that our party would back any step in this direction by France without any sectarianism or narrow-mindedness.

World Moving in Right Direction

Finally, the third conclusion which I draw from these visits is that the world is definitely moving and that it is moving in the right direction. The big bourgeoisie finds it difficult to accept such a development because it means lost positions, the disappearance of privileges and reduced profits. President Carter's attitude is indicative of this nervousness.

Of course, all the maneuvers which imperialism is now making are not without danger. They help to increase international tensions. However, they are not likely to reverse the course of history. Indeed everything confirms our analysis that the balance of forces in the world is now tipped permanently in favor of the forces of progress and peace. Provided these forces and peoples mobilize, it is possible to defeat imperialism's aggressive policy.

This is clear in the Olympic games affair. Carter is trying to impose a veritable diktat on the whole world sporting movement. However, it is not possible or conceivable that the will of one head of state--albeit the U.S. head of state--will prevail over that of 120-130 nations: The boycott will only damage those who join it. [paragraph continues]

It will keep them out of the biggest festival of sport and youth. It will place them with the extremists of tension and confrontation among nations. That is why we support the sportsmen who expect the National Olympic Committee to stand by its decision to take part in the games and to accept the invitation without further delay, and we demand that the government respect this decision strictly. Any other attitude would seriously damage the French sports movement and our country's interests.

For Peace and Security in Europe

This is also clear in the revival of the arms race on the European Continent. We have no intention of allowing imperialism to jeopardize the detente effort in this way. The struggle, united action to impose peace and disarmament is more vital than ever.

That is precisely why we decided with our Polish comrades to hold a meeting in Paris--in exactly 1 week's time--of European communist and workers parties to carry out the freest possible exchange of views on a specific question: peace and disarmament in Europe. This meeting should produce an appeal to the peoples of Europe urging that this great issue be tackled. We are convinced that, in taking this initiative, we are usefully serving the cause of peace and security on our continent.

After making his preliminary statement Georges Marchais answered journalists' questions. A journalist asked him first which communist parties had accepted the invitation to the international meeting to take place next Monday and Tuesday.

"We do not yet have all the answers or final decisions from all parties," Georges Marchais indicated. "However, we can already say that the vast majority of parties have decided to take part."

However, some parties, one journalist pointed out, have said that they do not want to come. What is your opinion on this subject?

[Marchais] Your question prompts me to make two remarks: First, the meeting will not be a failure. Quite the reverse: The parties which will be present represent major forces whether in power or not.

Some parties have decided not to attend. We regret that. However, first this is the rule which governs relations among communist parties; indeed nobody intends to call into question each party's right to determine its attitude in full sovereignty and free from any pressure. In any case this is the view which we French Communists hold and the practice which we follow.

Second, the good relations which we have with all communist and workers parties could not be jeopardized or even affected by any party's refusal to take part in the Paris meeting.

Nonetheless, our position is clear on this question of communist party meetings. I will recall it very briefly. In 1976 I told the representatives of European communist parties meeting in Berlin that conferences of this style no longer seemed to us to meet the needs of our time. Why? For a very basic reason, namely that, in view of the great diversity of conditions in which communist and workers parties are struggling, any common strategy is absolutely out of the question.

I would like to add that experience bears witness to the ineffectiveness of such conferences. They require years of preparation. They always end with the adoption of copious programs. However, once the conferences are over the programs are shelved. They are never followed by specific, effective action aimed at mobilizing the masses to attain the set objectives.

For all these reasons, rejecting any dogmatism, we advocated the search for new more vital, flexible and effective forms of collective meetings. The meeting proposed by the PZPR [Polish United Workers Party] and the PCF is precisely in keeping with this. It has an objective: struggle for peace and disarmament; specific, constructive and realistic proposals and appeal for action by all peace-loving forces without exception. We think that the arguments against this meeting are inconsistent.

[Question] We are told that the collective preparation has not been collective enough?

[Marchais] All parties were consulted before this meeting was called; our Polish friends and we ourselves suggested that all those who so wished could join our initiative, and said that we were prepared to stand down in favor of any party wishing to take our place. The draft document can be amended by anybody in the framework of the precise agenda.

The meeting will only be attended by communist parties. It will therefore be limited. However, I would like to ask why the communist parties should give up meeting among themselves when all the other European and world political forces do so. Why compare a meeting of communist parties to a meeting extended to all other political forces wishing to take part? This is precisely the sense of the appeal which we intend to make.

A meeting of communist parties would allegedly only be conceivable if a "consensus" existed, in other words agreement from all parties. In our view such an argument is entirely negative. Who tries to force a party to take part in an initiative if it does not want to? Why go out of your way to align the communist parties in a given common position when there is increasing diversity among the communist parties? By following such a policy either you dictate or you reach shaky compromises. We reject automatic alignment with any party just as much as action for objectives which we consider are not in keeping with the interests of workers in our country and of the cause of peace and socialism.

Finally I would like to ask why we should paralyze the action of communist parties because a particular party, for its own reasons, deems a particular initiative to be inappropriate? In fact, all the indications are that the initiative we have taken with our Polish friends --an urgent and necessary initiative in view of imperialism's plots against peace--is in keeping with what relations among communist parties should now be: democratic, effective relations open to other forces; relations which are devoid of any dogmatism. That is the view which we now have of relations among parties and of meetings like the one which will take place here in Paris.

Relations With CCP

Questioned next on Enrico Berlinguer's visit to China, Georges Marchais indicated: "It is not up to us to pass judgment on Enrico Berlinguer's visit, especially since we have no information about the results of this meeting. Our stance is well known and it was plainly and clearly reaffirmed during our last congress. We are prepared to work toward establishing normal relations between our party and the CCP--relations which take account of the differences which exist but which enable us to move toward specific actions in the interest of our peoples.

"We are following with interest the results obtained in the building of a socialist society in China. However, in the foreign policy sphere, we find it difficult to understand the CCP's policy which is aimed, especially in Europe, at pushing peoples toward integration, whether in the EEC or in NATO, and at pushing peoples toward the arms race.

"We find it difficult to understand why the CCP regards the Soviet Union as its main enemy. We have difficulty in understanding its policy in Southeast Asia. We have differing opinions on all these questions but we are prepared to establish normal relations between our parties. We did not bring about the split; it came from the CCP. We have always invited the CCP to our congresses and made the appropriate gestures on all major occasions in the Chinese people's life. We welcomed the presence of a Chinese journalist at our last congress."

Finally, questioned on Yasir 'Arafat's readiness to recognize Israel's right to existence, Georges Marchais replied: "This is the wrong way of putting the question. Moreover I must say that Mr Begin's recent statements in Washington are not likely to settle the question facing Israel and the Palestinian people and are detrimental to the Israeli people themselves. Indeed he said that he would never agree to a Palestinian state on his borders and reaffirmed his categorical refusal to recognize the PLO. Moreover he said that Jerusalem will remain under Israel's jurisdiction. All these statements should be noted by those forces which want the Palestinian problem to be settled and the Israeli people to be able to live in peace.

"It is important to understand that the crucial question facing us now is the following: There is a people--the Palestinian people--who are deprived of their homeland, and during our visit to the Lebanon we were able to see hundreds of thousands of refugees, of whom little is said in France, living in abominable conditions in Beirut, hounded out of southern Lebanon, in violation of UN decisions, both by the Israeli forces and the fascists openly supported by Israel.

"The main question is to finally give the Palestinian people the Palestinian homeland to which they aspire. Putting the question in the way you have done expresses the problem the wrong way round--you are asking the victims for guarantees first! I would like to add that the Palestinians do not do this; they are right because they are using a political advantage as a means of pressure to obtain recognition as a people. However, having said that, all the politicians who have met with Yasir 'Arafat know quite well that his objective is not to kill or destroy anybody and that it is purely and simply to ensure that a people can have a state and live finally in peace. That is the impression which we have following our meeting with him."

SDAR'S OULD SALEK HITS MOROCCAN, FRENCH ROLE IN SAHARA

LD290847 Paris L'UNITE in French 4-19 Apr 80 p 7

[Gilbert Sans report on Paris interview with Ould Salek, Saharan Democratic Arab Republic [SDAR] information minister: "It Is Not France's Duty To Support Hassan II's Warmongering Policy"--date not given.

[Text] Four years after the proclamation of the Saharan Democratic Arab Republic, and although a number of African member countries of the Organization of African Unity (OAU) already recognize its existence officially, the conflict throughout the former Spanish Sahara is persisting and intensifying. There are no serious negotiations in prospect for the moment, and Morocco is ignoring the OAU. The support or intervention of foreign powers can only broaden the conflict in this zone of Africa so close to the Mediterranean and Europe. The king of Morocco has just paid a long visit to Paris where it was recently learned that France is to supply the Moroccan Army with about 100 AMX-type light-armored vehicles: a good "working visit" for His Majesty Hassan II! The king of Morocco is still trying to draw France increasingly into the Saharan hornet's nest while in Morocco itself the social crisis is hitting the popular social classes hard. While Giscard and Hassan were embracing, the Socialist Party [PS] published a statement demonstrating its "keen concern in the face of renewed repression in Morocco...." During a stopover in Paris, where he had a long talk with Lionel Jospin [PS national secretary] and the PS International Secretariat, Ould Salek, Saharan Democratic Arab Republic information minister, answered L'UNITE's questions.

[Question] The recent, murderous military operations in the south of Morocco are turning into a new defeat for the royal forces, although they possess extremely sophisticated American and French weapons.... Who is arming Morocco? Under these conditions how do you explain your military superiority in the field?

[Answer] On the military level the king of Morocco wanted to regain the positions lost on Moroccan territory itself. This region of south Morocco forms the road toward the West Sahara; the fact that it is controlled by the POLISARIO Front's forces prevents supplies reaching the occupation forces in the West Sahara. Morocco has engaged the army's elite in this battle: armored vehicles, artillery, aircraft. The fighting lasted 11 days--from 1 through 11 March--and ended with the Moroccans losing 2,000 soldiers dead, wounded, or captured and with a great number of weapons destroyed or captured by our army.

Morocco does not have a just cause to defend. The army is demoralized. A soldier who leaves his family in total poverty, who finds himself in a land he does not know, in climatic conditions different from Morocco's, who receives no pay, this soldier cannot fight. Morocco has collected an enormous quantity of arms from every source. We have recovered arms manufactured under French license in South Africa. Morocco has become a veritable arsenal. Morocco does not need weapons, it needs peace. If Hassan II persists in his adventuring there may be a brutal upheaval in Morocco as there was in Portugal with the colonial wars. A regime which, in order to divert its own public opinion from its internal problems, prolongs an external conflict and maintains a colony by force, that regime is simply rushing to its downfall before the march of the national liberation struggles.

[Question] What is the French Government's position on the conflict? Can you confirm the presence of French military advisers in the Moroccan Army?

[Answer] The French intervention alongside Morocco is well known. However, the interests of the French people do not lie in supporting King Hassan II's policy of aggression. French involvement in the West Sahara conflict can only endanger world peace and security. There are French advisers in the Moroccan Army now; they restructured and trained the army on the eve of the latest military operations. The French Government recognizes this, moreover; it already supplies arms and technicians; since it is letting itself be dragged into the war it will one day be obliged to intervene directly as it has done in the past in Mauritania. It is not France's duty to support the Moroccan war of aggression--an intransigence condemned by the OAU--which can only encourage Hassan II's warmongering policy. France's role should be to induce the king to come to the negotiating table, to convince him by stopping arms supplies and by recognizing the Saharan people's right to self-determination. To support Morocco is to oppose the will of Africa.

[Question] What chance is there of opening peace negotiations soon?

[Answer] The king of Morocco remains hostile to the movement for peace that we started in the region with the signing of the 5 August agreement between the Saharan Democratic Arab Republic and the Islamic Republic of Mauritania. He systematically continues to refuse to negotiate. The POLISARIO Front has appealed to Morocco to negotiate peace with us under the auspices of the OAU. He still refuses.

COLOMBO ADDRESSES SENATE COMMISSION ON IRAN, AFGHAN CRISES

Iran Blamed for Crisis

AU300832 Rome ANSA in English 0800 GMT 30 Apr 80

[Text] Rome, April 30 (ANSA)--Italian Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo pinned the responsibility for the Iranian-American crisis situation on Iran and defended the American option of defending its interests in a statement to the Senate Foreign Affairs Commission yesterday afternoon.

Replying to queries raised by the senators on last week's aborted American bid to free the American hostages held in the U.S. Embassy in Tehran since November 4, Colombo declared, "Without doubt, the international illegality is exclusively on the side of Iran. It is beyond discussion for the victim of this illegality to hold the international right to defend itself when the United Nations Security Council finds itself incapable of intervening on behalf of the international community." The head of Italy's diplomacy went on to acknowledge the fact that the American operation sparked surprise and concern around the world because of the stakes involved and recalled that the news was immediately followed by appeals from many European capitals for "seeking out a peaceful solution for the Iranian crisis".

The foreign minister reaffirmed the Rome government's "firm determination" to strive to assure guarantees for the safety and liberation of the hostages "unjustly held" and to do so in "suitable international quarters, with the full and unified understanding of our European Community partners and in conformity with international law". Colombo, who is currently duty chairman of the EEC Council for Foreign Ministers, also reiterated the economic and political sanctions the Community has decided to apply against Iran if no satisfactory settlement of the hostage situation is announced by May 17.

The foreign minister said that these measures were in no way directed against the Iran people. "What is necessary", he said, "is to take the first important step toward reopening a dialogue with Iran. This dialogue must have bearing, above all, toward the liberation of the hostages but must also lay the foundwork for new relations with benefits for the stability of the region, for the development of the Iranian nation and for peace in the world". Colombo also gave assurances on the conditions of Italian nationals living and working in Iran and recalled that they have never come under personal attack nor experienced hostility directed against them.

Condemnation of USSR Reiterated

LD292024 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 1700 GMT 29 Apr 80

[Excerpts] The crisis between Iran and the United States: A debate is being held on the statement by the foreign minister to the Senate Foreign Affairs Commission. Gian Battista Fenu reports:

Foreign Minister Colombo has just concluded his speech to the Senate Foreign Relations Commission in which he outlined our government's stand [on Iran]. He assured the Commission that no hostility had ever been shown toward our compatriots and their families who are in Iran for the purpose of work. They have not in any way been involved in the recent events and none of them has asked to be repatriated, Colombo stated.

Part of his speech was also devoted to the Afghan crisis and the Moscow Olympics. He reiterated Italy's and the EEC's condemnation of the Soviet military intervention and emphasized Italy's agreement with the autonomy of the Olympic committees. We confirm, however, that the responsibility for maiming the Olympics rests entirely with Moscow, Colombo said.

After dealing with the situation in the Middle East, Palestine, Israel and Egypt, Colombo also spoke about the situation in the EEC after the failure of the recent summit. He said that the situation is certainly difficult, but Italy will still make every effort to overcome the differences which, according to Colombo, are not very great.

PRESS COMMENTS ON VANCE RESIGNATION, EEC SUMMIT FAILURE

AU291602 Rome ANSA in English 1555 GMT 29 Apr 80

[Text] Rome, April 29 (ANSA)--Italian editorial comment focused today on United States Secretary of State Cyrus Vance's resignation in the wake of the abortive U.S. military raid in Iran. One of the recurring themes in Italian dailies this morning was that this latest development foreshadows another crisis in American foreign policy and that the outcome is unpredictable. Vance was the "mediator", the "balanced element", the "dove" and "credible interlocutor", of Europe in the Carter administration. His resignation was not triggered by the failed rescue mission alone but is the result of an incurable conflict between President Jimmy Carter and his secretary of state on foreign policy directives. Along with this unexpected new development within the American administration, several papers observed that Europe is unable to find agreement over its internal problems as seen in yesterday's failure of the European Economic Community (EEC) summit in Luxembourg.

Editorialists were unanimous in assessing Vance as "man of mediation, of conciliation and compromise in dialogue" (the Christian Democrat Daily IL POPOLO). "Vance...was one of the principal artificers of diplomatic initiatives which led to the signing of the SALT II treaty, Camp David peace agreements and the patient effort to reduce areas of friction still existing in Africa and South America" (Rome's leftwing PAESE SERA).

Turin's Fiat-owned LA STAMPA said that dissent with the rescue mission in Iran is not enough to explain why Vance resigned. The paper advanced the view that he probably felt he was pushed on the sidelines "but...by the other presidential advisor, Zbigniew Brzezinski, or by the president himself? Fundamentally, Vance and Brzezinski had presented two different proposals...Vance was in favor of negotiations and dialogue as a method, Brzezinski proposed challenge".

The Communist Party daily L'UNITA said that "a man whose vision of foreign policy was one of the points of equilibrium in the United States international strategy is leaving the government. He was the most prudent, most traditional and most realistic figure who little by little became the antithesis of National Security Advisor Brzezinski".

Milan's conservative daily IL GIORNALE NUOVO said that Vance's exit from government will deprive the Carter administration "also of a factor of ambiguity and controversy...It remains to be seen whether the greater harmony that should prevail within the Carter government will be in itself sufficient to assure a greater efficiency in the bleak time that lies ahead and the continually worsening international crisis".

Rome's LA REPUBBLICA voiced particular concern for the prospects of American foreign policy after Vance's resignation. The paper said that there is a sensation that United States leadership is falling apart. "This feeling has created a dangerous vacuum which could trigger irrational moves which have already brought the world dangerously close to war". On the domestic level as well, Vance's resignation will open a broad debate "because (its) real motivations are an accusation of the administration's overall strategy since the beginning of the year".

Rome's IL MESSAGGERO said that the resignation shows that even in the United States and near Carter there are men sensitive, above all, to the duties that the gravity of the moment imposes. "The key problem is to find a policy capable of saving detente and of creating a new image of the West".

While American foreign policy is in the grips of this latest development, Europe is unable to find agreement on the "EEC" budget. Milan's CORRIERE DELLA SERA said that the "Eurosummit has failed", although Europe did succeed in finding "a joint position towards the United States after the doubts and reticence sparked by the failed effort to rescue the hostages in Iran".

The root of the European conflict is Britain's demand for a drastic cut in its contribution to the Community budget. Rome's conservative IL TEMPO said that "disagreement over the British problem presages a new round of unknowns for the entire Community mechanism whose political consequences cannot be predicted".

L'UNITA: U.S. 'DECEPTION' ON IRAN A WARNING TO WESTERN ALLIES

LD291441 Milan L'UNITA in Italian 26 Apr 80 pp 1, 4

[Giuseppe Boffa commentary: "Is the Danger Clear Now?"]

[Text] The tragic news reported in Washington last night is very grave. The initial--and so far the only--version of the facts supplied by the White House seems contradictory, inadequate, embarrassed and, on the whole, hardly credible. What really happened remains largely a mystery--and we do not know whether or when this mystery will be clarified. But despite the U.S. Government's reticence, the extreme gravity of the facts seems unquestionable. So much so that it confirms for us that the world has entered a new phase in which the most disastrous threats seem possible and which therefore demands--to safeguard peace --a spirit of courageous initiative free from the very schemes which have been valid in the past.

Only one point seems clear. An act of force, for which preparations had been going on for some time, has been attempted with the use of weapons on Iranian territory. Of course one can breathe a sigh of relief (though only a temporary and anguished one) because the attack was called off, albeit for reasons which are still anything but clear, before it could pursue its objectives. Indeed, if the action had gone according to the intentions announced by Carter, the only reasonable forecast is that it would all have ended in a tragic massacre with incalculable repercussions. There is therefore a note of macabre irony in the official communique's claim that the aim of the operation was "to alleviate international tensions."

Even the U.S. allies were presented with a fait accompli. According to official statements, none of them was kept in the least in touch. The Italian Government has even added that it always advised against such an act of force. We hope this is true.

But there is something more worrisome than this. The heavy pressures exerted by the U.S. administration, almost in the form of an ultimatum, on the Europeans and the Japanese consisted of a demand that they join the sanctions decided by Washington precisely with the aim of avoiding recourse to force. Albeit with a degree of caution, the European governments had begun to yield to these demands with the decision taken 3 days ago in Luxembourg. Yesterday's press, through its correspondents in the U.S. capital, noted the satisfaction officially expressed by the U.S. administration and announced the news that any use of force could now be considered further postponed beyond the mid-May date previously mentioned.

It now seems, however, that while all this intensive diplomatic activity was going on the military action was already at an advanced stage of preparation and had probably already been decided on. Such deception is a grave warning to the Europeans. [paragraph continues]

Indeed it is clearer now what kind of infernal mechanism they would risk becoming involved in if--abandoning a strictly defensive and geographically well-defined interpretation of their alliance--they allowed themselves to be dragged down the slippery slope of a generic solidarity applicable in every situation.

There remains the point invoked by the Americans to justify their failed enterprise: the liberation of the diplomats held in Tehran. From the outset we have issued a negative verdict on the Iranian initiative. We have also hoped for a solution to the problem by means of tenacious negotiations, because there is no other acceptable solution. We still hope that the Iranians will show greater wisdom and calmness than their U.S. interlocutors and will shun any reprisals.

However, we have always added that in no event must the prisoners affair prompt acts of war. In the domestic and international press during the past few days there have been very widespread comparisons with Sarajevo. We would therefore like to invoke Sarajevo ourselves--just one aspect of it. From a strict legal viewpoint, the assassination of a grand duke heir to the throne and his consort might have seemed--especially in the 1914 political climate--certainly no more acceptable than the holding of the diplomats today. Yet for some time nobody has been willing to point to that event as an explanation of the real causes which prompted World War I and still less as a valid excuse for the decisions taken at that time by the Hapsburg Empire. The main difference is that now the consequences of a conflict would be much more terrible than then but, as then, very different from those predicted by its initiators.

With regard to the course of events, briefly summarized yesterday, we now await more exhaustive information than has been provided hitherto. Nevertheless, the facts do justify the alarm with which we have followed the gradual deterioration in the international situation in recent months. Our insistence in demanding an autonomous and constructive intervention by the European countries is also more justified than ever. In view of what has happened, even the decisions taken in Luxembourg by our EEC ministers seem more incautious than they did at the time. They very hopes of Europe playing a moderating role with respect to Tehran could in fact be seriously compromised by the chain of events and by the way in which the United States has treated its allies.

The dangers looming over us can never be overstated. Our countries are, from every viewpoint, the countries most exposed to the repercussions of an exacerbation of the conflicts. The European peoples and states can expect no good unless they are determined to consistently take the defense of their interests and if we remain imprisoned by old ideas or petty concerns at a time which demands the utmost responsibility. New and serious tasks must be met with equally new and well-pondered answers. This is what we have striven to do. The others must do the same.

SOVIET TRADE REPRESENTATIVE IN TURIN EXPELLED

LD292302 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 2200 GMT 29 Apr 80

[Text] A 33-year-old Soviet commercial expert, Andrey (Knyaplin), resident of Turin where a Soviet trade office is located, has been declared persona non grata and asked to leave Italy. The event, without precedent in our country, happened a few days ago but the news has only just become known in Genoa. It seems that Andrey (Knyaplin), according to the agreement on reciprocity, was not supposed to leave the place of residence without permission, yet he did so very frequently. It seems, in particular, that he used to go to Genoa when the Soviet maritime research ships arrived in port. At one time, various newspapers suggested that these ships were intercepting coded messages from the NATO base and the air force radar center at Melogno and Novi.

PRESS REACTS TO FAILURE OF U.S. RESCUE ATTEMPT

ID291201 [Editorial Report] Spanish newspapers published on 26 April devote extensive coverage to the failed U.S. rescue attempt in Iran, giving details of the operation and of worldwide and national reaction to it, and also carrying generally critical editorials. Barcelona LA VANGUARDIA publishes on page 18 an unattributed report on reactions by the Spanish Government and parties. It states that "sources close to the Foreign Ministry stated that at no time have there been consultations or information concerning the action undertaken by the United States. The same sources stated that the progress of events is being followed closely, and reiterated their firm condemnation of the taking of hostages, expressing once more their concern at the tension existing in the area. They believe that now more than ever it is necessary to redouble efforts to achieve a rapid and peaceful solution to the problem." The same report also cites Jose Miguel Bueno, Spanish Socialist Workers Party deputy and member of the Congress of Deputies foreign affairs and defense committees, as describing the operation as "a harsh blow to the already delicate situation in the Middle East," and "a further step toward the cold war which nobody wants."

Madrid ABC carries on page 1 a Jose Maria Carrascal dispatch critical of the operation which concludes: "If any lesson can be drawn from this U.S. tragedy, it is that it is more than high time that the U.S. Congress begin to control the President's actions and that the rest of the world--Europe and the Soviets in particular--seeks the means for resolving a crisis which, because it has not ended in time, is threatening all of us."

Madrid YA publishes on page 7 an editorial which maintains that the failure of the rescue attempt "has complicated even further the already complex puzzle of international tensions." It asserts: "What Carter has achieved is to drive Iran into the arms of the Soviet Union and to increase world tension to highly dangerous levels."

Madrid MUNDO OBRERO carries on page 7 an editorial which asserts that President Carter's decision, "in seeking a military solution, militarizes the situation in the world even further, and endangers everybody's security so that a common law criminal can continue to enjoy his retirement without having to face more than proven charges of genocide."

LA VANGUARDIA Editorial

ID300853 Barcelona LA VANGUARDIA in Spanish 26 Apr 80 p 5

[Editorial: "The Powder Keg"]

[Excerpts] The initial reactions of stupefaction caused by the news of the failed U.S. rescue attempt are being followed throughout the world by a feeling of real fear about what could happen more or less immediately in the already overheated area of the Middle East. The most relevant question about the failed operation is whether it is an isolated attempt or whether, on the contrary, it forms part of a broader strategy. The Washington defense secretary's initial statements prompt a pessimistic reply. They suggest that we are witnessing the beginning of a fearful escalation. Mr Brown stated that they will not relax until they have secured the rescue of the hostages at the Tehran embassy, and it is being asserted in the Iranian capital that their prisoners will not emerge alive from any further operation of this kind.

We have moved from words to deeds. The hazardous decision for which President Carter is taking responsibility can be criticized as much as people please--and indeed it has been derided a great deal--but the U.S. President's conduct cannot be accused of being inconsistent.

The enormous pressure of public opinion, demanding greater vigor and toughness, has resulted in the taking of decisions which deviate from the peaceful course. Whether crazy or otherwise, the failed attempt makes us fear that the drama does not end here.

EL PAIS Criticism

ID300855 Madrid EL PAIS in Spanish 26 Apr 80 p 8

[Editorial: "Operation Fiasco"]

[Excerpts] Notwithstanding everything, the attempt was rash. On the other hand, the moral drawn from these spectacular dramas usually depends on the outcome. Within the arbitrary nature of this kind of judgement there is a valid reasoning: In the world today, efficiency is rewarded and blunders are condemned. In light of the results, Carter has made a great blunder. To the image of powerlessness--which he has maintained for 5 months in the case of Iran--and that of the abuse of power--in obliging his allies to impose sanctions--he has added the image of unforgiveable inefficiency. He increases the loss of prestige of what we know for other reasons to be the strongest country in the world. To this he adds a number of possible consequences: He has involved Egypt--from whose territory the aircraft apparently departed--in an operation which a certain part of the world regards as anti-Muslim; he has compromised Bahrain, where they allegedly made a stopover. He has endangered the lives of the hostages, who are subject to the arbitrary conduct of the "Islamic students." He is driving Iran toward the USSR and the communist countries, intensifying a trend which had already started, as a possible way out of the Western sanctions for Tehran, despite the White House statement claiming that this operation was not carried out to the detriment of the sovereignty of the country in which it took place. He has lost aircraft and helicopters and caused eight deaths. Cyrus Vance was right when he exclaimed as his sole comment in London, where he is making one of his European stopovers to secure sanctions and support: "We are dismayed."

Thus the U.S. allies' indignation (in Japan there is talk of "betrayal") at the venture is understandable. Willy-nilly, the Western industrialized countries were moving with the natural reservations of those who are going to pick up the tab of solidarity toward the economic blockade of Iran decreed by Carter. As a result of this operation the Western governments will now have to reconsider the limits of their commitments vis-a-vis the United States, because we had already become accustomed to the fact that World WAR III had begun in the relatively tolerable technological and energy confrontations, but we were unaware that the steps necessary to light the fuse of overtly military confrontation were being taken.

It remains to be seen what the outcome on two fronts will be: On the international front, starting from the Iranian reaction, and on the national front--that is, the repercussions on the President's election campaign. Public opinion is so far rewarding Carter's consecutive mistakes, as a result of the psychology which leads it to prefer action and a leading role, however hazardous, to inertia and immobility. It is possible that this new--and very grave--mistake will drive him forward, within this rush of irrationalism. But it is hoped that at some point some lucidity will make the voters realize that they are placing a pedestal under the feet of clay of a leader who does not deserve this, and that situations dangerous for the country and for the world are arising.

PRESS REPORTS, COMMENTS ON U.S. RESCUE ATTEMPT

LD300957 [Editorial Report] The Scandinavian papers on 26, 27 and 28 April devote much of their foreign news pages to the story of and reactions to the failed American hostage rescue attempt, which is often referred to as a "fiasco." The paper's editorials also deal with the events and consequent developments at some length. Most extreme and least constructive of the comments is Denmark's AKTUELT on 26 April, which likens the present situation to that of 1914 when a group of students was able to upset the delicate political balance and unleash a holocaust. The paper expresses its worries over President Carter's possible actions in the future and the Soviet response to them. "The escalation in the hostage affair that we are now witnessing transforms it from a human tragedy of limited effect to an occurrence in international politics that can start an avalanche."

Other papers take a less hysterical view of events. Many express sympathy with President Carter in the difficult position in which he found himself and refrain from condemning the action, which they assert would have been applauded from all sides had it been successful. However, Sweden's SVENSKA DAGBLADET (26 April) says that the action "testifies to the desperation of a government that sees its alternatives of action cut away one by one," and Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE 26 April also reads it as a "sign of the desperation which has crept into the U.S. President's approach recently." BERLINGSKE TIDENDE goes on to speculate on the possibility of further military action, but rules it out. It takes up the thread in its editorial on the following day when it discusses the question of what future action is to be taken: Since it is now highly unlikely that direct negotiations between Iran and the United States can take place, it is up to Europe to step in and represent the United States. It says Europe is in an ideal position to do this since it is just launching a program of sanctions, which support U.S. rights in the matter, and is also free from any responsibility for the latest events; Europe must now take the initiative and press Iran with the threat of later sanctions which will be decided on 17 May. "The government heads of the Council of Europe, when they have finished raising their eyebrows and shaking their heads, have every reason and opportunity to give some momentum to an independent European political initiative which can steer the crisis onto the road of negotiation again," it states.

Oslo's AFTENPOSTEN also stresses the need for further political and diplomatic initiatives (in its 28 April editorial) and the need for European solidarity with and support for the United States (26 April). According to the latter: "What we can say with certainty is that it will not help the hostages if the rescue fiasco now leads to disagreement and discord between the United States and its European allies.... The United States must not be left to stand alone, either with its mistakes or with its unresolved hostage crisis."

Finally, SVENSKA DAGBLADET (26 April) raises the question of President Carter's political future after this unsuccessful action. The writer feels that as "the U.S. Government's powerlessness becomes more obvious" the fiasco "will strengthen the distrust of Carter among the United States' allies," and he wonders about his chances of reelection. The 26 April BERLINGSKE TIDENDE also writes: "Jimmy Carter has assumed full responsibility for the failed mission, and it may well weigh heavily on his term and future as President."

In addition to editorial comment, BERLINGSKE TIDENDE and AFTENPOSTEN also briefly report domestic political reaction to the failed mission. AFTENPOSTEN 26 April carries comments from leaders of Norwegian political parties. No one is surprised by the mission, but all express their surprise that it was not better prepared.

Also expressed is the hope that a similar attempt will not be made in the future to further worsen the situation. AFTENPOSTEN quotes Arvid Johansson, Labor Party chairman of the Storting Foreign Affairs Committee: "As the situation is now, I assume that all parties will refrain from new actions and counteractions. It can easily lead to an explosive situation in an area already seriously inflamed."

BERLINGSKE TIDENDE reports on 27 April the remarks by Danish Foreign Minister Kjeld Olesen who does not condemn the United States even though he regrets the fact that the United States did not consult its allies or await the outcome of the EEC's sanctions. He also told a Folketing Foreign Affairs Committee meeting Saturday that work would continue on the program of sanctions that the EEC is preparing. "The sanctions are merely to bring about the release of the hostages and are not aimed at the Iranian population." Work on the sanctions will continue "slowly and surely." There will be no panic reaction and it is important to keep "a cool head."

On 27 April BERLINGSKE TIDENDE also quotes Poul Schluter, chairman of the Folketing Conservative Party Group, who said that it is necessary to show solidarity with the United States. "West Europe is fooling itself if we refuse to show full solidarity with the United States, which is our only guarantee of our own security."

NATO Chief Joseph Luns was in Copenhagen over the weekend and BERLINGSKE TIDENDE quotes him in an interview (26 April) and in a speech (27 April issue) that he made. He said that the situation for NATO had not changed and that he had great sympathy with the United States. The fact that the United States had not consulted anyone in the matter was no bad thing in his opinion. "It was purely a U.S. affair which had nothing to do with NATO, and there were no NATO countries which, because of events in Iran, had taken military measures over and above those already taken against the background of the serious world situation in general." "I wish that the American action in Iran had been successful--it would not have solved all the problems, but it would at least have dealt with the biggest bone of contention between the United States and Iran, namely the hostages." "The American people would not have understood, if everything had not been tried, and it is my personal opinion that the United States has now done everything possible," he concludes.

ICELAND MAKES FISHING CONCESSIONS TO NORWAY

LD280715 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 16 Apr 80 p 12

[Morten Fyhn report: "Iceland in Difficulties; Accepts 200-Mile Zone Around Jan Mayen"]

[Text] Reykjavik, 15 April--In the tough negotiations with Norway on Jan Mayen, Iceland has had to give up a number of its earlier wide-ranging demands, and it seems clear this Tuesday evening that Iceland has accepted a Norwegian zone of 200 nautical miles around Jan Mayen. The zone will probably be set up in the near future, but not before attempts have been made to reach agreement on the approaching summer capelin fishing. Another negotiating meeting will therefore be held on 7 May, probably in Oslo.

Foreign Minister Knut Frydenlund does not hide the fact that the knowledge of Denmark's intention to set up a 200-mile zone off eastern Greenland in the next few weeks had an effect on the negotiations with Iceland. The Icelandic side said openly that Iceland found itself in difficulties and that it would be worse for Iceland to have to negotiate with the EEC on fishing quotas in the Greenland zone than to negotiate with Norway on Jan Mayen.

Before the negotiations began on Monday, prominent Icelandic Government members put forward three demands which were said to be inalterable: Iceland's own 200-mile zone would not be encroached on by that of Jan Mayen; Iceland alone should decide the total capelin quotas both inside and outside the Icelandic zone; and finally, Iceland should have at least one-half of the capelin caught in the Jan Mayen zone.

Iceland seems to have been successful only with the first of these demands, and then only as a medium-term solution. Norway has not finally accepted that the disputed 25,000 square km between the two zones shall be Icelandic waters, and reserves the right to make the question of a demarcation line the subject of negotiations at a later date.

As far as the demand that Iceland alone should decide the total permitted catch is concerned, it was with just this question that the concluding talks on Tuesday evening dealt. Norway has always insisted that this must be decided jointly by the two nations' marine researchers. Official Norwegian sources expect a satisfactory formulation of the point to be found on 7 May, during the next round of talks. Presumably a joint fisheries commission will be given the task of putting forward recommendations on total quotas.

Norway attempted to arrange a solution to the problem of the approaching summer fishing during the Reykjavik negotiations on last year's pattern, under which both countries had a numerically equal quota for capelin fishing off Jan Mayen.

It is unlikely that fishermen from other countries will fish for capelin within the future Greenland zone this year because of their lack of capacity. But, capelin talks will probably have to take place next year between Iceland, Norway and the EEC. The Norwegian delegation in Reykjavik considered it reasonable for Iceland to be allowed to have the same quota in the Jan Mayen zone this year as Norwegian fishermen. But on Tuesday this question was the subject of a strenuous tug of war. If Iceland is not granted an equal quota of Jan Mayen capelin with Norway, there is a danger that this will create a precedent for other types of fish in the area. There is good reason to believe that the next round of talks will be very difficult on this point.

Before the talks began Iceland had also put forward demands for substantial rights on the continental shelf around Jan Mayen. Norway has always insisted that agreement cannot be reached now since there is no mandate for this from the government or the Storting Foreign Affairs Committee.

Nevertheless, Iceland has attempted to include binding guarantees on this question in the eventual joint agreement on Jan Mayen, so far without success. It is expected that Norway and Iceland will be able to agree on a clause providing for negotiations on the continental shelf at a later date.

Iceland's Foreign Minister Olafur Johannesson told AFTENPOSTEN on Tuesday that it will probably be many years before exploitation of the possible resources on the continental shelf becomes an issue. In the meantime researchers from both Norway and Iceland will examine the shelf in greater detail. The nearest that Norway comes to making a concession is that Iceland has been told that there can be talks on the matter.

During the negotiations, the Icelandic delegation has put up a good fight, and there will probably be a violent political debate before the next meeting on 7 May. It is not impossible that Iceland will go back on several of the concessions made during the present round of talks. Several sources in Reykjavik are saying that the Icelandic delegation has gone too far in the talks with Norway. The fact is, however, that the expected presence of the EEC in the Greenland zone has totally changed the situation.

PAPER EXPECTS MORE RESIGNATIONS FROM AMONG CARTER AIDES

LD291052 Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 0920 GMT 29 Apr 80

[Press review on SUOMEN SOSIALDEMOKRAATTI on Vance resignation]

[Text] SUOMEN SOSIALIDEMOKRAATTI writes under the heading "Patience or Sword":

If the U.S. plan to rescue the hostages by a military operation had been successful, President Carter could look forward with confidence to May and the beginning of June, when his support is to be weighed in the remaining primaries. This idea probably affected the timing of the attempt, the paper notes. Carter was not successful, and a number of consequences can already be seen, the paper remarks.

Carter's most important foreign political trump, Cyrus Vance, has resigned because he opposed from the outset the plan to free the hostages by a military operation. It might be a difficult task to find a new secretary of state, SUOMEN SOSIALIDEMOKRAATTI writes. According to the paper, it seems that at present Carter above all needs a foreign political adviser who would emphasize the importance of patience.

Many Americans are fascinated by the idea of undoing the Gordian knot by a sword cut. A simple and clear solution to the problem which has become too difficult to understand may perhaps tempt new foolhardy attempts. Fresh failures can, however, prove to be dangerous. Besides, the chances of success are notably slimmer since the first attempt became known.

According to the paper, the greatest danger of military operations consists in the fact that arms and oil form a dangerous combination in the Gulf area. Fomenting military clashes in this area can cause the whole world to explode.

According to the paper, it is difficult to assess in our remote country what is happening behind the U.S. foreign political scenes. But SUOMEN SOSIALIDEMOKRAATTI writes that it seems that the President's aides will gradually leave him, beginning with his most important aide.

IRANIAN EMBASSY ATTACKED, SHOTS FIRED, HOSTAGES TAKEN

Initial Report of Trouble

WA301154 London REUTER in English 1146 GMT 30 Apr 80

[Text] London, April 30, REUTER--A British policeman was forced inside the Iranian Embassy today by a man armed with a rifle, Scotland Yard said. Armed police immediately surrounded the embassy at Princes Gate, Kensington. An eyewitness said he heard several shots fired.

Scotland Yard said the policeman, a constable on duty as part of the diplomatic protection service, was being held hostage inside the embassy building by two men and possibly three. About 50 policemen, some armed and wearing bulletproof vests, took up positions outside the embassy.

The telephone at the embassy was not being answered. Police said they did not yet know the cause of the incident. A receptionist at the Royal College of Medical Practitioners, next door to the embassy, said: "A window cleaner burst in here and said he had heard shots fired from inside the embassy."

Demands Made; Talks Underway

NC301422 Paris AFP in English 1418 GMT 30 Apr 80

[Text] London, April 30 (AFP)--One of the armed men holding a possible 23 hostages in the Iranian Embassy here today threatened, over the telephone to AFP, to kill the hostages and blow up the building if any rescue bid were attempted.

The commando spokesman told AGENCE FRANCE-PRESSE he represented the "Al-Nasir Mojahedin" group and demanded the release of 91 political prisoners in "Arabistan", the name given by nationalists to an ethnic Arab region of southwest Iran, notably in Abadan and Ahvaz (Khuzestan Province).

The spokesman said: "We want the entire world to hear our voice and know what the Iranian Government is doing to us in Khuzestan". The commando asked the British Government to "excuse" the group for choosing Britain for their action.

Meanwhile, police outside the embassy, near London's Central Hyde Park, said negotiations with the commando had entered a "very delicate phase", confirming talks were underway. Three ambulances waited outside the building as police reinforcements arrived to back up a 50-man cordon and special branch anti-terrorist marksmen. All traffic has been banned for a 400-metre (yard) radius round the Iranian Embassy. It was still not officially known how many gunmen were on the building.

FOREIGN SECRETARY TO VISIT U.S. 'THIS WEEKEND'

LD291340 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1331 GMT 29 Apr 80

[By Tom McMullan, PA diplomatic correspondent]

[Text] Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington intends going ahead with his visit to Washington this weekend, the Foreign Office confirmed today. A spokesman said the American administration had made clear that the visit would be welcome "at this time." This indication was given after the resignation of American Secretary of State Mr Cyrus Vance. Lord Carrington's programme was still being worked out but was expected to meet Mr Warren Christopher, the acting secretary of state.

PAPER DISCUSSES VANCE'S RESIGNATION, WEST'S LEADERSHIP

LD290933 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 29 Apr 80 p 18

[Editorial: "Leaderless West"]

[Text] Mr Vance's resignation, while not particularly damaging in itself--he was not a dominant force in the Carter administration--points up the essentially leaderless state of the Western alliance. This is because he seemed, until recently at any rate, to symbolise the nature of Mr Carter's presidency, which was basically pacifist and placatory. With the rescue raid on Iran, Mr Carter swerved away from his natural track. Mr Vance was left standing. Carter has left Vance rather than the other way around. Mr Carter never believed in the use of force. This may partly explain why, when he came to use it for the first time, it was a flop. Like Macbeth, he does not seem to have it in him to be bloody, bold and resolute, which was what an undertaking like the rescue mission demanded.

Senator Robert Byrd, Democrat leader in the Senate, summed things up yesterday when he said that Mr Carter had himself become a "hostage" to the Iran situation. What he was immediately referring to was Mr Carter's earlier pledge that he would not leave the White House to campaign in the election until the hostages had been released. But his words also have a wider meaning. After nearly three-and-a-half years in the White House, during which he repeatedly boasted proudly that not a single American had died in combat during his presidency, and that he would never use armed force except in defense against a direct attack on the United States, Mr Carter now finds himself at variance with both claims, and with a failure on top of that. It is in that sense that America can be said to have become leaderless. The President is at sixes and sevens with himself.

In this situation, it is more than ever necessary that Britain's partners in Europe, above all Britain, France and West Germany, bestir themselves to provide the strong leadership which the alliance is lacking. The alliance is one of equal powers in a constitutional sense, though most of its physical power resides in America. Even that physical power is now being called into question by worried Americans as a result of the Iranian fiasco, with its "equipment failures." After their meeting in Luxembourg yesterday, the heads of government of the nine EEC countries rightly affirmed their solidarity with "the government and people of the United States in their present time of trial." Something more is also needed. Urgent and intensive preparations should at once be put in hand for a summit meeting of the main Western countries and Japan, to decide a joint policy on Afghanistan and Iran. The preparations are what matter. Such a meeting would be useless unless there was a wide degree of agreement beforehand.

But even before a meeting "at the summit" (Churchill's phrase), the Western Allies must immediately make clear to the United States that a much closer working partnership and exchange of information is needed than has so far been the case over Iran and Afghanistan. The Allies are understandably annoyed that they were pressured into endorsing economic sanctions against Iran (which most of them think wrong) partly in order to avert military action, only to find that it immediately followed. One lesson that America might usefully draw from the present foul-up is that much harm results from the division of power on foreign affairs between the President's security adviser and the State Department. Mr Brzezinski enjoys making fiery remarks but he is no substitute for an effective secretary of state, with all the responsibility which that office should properly shoulder. Mr Vance's departure recalls this structural weakness.

PAPER REPORTS REPERCUSSIONS OF VANCE RESIGNATION

AT291224 Athens I KATHIMERINI in Greek 29 Apr 80 p 1

[Excerpt] Before the international furor which was created by the aborted U.S. military operation for the rescue of the hostages had time to abate, the first repercussions from this dramatic attempt became apparent for President Carter and the United States. These repercussions can be summed up by three primary developments:

A) The resignation of U.S. Secretary of State Cyrus Vance, who radically disagreed with the head of the White House on the question of using military force in an effort to free the American hostages. This resignation of the chief of the State Department--who, according to rumors, will be followed by other administration officials including State Department Spokesman Hodding Carter--will, it is believed, affect the President's election campaign.

B) The concealed anger of the European allies toward the United States which was expressed on the sidelines at the EEC summit conference. Although officially the "Nine" expressed full support for U.S. economic sanctions against Iran, their representatives privately did not conceal their condemnation of Washington's decision to "deceive" them by undertaking a military operation, also stressing that in the future it will be very difficult for Europe to completely trust the United States of America.

C) The drop in President Carter's popularity which is proved by the results of the Michigan primary election and by public opinion polls which have been conducted. The defeat of the head of the White House in Michigan, something which was not expected, is combined with a poll conducted by NEWSWEEK magazine according to which 50 percent of Americans will not vote for Carter.

GRAND NATIONAL ASSEMBLY FOREIGN POLICY DEBATE

TA262009 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1905 GMT 26 Apr 80

[From the Grand National Assembly Bulletin]

[Excerpts] Senator for Life Selahattin Ozgur addressed the Grand National Assembly on behalf of the National Unity Group. Pointing out that the main goal of foreign policy is to conciliate the interests of one country with those of another country, Ozgur said: Countries should find a way to live in an order based on equality and not superiority.

Requesting that, while formulating its foreign policy, the government consider the views of the National Assembly, the Senate and the public, Ozgur said that the developing events proved that the necessary importance is not being attached to this subject. Noting that the Middle East has been the crossroads of disagreement since World War II, Ozgur said: The competition between the superpowers for influence in the Middle East has been accelerated, especially since oil has become an important issue. The disagreements between the countries in the region have turned into disagreements threatening world peace.

Pointing out that one of the basic conditions for peace in the Middle East is the acceptance of a Palestinian state together with Israel, Ozgur noted that the Soviet military intervention in Afghanistan is unfortunate both for world peace and for the Soviet Union.

Ozgur described the fact that Iran took the U.S. Embassy officials hostages and did not release them as a cause for great concern and hoped that the solution to this issue would be based on commonsense and understanding and not on force. Stating that it is erroneous to respond to a mistake with another mistake, Ozgur continued: Yesterday, the whole world lived through the anxiety of the military operation undertaken by the United States in Iran in a bid to release the hostages and was concerned about it. The grief over the U.S. soldiers who died during the military operation added to the sorrow which was felt for the hostages. We hope that this abortive attempt will not lead to new ill-tempered actions.

Ozgur noted that in the conflict between the United States and Iran, rather than impose sanctions on Iran, Turkey can be more effective and useful by advising the Iranian officials regarding a solution on the basis of its historic and geographic ties with Iran.

Referring to the assassination of diplomats in their country of appointment by terrorist organizations, Ozgur said that this subject constitutes a source of anxiety for Turkey. Ozgur said: Being killed is more grave than being taken hostage. It is necessary to increase international awareness on this subject. It is up to our government to make such a move. This subject should be treated in the same manner as the hostages issue, when intergovernmental organizations and scientific organizations adopted stands and condemned the incident.

Referring to the subject of NATO, Ozgur demanded that Turkey's responsibilities in NATO do not conflict with its responsibilities in the region. Pointing out that numerous problems concerning the Aegean are awaiting solution, Ozgur stated: No one can expect us to consent to Greece's return to NATO's military flank under conditions which would jeopardize our rights and responsibilities in the Aegean.

Expressing the views of the presidentially-appointed senators, Senator Sefa Reisoglu said that the international economic interests and struggles for sovereignty were continuing viciously and that this was being reflected in the concerned countries' international structure. Stressing that the recent developments and the clash of interests between the big powers could not be considered separately, Reisoglu said: The strategic character of the Middle East and Near East and especially the economic and political effects of oil are attracting the attention of the powerful countries despite all the risks of this attention.

Reisoglu pointed out that the use of oil for political aims was making the country face increasingly serious and dangerous developments and even the possibility of military intervention. He noted that, if one of the powerful countries of the world intervened in the region, this could lead to a hot war with all its risks. He said that the results of and reactions to such an intervention must be assessed very carefully.

Reisoglu stressed that the failure of Iran to release the American hostages was not acceptable, but that all the countries, especially the United States, must remain calm and patient and pursue a peaceful path. Reisoglu added: Foreign issues must not be made heavier due to internal politics. If developments are taken out of their original form and turned into an issue of prestige between nations, then a solution becomes difficult and this might lead to more dangerous developments.

Reisoglu stressed that a strong nation of Turkey in the Middle East was very important for regional and world peace. He pointed out that Turkey must have a powerful and well-trained army equipped with modern weapons if it wants to protect its independence or dissuade others who might want to attack it.

Reisoglu stated that Turkey's alliance with a pact did not prevent it from developing good and friendly relations with its neighbors. He added: Pursuing a multifaceted foreign policy, having good relations with the Soviet Union and all our neighbors while at the same time maintaining our position in the NATO defense pact benefits our country and also serves world peace.

Speaking on behalf of the Nationalist Action Party [NAP], Deputy from Nigde Sadi Somuncuoglu said that solving foreign policy issues required patience. He said that if the country's realities and national problems were neglected and if speeches were made after it was too late, this would not solve any problems; on the contrary, it would exacerbate them. Criticizing the foreign policy pursued during the RPP government, Somuncuoglu stated that Turkey's traditional foreign policy, which had been pursued since the establishment of the republic, had been changed by the RPP government and that this had created a negative impression among Turkey's friends and allies.

Somuncuoglu pointed out that the Soviet Union's invasion of Afghanistan, the negative developments within Iran and the negative relations among Iran, Iraq and the United States were harming the balance in the Middle East. Somuncuoglu said that it was necessary to prevent another Afghanistan situation in the Middle East and to prevent this region from becoming the arena of the superpowers. The NAP deputy stressed that in strengthening its national unity Turkey must establish a sincere cooperation with the Muslim countries and its neighbors.

Describing international communism as the greatest danger for Turkey and the world, Somuncuoglu said: All humanity must oppose this danger together. It is impossible for the balance to be reestablished in the Middle East and the world--which are threatened by international communism--without Turkey.

Somuncuoglu said that effective efforts must be made so that Turkey's conflicts with Greece, Iraq and Syria can be resolved in line with its national interests as soon as possible. He added that Turkey must have an active and effective foreign policy with initiative. He said: If a passive and apathetic policy continues to be pursued and if national unity cannot be established above all political interests, then Turkey's problems will be further exacerbated and increased.

On the attacks being made against Turkey's representatives abroad, Somuncuoglu called for urgent, serious and valid measures against these attacks.

The NAP representative then pointed out that Turkey's national defense needs must be met in ways that support its foreign policy. He stressed that all countries must abide by the principle of nonintervention in domestic affairs and must respect territorial integrity.

National Salvation Party leader and Deputy from Konya Necmettin Erbakan addressed the Grand National Assembly on behalf of his party.

Referring to recent events in Muslim Middle East countries, Erbakan said Turkey is being surrounded by flames. Noting that two superpowers have emerged in the world since World War II, Erbakan said that later the EC, Japan, the PRC and the nonaligned countries were added to these powers. Pointing out the Islamic world is the latest power which has been added to these powers, Erbakan continued: As we enter 1980, the main item on the agenda of the entire world is Islam. There are two important items on the agenda of the Islamic countries. The first is the work being conducted to apply Islam in their lives and the second is the work to rid themselves of cultural imperialism--the work to become aware, to carry out a revival and to eliminate the injustices inflicted against them for years. However, the more the Islamic world becomes aware of and carries out a revival; the more external forces intensify their countermeasures to prevent this development.

Pointing out that Muslim countries produce half of the world's oil, Erbakan said that these countries constitute a large market for Western countries. Noting that this is why external forces are engaged in attempts to prevent Muslim countries--particularly Turkey--from developing, Erbakan said: External forces are resorting to the following measures to prevent the awakening of the Islamic world: First they attempt to alienate the people of these countries from Islam and to separate them from their true selves through capitalism, communism and cultural imperialism. Secondly, they try to inject racism into the Islamic countries, to divide and create enmity among them. Thirdly, they resort to establishing puppet governments rather than people's governments in these countries. Other measures include increasing anarchy in these countries, imposing military and economic embargoes and stipulating crushing conditions for their loans.

Aside from this, the Western countries want to plan for us, in the same way the IMF wanted to draw up a 3-year plan. All our sufferings are caused by this.

Referring to the incidents between Iran and Iraq, Erbakan said that the government remained silent in the face of these incidents, whereas Turkey should act as the mediator with regard to this issue.

Expressing the view that, by cancelling the NOTAM, the government lost its right to control the airspace over the Aegean, Erbakan claimed that the moves to insure Turkey's full membership in the EEC would be tantamount to surrendering the country to Europe.

Party leader Bulent Ecevit expressed the views of the RPP. On the U.S. operation that failed in Iran, Ecevit said that yesterday the region returned from the brink of a serious crisis that could have led to war as a result of a technical failure that caused the death of eight persons. Ecevit said that this attempt had further increased the dangers and tension in the area. He added: It is a cause for concern in itself to see that a powerful country, which has assumed great responsibilities with regard to world peace and security, is capable of undertaking actions that can set the region as well as the whole world on fire in the most sensitive region and at a most sensitive time.

Ecevit recalled that Turkey was on the firing line of a war that could start at any minute in the region. He stressed that Turkey could not be blindly dragged behind its Allies' indecisiveness, conflicts or mistakes. Ecevit pointed out that unless Turkey was very careful it could find itself unwillingly taking sides in war it should not be in.

Recalling that the Ottoman Empire had been dragged into World War I because of two German warships, he added: Unwillingly, we have nightmares that the Incirlik Base can now be used like those two ships. The government must take the necessary measures regarding this issue. It must announce its measures and must have absolute and clear assurances that neither Incirlik nor any other joint installation will be permitted to be used outside the rules or the original aims. None of the joint installations in Turkey can be used outside NATO aims or without the Turkish Government's permission. The government must guarantee that the installations and other facilities in Turkey will never be used outside NATO's aims or in ways that will trouble our friends in the region. The government must make an official statement that will not leave any cause for concern or doubt in this regard.

Ecevit charged that Turkey knew how to act in the region much better than its Western Allies and friends. He added that Turkey was not a country that could follow the instructions of its Allies in issues concerning its own region. He said that at every opportunity Turkey must clearly show that it acts as a true element in the region in its relations with the Muslim countries, and not as the representative of the West.

Ecevit said that the nation must remain very loyal to Ataturkist nationalism and laicism in the face of the dangers that emerged in Turkey and that are being instigated from outside. He called on the parties and legislators to put an end to internal conflicts and to jointly look for ways of approaching the regional problems with a determined national policy. He added that it was essential to make the necessary efforts to join in solving basic national problems.

Foreign Minister Erkmen then addressed the Grand National Assembly again. He said that he disagreed with the charges that the failure to send troops to Afghanistan was against the national foreign policy. He also said that the remarks about secret CENTO meetings did not reflect the truth.

Erkmen said that the decision not to reexport to Iran should not be described as an economic embargo. As for becoming an EEC member, this was a decision to be taken by the Turkish Grand National Assembly.

The foreign minister stated that the bases in Turkey could be used only within the framework of NATO's aims and that it was out of the question to use them against the Muslim world.

Erkmen said that he disagreed with the criticism levelled against his earlier statement that Turkey's prestige within NATO had been damaged during the Ecevit government and that his government was now trying to regain NATO's trust. Erkmen said: The honorable Ecevit's remarks that the Soviet Union is not a threat to Turkey has undermined our Allies trust in Turkey--members of NATO which is an organization that was established to counter the Soviet Union.

RPP Deputy from Zonguldak Bulent Ecevit took the rostrum to reply to the foreign minister's remarks. Ecevit said that his government had not tried to restore Turkey's prestige in the eyes of Turkish public opinion. Ecevit described as unfortunate the remarks made by Foreign Minister Erkmen in connection with NATO's trust regarding Turkey at the end of a meeting in Brussels. Ecevit said: Turkey's foreign minister should not have talked like that.

Ecevit recalled that his government had placed the Turkish rights in the Aegean on the agenda once again and that it had made efforts regarding the issue. He added that the foreign minister had not sufficiently clarified the views of the government with regard to the Turkish rights in the Aegean.

TERCUMAN COMMENTS ON INVOLVEMENT IN U.S., EEC SANCTIONS ON IRAN

NC280940 Istanbul TERCUMAN in Turkish 24 Apr 80 p 3

[Editorial by Guneri Civaoglu: "New Crisis in U.S.-Turkish Relations"]

[Excerpts] Turkish-U.S. relations, which have taken so much time and effort to improve, are about to suffer a new crisis. The U.S. appeal to its allies "to participate in the embargo on Iran and the positive response of the Common Market countries and Japan" has pushed Turkey into an embarrassing predicament.

The other day, the foreign ministers of the nine Common Market countries answered in the affirmative to President Carter's appeal. Thus, the entire Western world has agreed to cooperate with the United States in imposing an embargo on Iran. The decision of the Common Market countries will go into effect on 17 May and, as of that date, this question will appear on the agenda regarding U.S.-Turkish relations: "Where is Turkey, at a time when all the Allies are siding with the United States?" This dramatic question will be taken up by influential newspapers and TV networks which form the United States public opinion. The strong Greek lobby will harp on it continually. The foreign relations committees of both the Senate and the House of Representatives will also take it up.

It would be "optimism bordering on naivete" to think that Carter, who already lacks a strong personality, could weather such a strong and intensive storm. We must, however, expect this deteriorating situation in the United States to painfully and adversely affect U.S.-Turkish relations.

The aid, which is still on paper, might remain on paper. Pressures which the IMF and other Western powers may bring to bear on Turkey and which would result in freezing their contributions, should not come to us as a "surprise." Despite all this, we are of the opinion that Turkey cannot take part in an embargo on Iran for the following reasons:

1. Turkey's obligations toward the United States are confined to two areas: NATO and the bilateral agreement concerning the U.S. bases in Turkey intended for monitoring the Soviet Union. As U.S.-Iranian relations are outside the scope of these two agreements, Ankara has no obligation to participate in the embargo imposed on Iran. Let us look at this matter from another angle. Suppose Turkey decided for some reason or other to impose sanctions on Syria or Iraq, would the United States participate in this move? Certainly not.

2. Turkey is a secular state, but almost its entire population is composed of Muslim Turks. Turkey is a Middle Eastern country. Iran is a Muslim country also; 15 million of its population are Azerbayjani Turks. Like Turkey, Iran is also a Middle Eastern country. These two countries have so much in common and are not in conflict on any issue. No Turkish Government can impose an embargo on Iran without convincing reasons. The Justice Party government is in fact a minority government. The general structure of the electorate as well as the common line of the parties supporting the government constitute an "Islamic-Turkish synthesis." The main opposition party, on the other hand, is outside the orbit of Western politics. Such a political composition makes it impossible for Turkey to adopt a resolution in favor of the embargo suggested by the United States.

3. Turkey once committed a diplomatic blunder against the Islamic world by supporting France against Algeria; it has been impossible to erase the effects of this blunder. A similar serious blunder cannot be committed now.

Ismet Inonu used to liken relations with superpowers to sharing the same bed with a bear. We do not know how much understanding the United States would show in a bed like that. But what we do know is that we should not be too happy and optimistic about it.

Ankara, for the time being, has adopted a "wait and see" policy. We hope that by May 17, developments will have decreased tension in U.S.-Iranian relations, thus giving Turkey a little more time.

VOTCP CRITICIZES U.S. RESCUE ATTEMPT, HERALDS MAY DAY

TA291055 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 29 Apr 80

[Unattributed commentary: "The U.S. Adventure in Iran and Plans to Drag Turkey Into the Fire"]

[Text] U.S. imperialism and the Carter administration have launched a provocative military attack against Iran under the pretext of rescuing the hostages there. This military provocation by the Carter administration is an act of aggression against a sovereign and independent state. This act also constitutes a flagrant violation of international law and human rights. Such an act, which seeks to undermine the possibilities for peacefully solving the problems between the two countries, also endangers the lives of the hostages. This means that this aggressive act and military provocation by U.S. imperialism and the Carter administration were not aimed at saving the lives of the hostages.

The primary aim of this aggressive act is to crush the Iranian Revolution; its secondary aim is to restore in Iran a regime similar to the one administered by the shah and to strengthen U.S. sovereignty in the region. U.S. provocations in recent months have been aimed at creating confusion in Iran and the U.S. military concentrations in the Persian Gulf are clear proof of U.S. goals. This military adventure is a very dangerous extension of attempts made to deploy nuclear warheads in Western Europe; undermining the disarmament talks being held with the Soviet Union and creating a cold war atmosphere. It is apparent that U.S. imperialism and the Carter administration are initiating these attempts and are trying, through pressure, to drag the other NATO countries into a dangerous adventure.

There has been worldwide reaction against the military adventure of the Carter administration. All peace-loving individuals are expressing their hatred and indignation, and are staging mass protest demonstrations against this attack which threatens world peace.

There has also been extensive reaction within the United States to the Carter administration's aggressive act. Many U.S. senators have called on Carter to resign. Secretary of State Vance has resigned.

Socialist countries and communists are the most ardent supporters of peace and opponents of imperialist attacks which openly threaten world peace. The Soviet Union has denounced this attack directed against sovereign and independent Iran and the Iranian Revolution, describing it as an unprecedented adventure aimed at increasing tension in our region and the world. At a time when imperialism is staging aggressive acts threatening peace, European Communist and workers parters met in Paris on 28 April to discuss peace and disarmament, which is the aspiration of all humanity.

Our people have strongly denounced this attack launched by U.S. imperialism against Iran and the Iranian Revolution. Our people are united with the Iranian people. The Demirel government and the reactionary fascist forces have trampled upon our national sovereignty through bilateral slavery agreements and the bases ceded to U.S. imperialism. They have made our country the tool of imperialist attacks and adventures. The Incirlik Base was employed in the military attack the United States launched against Iran. Demirel and Foreign Minister Erkmen are trying to conceal this fact from our people.

As has been stated by a majority within our nation--from all the peaceful forces in Turkey to communist and RPP patriots to certain sections within the NSP [National Salvation Party]--the bilateral slavery agreements give U.S. imperialism all kinds of possibilities to perpetrate military aggression even without the knowledge of [Turkish] governments. Demirel has openly expressed his support for such military attacks by U.S. imperialism in a statement to the effect that this attempt has not caused any damage to Iran and to neighboring countries. He has shown that he is the loyal lackey of the United States and that he is a ferocious enemy of our independence.

The Demirel government has become the U.S. gendarme in our region. To this end, he is trying to have gills of oppression and the state of emergency bill approved in the assemblies. Patriots, peaceful forces and forces in favor of independence within the parliament should not permit the approval of oppression bills and the bilateral slavery agreements by the assemblies. Our country should not be a tool of imperialist adventures. Our people will definitely oppose this. The working class, the toilers and all patriotic forces will march with banners of independence on May Day.

Let the slavery agreement concluded with the United States be torn up! Let Turkey withdraw from NATO! Let the U.S. bases be dismantled! Struggle against U.S. attempts to drag Turkey into new military blocs and against all imperialist demands! Struggle against state security courts, bills of oppression and for democratic rights!

On May Day these slogans will be spread from May Day arenas throughout the country. Organized mass celebrations on May Day--the international unity, solidarity and struggle day of the working class--is tantamount to the struggle for democracy, independence and peace at a time when imperialism in increasing tension in our region and when a semimilitary regime of oppression is being imposed on our country. It is tantamount to the struggle for bread and freedom.

The freedom and independence of our people and our country depends upon the unity of action of all progressive and patriotic forces. Communists, members of the TLP [Turkish Labor Party] and the TSWP [Turkish Socialist Workers Party], RPP members and supporters, Kurdish revolutionary democratic forces and all progressive patriotic forces join together against the path toward imperialist slavery, nuclear holocaust, national destruction and fascist threat in our country! Forward to May Day!

ECEVIT SCORES GOVERNMENT STAND ON PUBLIC ORDER, MAY DAY

TA291749 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1400 GMT 29 Apr 80

[Excerpts] RPP leader Bulent Ecevit held a news conference in the parliament today. Pointing out that dirty tricks were being hatched in order to divide the people and weaken the RPP, Ecevit expressed his views on the subjects of the election of a new president, public order and May Day as follows:

[Begin Ecevit recording] Though at the beginning he opposed the idea, honorable Demirel has been busy for the last 2 days finding a solution to the problem of the election of a new president through limited consultations among party leaders. This search, conducted within a limited framework, gives the impression that he is looking for a solution to this problem within the national front parties.

Dirty tricks are being hatched in order to divide the people and to weaken the RPP. The government is, on the one hand, cruelly oppressing part of our citizens through sectarian and racial discrimination and, on the other, it is using its men to tell them: You see, even the RPP cannot save you. This can only drag these citizens to unknown adventures behind certain fake saviors. The plot is obvious: First, ruthless antidemocratic methods are being used to oppress certain sectors of the people and then a small political party--established as the tool of divisionism by internal and external exploiters--is being used to lead RPP members astray. An example of this method was seen today. This is a plot by those who are planning to exploit us by dividing our people. The only way to foil such plots is to rally around the RPP--which tries to achieve a decent way of life first and foremost through Kemalist nationalism, laicism and democracy.

On this occasion, I would like to express once more my worries and concern over the May Day [celebrations]. The stand of the prime minister and his government on this subject is extremely wrong and dangerous. With their stand, the prime minister--as well as certain ministers--are inciting both the state forces and the citizens to react in a way which is not compatible with the democracy and the laws in the event of illegal actions and activities during the May Day events; only measures within the framework of the democratic state of law should be taken. No one has the right to incite the state forces or the citizens for so-called [security] measures. I hope that--even if they are approved by the prime minister--the state forces will refuse to resort to such provocations and will discharge their duties within the framework of law and democracy, without disregarding them.

I am calling on our worker citizens not to heed illegal strike appeals on May Day. The democratic rights of the workers in Turkey have been provided by our laws to a most advanced degree. It will be recalled how, in the past, workers who obeyed illegal calls for strike have lost their work and bread. During periods when confusing plots are being hatched, workers can only be saved by uniting among themselves and by supporting the democratic system.

It is only by preserving their rights through lawful ways and means that workers can defend themselves against injustices and pressures and can foil the plots and not by opposing the laws. Today we can clearly observe how the government and certain business circles are involved in plots aimed at curtailing or shelving the workers rights. Incidents that may break out or may be staged by force during May Day could be used as an excuse to curtail workers rights. I would like to reiterate that the RPP--which is the party which has brought democracy and the democratic workers rights to Turkey--is and will be the most determined defender of these rights. Moreover, the independent judicial organs--which are disliked by certain ruling forces--are the constitutional defenders of workers rights. If we add to these factors the democratic unity and lawful solidarity of the workers, no one nor any sector in Turkey will have the power to curtail the workers rights. [end recording]

TERRORISTS ATTACK TWO OFFICIALS IN SEPARATE INCIDENTS

Provincial Leader Wounded

TA241836 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 24 Apr 80

[Text] Nationalist Action Party Usak provincial leader Ali Koleoglu was seriously wounded by two armed terrorists today.

According to information obtained from Usak public prosecutor Ugur Ibrahim Hakkioglu, Koleoglu was attacked and serioulsy wounded at his office in Kume District. He later underwent surgery. DEMIREL APPEALS TO JP FOR UNITED PRESIDENTIAL VOTE

TA291832 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 29 Apr 80

[Text] Speaking at the joint meeting of his party's Senate and National Assembly groups, Justice Party [JP] leader and Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel said that the point had been reached when the Justice Party would have to prove its strength and power in solidarity. Demirel called on the Justice Party members of parliament to vote in unison for Deputy from Istanbul Sadettin Bilgic, the Justice Party candidate for the post of president. Recalling that by proving its solidarity the Justice Party would gain much and would lose nothing, Demirel said: We have 262 votes in the parliament. Those millions who cherish and support us are urging us to increase this figure. It is because they know that many problems can be solved through determination and solidarity that they are urging us to do so. Let us all consider it our personal task to express the unity and solidarity of our party. Demirel added that he was convinced that his colleagues were aware of the importance of the issue. Pointing out that in order to be completely successful the party had to prove its strength and presence, Demirel said: If we achieve no results today (in the presidential elections) we should all be back here tomorrow. If we obtain no results tomorrow, then we should all be back here the day after that. It is imperative to keep alive and fresh the hope of millions who have trusted us.

REPORTAGE ON COMMUNIST PARTIES' MEETING IN PARIS

TANJUG Wrapup

LD292252 Belgrade TANJUG in English 1600 GMT 29 Apr 80

[Text] Paris, April 29 (TANJUG)--The Paris meeting of some communist and workers' parties of Europe, convened at the initiative of the Communist Party of France and the Polish United Workers Party, will adopt an appeal to European peoples at the close of its work today. The public will be informed on the text of the appeal at a press conference this afternoon.

The meeting is being held behind the closed door. Up to now the public is informed on parts of speeches by several delegation heads, among them of the Politbureau member of the Communist Party of France Maxime Gremetz and candidate member for the Politbureau of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union Central Committee Boris Ponomarev.

It stems from what has been made public and what could be learned that the guilt for the renewal of the arms race and for the deterioration of the international situation falls exclusively on the Western military bloc, especially on the United States.

Gremetz, chief delegate of the French Communist Party, insisted on each party's sovereign right to participate in this meeting or not, adding that his party will not make a criterion of it. The CPSU delegation and some other delegations sharply attacked the policy of the U.S. and NATO treaty [words indistinct] but anyhow left a possibility of cooperation with other peace-loving forces in Europe along the lines to be used in the appeal.

Athough the hosts specified at the outset that peace and disarmament in Europe was the only one agenda item for this meeting, mention was made of other crises, nevertheless. Turf, delegation of the Communist Party of Belgium, set out in his capacity of observer that some non-European developments, too, influence the state of affairs in Europe, such as military interventions in relation to the U.S.-Iranian conflict and the Afghanistan problem. His party will not sign the appeal, Turf announced, and will consider the results of the Paris meeting later.

Appeal for Joint Action

LD301046 Paris Domestic Service in French 0600 GMT 30 Apr 80

[Excerpts] The European communist parties' conference on peace and disarmament ended in Paris yesterday. The European communist parties launched an appeal to the other political groupings of the left, an appeal both for consultation and joint action in support of detente in Europe. Here is Bernard Vallete:

Yes, in the end what has come out of this conference is that the participants have almost been able to lay the blame on those absent, among others the Italians and Spaniards, by cutting the grass from under their feet. They bluntly launched an appeal to the peace-loving peoples of Europe for peace and disarmament--what I would call an ecumenical appeal with a very wide sweep sociologically and politically--and ending with a hand extended to Christians, socialists and social-democrats. The parties who are brothers of Moscow have just changed their tune: We are suddently in the great orders of fraternity, smiles and relaxation. Well, without going so far as to speak of a change in line, maybe something is happening in the PCF and maybe that something is not totally unconnected with certain presidential elections.

PCF's Gremetz Comments

LD301416 Paris Domestic Service in French 0545 GMT 30 Apr 80

[Joseph Paleton interview in Paris with PCF Political Bureau member Maxime Gremetz--live]

[Excerpts] [Question] Maxime Gremetz, the 20 communist parties which gathered in Paris on the initiative of the PCF and the Polish United Workers Party [PZPR] have launched an appeal for peace and disarmament. In fact, as one might have expected, Mr Gremetz, it is an appeal against the deployment of new NATO missiles in Europe. Is that not very exactly and very precisely what Moscow expected of you?

[Answer] Well, on the one hand I must recall that this initiative was taken by the PCF and the PZPR, that we had a precise and limited objective: that is, given the international situation today, given the threats to peace, we wanted to launch an appeal to the peoples because it lies with every man and woman to intervene in these issues which concern them. And at the same time we wanted to launch positive and constructive slogans which would also be proposed to all forces of Europe. You have doubtless noted that in the appeal we propose to examine the specific preparation of an initiative with the communists, socialists, social democrats and all peace-loving and progressive forces. In a world, the objective which we set ourselves has been realized, and I believe that it is an excellent thing and that all men and women in our country who are worried by this issue and who want peace and disarmament will be pleased with it.

[Question] You raise the problem of the deployment of U.S. missiles in Europe in a few years' time, but did you or did you not raise the problem of the Soviet SS-20's directed at all of us, which would not spare the French Communists in the case of conflict?

[Answer] But, clearly, since the slogan which has been proposed [passage indistinct]. Of course we discussed them. The slogan which has been proposed concerning the Pershing and cruise missiles is quite clear. We say: NATO's decision must be cancelled or suspended; avoid the implementation of that decision. And talks must be started immediately. That would allow negotiations to be started on both the Pershing and cruise missiles and on the SS-20's. What man or woman in Europe or France would not be satisfied to see that these issues were, in fact, being discussed and that we were approaching a reduction in arms?

[Question] There were nine marked absences including the communist parties of Italy, Spain, Romania, Yugoslavia--generally, the nonaligned. Well, what remains today of Eurocommunism for which this meeting seems to have tolled the knell?

[Answer] Well, listen, what is Eurocommunism? It is simply--and this is important--the fact that communist parties in the world, not only in Europe but the world, opt for democratic socialism within liberty as the basic answer for extricating their country from the crisis, and that they choose a democratic path as the way to achieve this. I do not see how this open, unified meeting of all the communist parties can call Eurocommunism into question with its [word indistinct] which I have just indicated.

[Question] A last word, Mr Maxine Gremetz: You are legitimately worried about detente. But if, as you have said, the Americans are firebrands and warmongers, wouldn't the best way to preserve detente be for the Soviets to make a gesture, to leave Afghanistan or to contribute to the release of hostages in Iran?

[Answer] I simply note that the Soviet Union has made numerous individual proposals for peace and disarmament and that it has just unilaterally taken the decision to withdraw troops--200,000 men, and 1,000 tanks--from the GDR and that it is making proposals for negotiations on progress toward reducing armaments. On the subject of Afghanistan I would simply tell you that it is up to the Afghan people to decide the future of their country. Moreover, on this subject everyone, including the socialist countries, advocates a halt to foreign interference by U.S. imperialism through the intermediary of Pakistan, and then the Afghan people will be able to regain their nonaligned status as they wish.

'NEUTRAL-NONALIGNED' COUNTRIES HOLD PREPARATORY MEETING FOR CSCE

AU281317 Vienna WIENER ZEITUNG in German 26 Apr 80 p 2

[APA report: "Preparations for the Madrid Followup Conference"]

[Text] Geneva--A consultation meeting of the so-called "N-N-countries," that is, the four European neutrals and the nonaligned countries, will be held in Vaduz, Liechtenstein on 28-30 April. The conference is to prepare concrete suggestions and proposals for the second CSCE followup conference slated for November in Madrid.

The Austrian CSCE delegation is headed by Minister Franz Ceska, who is chief of the CSCE and Disarmament Department at the Vienna Foreign Ministry.

The Austrian delegation will seek agreement with the other European "N-N-countries" primarily on suggestions and proposals for Madrid about further confidence-building measures in the sphere of "Basket One" as well as an expansion of cooperation in the field of economy and trade in the sphere of "Basket Two," including questions of energy supply. As regards Basket Three, Austria plans together with Switzerland and with the support of the other "N-N-countries," to submit to the Madrid CSCE followup conference new proposals and suggestions about the exchange of information and about freedom of the press.

KREISKY COMMENTS ON VANCE RESIGNATION

AU301001 Vienna ARBEITER-ZEITUNG in German 30 Apr 80 p 5

[Text] Vienna (APA)--Commenting on the resignation of U.S. Secretary of State Vance, Chancellor Kreisky delcared on Tuesday [29 April] after the Cabinet meeting that he was not familiar with the details of the matter, and thus was not in a position to judge whether or not it would entail a change in U.S. foreign policy. However, he added, Vance has always carried out his task with a great sense of responsibility.

U.S. EMBASSY 'SECURITY TEST' CRITICIZED FOR LACK OF WARNING

AU301246 Vienna ARBEITER-ZEITUNG in German 30 Apr 80 p 1

[APA report: "Vienna: U.S. Leathernecks 'Attacked' Embassy; Police Not Informed--Kreisky: 'Awkward Action'"]

[Text] Vienna (APA)--It might have led to bloodshed. In order to test the protection of their embassy, 16 U.S. leathernecks staged a practice attack on the U.S Embassy on Boltzmanngasse, in Vienna's Alsergrund District, on Monday [28 April] at 2050 hours local time. The Austrian policeman guarding the diplomatic building did not know anything about the practice run. It nearly erupted into gunfire.

Chancellor Kreisky was informed about the incident the very same night. In a first comment to ARBEITER-ZEITUNG, he said: "We will have to talk about this with the Americans. It was an awkward action, especially as far as the failure to inform the Austrian authorities is concerned."

Interior Minister Lanc also expressed grave concern. It could have led to a disaster, he told ARBEITER-ZEITUNG and predicted: "The incident will be the subject of an extensive talk with those in charge of security at the U.S. Embassy."

As has been learned from usually well-informed sources, that the Americans have already apologized for failing to inform the authorities about the planned operation.

The emergency squad of Vienna police, who surrounded the building with an alert unit, cleared up the dangerous incident. A high-ranking police officer said: "The Vienna policeman actually deserves a medal for not having opened fire during the night operation of the U.S. Marines. The consequences would have been 'incalculable'." Since the operation had not been agreed on beforehand, the Austrian policeman assigned to guard the embassy did not know what was going on. He was therefore on the point of opening fire on the intruders when he though better of it and called in the police emergency squad.

The heavily armed Marines, who under international law are only in charge of internal protection--inside the embassy, had come to the embassy in several vehicles, climbed the wall and rushed into the large embassy park. A few seconds later the Vienna police headquarters contacted the U.S. Embassy on Boltzmanngasse through a direct telephone line. The U.S. representatives quickly cleared up the matter: "Please do not get excited; we are only having a security test in which we are practising an assault on the embassy."

In state security policy quarters the arbitrary action of the U.S. Marines has caused some astonishment. Hofrat Hejkrlik told ARBEITER-ZEITUNG: "Normally we are informed even when the fire alarms in the embassy building are checked." U.S. guards caused a disturbance once before, during the summit meeting with Brezhnev.

GENSCHER INVITES MUSKIE TO VISIT BONN IN MAY

ID301456 Hamburg DPA in German 1445 GMT 30 Apr 80

[Text] Bonn--Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher has invited the newly appointed U.S. secretary of state, Edmund Muskie, to visit Bonn in May. A Foreign Ministry spokesman announced today that, in his congratulatory telegram to Muskie, Genscher renewed the invitation issued earlier to his predecessor, Cyrus Vance, to pay a visit in May.

GENSCHER WELCOMES MUSKIE APPOINTMENT; KOHL PROMISES SOLIDARITY

ID301512 Hamburg DPA in German 1439 GMT 30 Apr 80

[Text] Bonn--Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher has "very much welcomed" the appointment of Senator Edmund Muskie as new U.S. secretary of state. This was stated today by a Foreign Ministry spokesman. Genscher knows Muskie well from several meetings in Washington and Bonn. The federal foreign minister was pleased that a man of Muskie's stature, who enjoyed national and international esteem, was to be Secretary of State Cyrus Vance's successor.

In a congratulatory telegram to Muskie, CDU Chairman Helmut Kohl stressed that the CDU shared the great concern for the security of the Western world and the preservation of world peace, with great sympathy for the United States and its policy. Its special sympathy in this respect was concerned with the fate of the U.S. hostages in Iran. Kohl assured Muskie of his undivided friendship and solidarity with the U.S. people.

FOREIGN MINISTRY OFFICIAL VIEWS EC FAILURE, VANCE RESIGNATION

DW300900 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0447 GMT 29 Apr 80

[Heribert Schwan interview with Klaus von Dohnanyi, minister of state, at the Foreign Ministry in Bonn; date not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] How do you assess what has happened in Luxembourg? How profound is the confidence crisis in the EC?

[Answer] After the failure of this conference it is necessary, to begin with, to try to sort out and carefully examine what actually happened. I personally was not in Luxembourg. Considering the news and what I have been told, I would say indeed that the crisis will now be profound. Surely it is very hard for the remaining eight members to comprehend the British position.

[Question] It is the second time in 6 months that a summit conference of the heads of government failed in an attempt to come to terms with Prime Minister Thatcher on the problem of the British EC contribution. Where do we go from here? Presumably nobody wants to go through the same spectacle as in Dublin and Luxembourg for a third time.

[Answer] I agree with you there. We have made an offer. We submitted one in Dublin that had prospects for the future. Then between Dublin and Luxembourg, in a multitude of talks and negotiations in the community but also directly with our British friends, we tried to make some headway. The offer submitted in Luxembourg was suited for solving an essential part of the British problems. It is my opinion, furthermore, that it is now up to the British to say how they visualize the course from here on.

[Question] How can this serious setback for European unification policy be digested at all? The British attitude definitely seems to be irreconcilable. All options for compromise have been exhausted, if I understand the chancellor correctly. So where do you see a solution?

[Answer] I said in the beginning that what needs to be done first after the failure of this conference is to take a look at the details and see whether this or that thread might be picked up again somewhere. But we really racked our brains prior to the conference. In talks we sought to fathom what options for compromise existed. This is also what determined our offers to Great Britain. It seems to me that it will really and primarily be up to Great Britain now, and perhaps also to the institutions--meaning the Commission--to ponder ways of getting out of the dilemma.

[Question] Would it not be consistent for Great Britain to review its relationship with the EC again?

[Answer] I would not take this into consideration. I believe that we on the continent as well as in Great Britain itself are bound to be intensively interested in the continuation of the Community. But this really is not the alternative as far as we are concerned. The alternative is to find a way of solving the problem. I think Great Britain must now make a basic contribution toward this end.

[Question] Maybe the British Government chief is also under the pressure of public opinion. We know how tired the British have become of the European Community. The majority pleads today for leaving it. Serious considerations exist in the Conservative government party to alter London's full membership in the European Community--to a noncommital status as an associate member, for example. The majority of the British Labor opposition is against Great Britain's membership in the European Community anyway. Would it really be that bad if Great Britain had another function in the European Community than heretofore?

[Answer] You know, public opinion naturally varies. Governments are not there to yield to the ups and downs of public opinion. I know the opinion poll data in Great Britain, but I believe that the Community--as it has grown toward the south, planning to include Greece, Spain and Portugal--that the Community needs a basis including Great Britain. This is naturally a matter the British have to examine and decide on. But from our point of view it cannot be an advantage if Great Britain were to slacken or even discontinue its relations with the Community.

[Question] Nothing works any more in the European Community. It is not merely a matter of the British contribution to the budget. The agricultural market and the fishery policy are also involved. Some sort of conclusions must be drawn here?

[Answer] Well, I would say that the results of negotiations must be examined here first. Agricultural prices have hung closely together with the British contribution to the budget. You know that the problems connected with the British contribution to the budget are created primarily by the fact that the British pay much into the agricultural market while they produce few agricultural products, so that they get little out of it. The British have complained about this difference. The difference is the British problem, so to speak.

One should not be surprised, therefore, that if no agreement could be achieved on the budget problem, no agreement could have been achieved in setting the 1980-81 agricultural prices either. This, however, is an urgent problem. I think that the members of the Community who need clarity about agricultural prices and the agricultural policy in the next months are urged to make decisions. Agricultural prices can also be decided among eight members. Nine are not needed for that.

[Question] One question about the resignation of U.S. Secretary of State Vance. The resignation has been regretted everywhere, particularly in Europe. What consequences will the resignation have? How important will it be for relations between America and Europe?

[Answer] We have regeretted the resignation of Secretary of State Vance, particularly because we had such a good working basis and working contacts with Vance who is a good expert on Europe. I am certain that the next U.S. secretary of state will also be able to establish such relations with Europe. But in critical times, at a time when difficult decisions must be made, it is naturally a great loss if a man quits who has experience, whose solidarity is known to us, so that a corresponding foundation still needs to be created with his successor. That is particularly a problem in difficult times, in stormy times.

DIE WELT: RESCUE ATTEMPT REAFFIRMS U.S. WILLINGNESS TO ACT

DW281410 Bonn DIE WELT in German 28 Apr 80 p 6

[Thomas Kielinger editorial: "Moderation in Tehran"]

[Text] The failure has made the whole world a bunch of smart alecks. The President must now realize this bitter truism. Nearly everybody, from Joe Doe to many a friendly or less friendly government has put in his penny's worth about the aborted hostage liberation venture. Suddenly the scene is crawling with experts. Their judgment, even if it is blended with sympathy, is a beneficient poison: Something like this just could not have worked.

The White House can hardly defend itself credibly without divulging the most secret details of the plan. These must, however, remain under lock and key for good reasons, among them, the protection of the helpers in Iran--whoever they may be. So the protestation of the secretary of defense that the final phase of the mission, the operation in Tehran proper, would have been the easiest, remains hanging in the air. Will this satisfy the critics?

The question is superfluous. The critics would be well advised to concentrate on the essentials. What is essential is not the failure of the commando mission but the fact that it took place. Anyone having retained some instinct for future developments will discover the writing on the wall here. Jimmy Carter has crossed his Rubicon and shown that he, in keeping with the authority of his office, is willing to take military risks as well. This must not be underrated in a man whom the people had already begun to characterize as "maybe-Jimmy"--the man who always just says "maybe" but then does not act after all.

Perhaps Tehran is the place where Jimmy Carter is the least underrated. The reaction in Iran, at any rate, has been remarkably moderate. On the day after the commando mission President Bani-Sadr even put in a pointed warning to the Soviets to stay out of all Iranian quarrels. Bani-Sadr said that he would regard a Soviet "helping action" in the event of another military action by the Americans as "aggression." Nor was anything else to be expected. After all, the Iranians do not challenge the Americans, whom they describe as "devils," because they want to end up in the claws of the Soviet Beelzebub.

Nor did Tehran use the opportunity to proclaim the place where the Americans had to leave their wreckage a holy site of national enthusiasm. On the contrary, they bombed the battlefield as though some traces might have been left there which would have indicated Iranian involvement. In this effort the Iranian pilots--what irony of unfortunate concatenations!--fatally hit several of their compatriots.

Where the whole world seems to react hysterically the people in Tehran apparently have comprehended that the United States is not a paper tiger even if things initially fail sometimes. Pearl Harbor also went wrong in the beginning, and prior to the landing on the moon the Sputnik shock had to be taken. Possibly such defeats only create the proper determination for defense.

The fact that the hostages have now been taken to different places offers the responsible people a golden bridge: the transfer of the captives to government authority is practically beginning now; they staged the most ticklish diplomatic games over that issue with the Americans only 2 month ago. All those who still call themselves "moderate" in Tehran today can now come out to have their say. It is no longer possible to shift the responsibility to anonymous "students."

But in Moscow, too, the bugle of war hysteria is not being blown. Not only would the Soviet Union have nothing to gain from an advance into Iran which might earn it burning oilfields and the Islamic world's return to the West. What is much rather discernible behind TASS' idle talk about the Jimmy Carter who has obviously gone completely "mad" is a realistic assessment of the seriousness of the situation.

All provocations from Tehran to Moscow were carried out on the basis that the United States was too weak to act so that it could be challenged without punishment. Khomeyni especially always stated this openly. From now on he knows better. There has been bloodshed. We notice from Iranian and Soviet statements that a listlessness of thought is infecting the revolutionary zeal.
